PREFACE

THE NEW Third Series is a further extension of the original idea—a comprehensive collection of plot stories from world literature. Those familiar with the two earlier series of Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form will note in this new volume a change in format. Previously, all entries have been handled as plot summaries, a style that limited coverage to novels, dramas, and epic poems. In the Third Series, the essay-review also is employed.

Introduction of the essay-review permits a broadening of our scope to offer wider literary coverage in the fields of philosophy, lyric poetry, the essay, journals and letters, history, biography—subjects which do not lend themselves to our usual synopsis format.

The First and Second Series contain a total of 1,010 titles representing works by 511 authors. Among these are the giants of world literature, figures familiar to every student and represented in any home that pretends to even a modest library. These are the authors who have created and kept alive the stories men have wanted to hear, imaginative events depicted in drama and fiction to the delight of countless generations of readers.

Vital as these authors and their works are, they in no way overshadow the creative efforts of the philosophers, the poets, the essayists whose writings, attesting the abiding majesty of the human spirit, have enriched beyond measure the literary heritage of mankind. It is to these “non-story-tellers” that much of the attention in the Third Series is directed, essay-reviews highlighting the magnificent literary achievements of great writers and thinkers whose principal works cannot be synopsized. Of the five hundred titles included in the Third Series, more than two hundred are handled as essay-reviews. More than 250 new authors have been added and the amount of material written expressly for the series now exceeds two million words.

Along with the broadening of categories, the Third Series undergoes a geographical expansion by including a few titles from the vast reservoir of Oriental literature, an area of world culture long neglected by Western readers. However, we are now in an age of world-wide cultural intercourse, a force that—happily—transcends temporary political considerations, and as the wisdom, the humanity, the delights of Oriental literature come to the attention of the mass Western audience, interest in this field is sure to widen.

For suggestions, assistance, and new material in the area of Oriental literature I am indebted to Tsi-an and Chih-Tsing Hsia, Chi-Chen Wang, and Osamu Shimizu

Of the new categories covered in the Third Series, the subject of poetry has received the most attention. More than fifteen percent of the space is devoted to essay reviews covering the works of poets. The older writers are well represented and so, too, are the present day poets. Our articles on the latter group would be less satisfying but for the many permissions to quote which were granted by publishers, agents, and other copyright holders of copyrighted poetry. We were thus able to stress salient points illustratively.

Philosophy also comes in for a fair share of attention in the Third Series through use of the essay-review. In fact, by departing from the strict synopsis format of the earlier volumes, we are able to include in the series for the first time such influential writers as Aristotle, Bacon, Burke, Freud, Hume, William James, Kant, Locke, Mill, Nietzsche, Plato, and Spinoza.

It will be noted that some novels and plays are handled as essay reviews instead of plot-summaries. Sometimes this was done so that a general discussion of the author's other work could be included in the article dealing with a specific title. In a few cases, this was in compliance with the wishes expressed by authors or copyright owners who preferred to be represented in essay-reviews rather than plot-summaries. Bernard Shaw is one such example and this fact—rather than editorial oversight—accounts for the absence of his works in the earlier volumes, where the plot summary is the only style employed.

As was the case during the preparation of the First and Second Series, the cooperation of certain authors, publishers, agents, and literary trustees was requested in connection with the work on the Third Series. Again, my requests were generously granted and I wish to acknowledge with thanks the assistance received from these sources. Copyright notices and credit lines appear as footnotes accompanying the appropriate titles.

As always, the work of the Staff has been outstanding and the entire group has my sincere thanks. Unfortunately, space limitations prevent the listing of all Staff Members but individual acknowledgments are certainly due Matthew J. Brucoli, Gordon W. Clarke, William A. Grant, Willis K. Jones, Ian McGreal, Preston Newman, and Tench Francis Tughman for their extensive contributions.

Also, Dayton Kohler and I wish to acknowledge the special material contributed by August Derleth, M Clifford Harrison, G Burke Johnston, and William White

It is with real pleasure that we add another segment to this series on world literature begun twelve years ago. We are especially pleased that we have at last been able to incorporate many of the "non-storytellers" in our project, we believe those who use the work will be equally pleased.

Critique

One of the fifteenth century mystery plays performed by guild members in various towns in England, Abraham and Isaac tells the biblical story of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son. The Brome version is distinguished from others by its greater length and its fuller development of the characters of Abraham and Isaac. The mystery plays, although often simple in both plot and design, helped to provide the background and tradition from which Elizabethan drama later emerged. The play is in verse, sometimes written in five line stanzas rhyming abaab and sometimes in eight-line stanzas with alternate rhymes, these stanzas often ending in a shortened line. At other times the poetry conforms to no clear rhyming or stanzaic pattern. It is difficult to determine whether the play was originally written in a more careful poetic pattern, now lost through successive copyings and oral repetition, or whether it was originally written in a form close to the present version.

Abraham, offering a prayer of Thanksgiving to God, counted his blessings—

his land, his peaceful life, his children—and told of his delight in his favorite child, Isaac. He stood, while praying, in a field near his home in Beersheba. After the prayer he called to Isaac to return to their home.

God, in Heaven, summoned an Angel and told him that He intended to test Abraham's steadfastness by asking him to sacrifice Isaac, and he ordered the Angel to announce his wish to Abraham. Meanwhile, Abraham prayed again, asking God what gift or offering might please Him most. The Angel then appeared and told Abraham that God had commanded the sacrifice of Isaac as an indication of Abraham's love for the Lord.

Abraham immediately experienced great inward conflict. He kept repeating that Isaac was the most loved of all his children, that he would rather sacrifice anything else of his, including his own life, than to offer up Isaac. At the same time he was aware that God's will must be obeyed and that the sacrifice, no matter how painful, must be made. Abraham then called Isaac, who had been praying, and told him that they must perform a sacrifice for the Lord. Isaac declared his willingness to help Abraham felt his heart breaking as they walked toward Mount Vision to make the sacrifice

On their arrival at the mount, Isaac asked why Abraham seemed so concerned. The boy began to quake at the sight of the sharp sword in his father's hand because, aware of his father's acute misery, he guessed that he was to be the offering in the sacrifice to the Lord. Abraham then tried to explain to Isaac that they must follow God's commandment, having no other choice. But Isaac prayed to his father, asking him to spare his life and wishing his mother were there to intercede for him. Isaac also wondered what crimes he had committed that his life should be demanded by God. Abraham, in his misery, explained that God's will must simply be obeyed. At last Isaac understood and yielded to God's will. He asked, however, that Abraham not tell his mother he had been killed. Instead, she was to believe that he had gone into another land.

Resigning himself to death, Isaac asked for his father's blessing. Abraham gave him his blessing, lamented further, and proceeded to bind Isaac's hands. Abraham then repeated his hope that he could be sacrificed in Isaac's place, but the brave Isaac reminded him that God must be obeyed and asked that the killing be done quickly. Abraham covered Isaac's face with a cloth and made ready to lift his sword.

But just as he was about to strike Isaac, the Angel appeared and took the sword from his upraised hand. The Angel said that Abraham had proved his willingness to obey God's command, an act which fully displayed Abraham's mind and heart. Therefore, the Angel continued, Abraham would not be compelled to sacrifice his son, but might substitute a young ram, tied nearby, for the offering. Abraham was overjoyed and after the Angel's departure gave thanks to God for Isaac's deliverance. Isaac, too, welcomed his reprieve, but only did so after Abraham had assured him that God would regard the ram as a worthy substitute. Isaac, at his father's bidding, ran to bring the ram. Returning with it, Isaac expressed his happiness that the beast, rather than he, was to be sacrificed. When Abraham offered up the ram, Isaac still showed a great fear of Abraham's sword and did not wish to look at it.

After the sacrifice, God again spoke to Abraham, acknowledging his goodness and promising that his family would multiply. Abraham then returned with Isaac to their home, recounting on the way his pleasure that his favorite child had been spared. Isaac was also grateful, but realistically he mentioned his fear and stated that he never wanted to see the hill again. Both thanked God and both showed great relief to be returning home together. Abraham praised the gentleness and understanding of his young son.

(At that point the Doctor appeared on the scene to make the moral of this happening explicit. The Doctor brought out the fact that the story showed how one should follow God's commandments without quarreling. The Doctor asked how many would be willing to smite their children if God so commanded. He thought that several might do so, though their women would wail and protest. But, the Doctor continued, God would mend everything for those truly willing to follow his commandments, for those who served God faithfully would be certain to benefit from their loyalty.)

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Locale Kentucky, Illinois, Washington, D. C. and areas of the Civil War campaigns

First published The Prairie Years, 1926, The War Years, 1939

Carl Sandburg's Abraham Lincoln is a monumental work on a monumental theme, the life, works, and times of a symbolic American of history and legend. There is nothing of its kind ancient or modern, with which it may adequately be compared. Among Civil War biographies its closest counterpart is Douglas Southall Freeman's R. E. Lee (qv), but even on this common ground point of view and the use of salient detail create vastly different effects of organization and presentation. In the Freeman biography Lee holds the center of the stage at all times and the background panorama of people and events, even the battles and campaigns of the war, are shown only as they throw light on Lee's personality and labors. Sandburg, on the other hand, sets Lincoln against a tremendous movement of history as he tells simultaneously, on different levels, the story of a man, a war, an age, and a people. In the end the qualities which set this work apart seem appropriate and significant. Lincoln, that ungainly, complex, humorous, melancholy, and sadly serene man, was also one of the great solitaires.

When The War Years appeared in 1939, more than one reviewer commented on the happy conjunction of the perfect writer and the perfect subject. In Sandburg's case there is more truth in this critical generalization than in most, for he brought to his tremendous task a greater familiarity with the regional and folk aspects of Lincoln's life than anyone had possessed since Lincoln's own day. In the late nineteenth century there was still no wide gap between Sandburg's boyhood in Galesburg, Illinois and Lincoln's growing years in the Sangamon River country. Familiar with New Salem, Vandalia, Springfield, and other landmarks of Lincoln's early life, the Swedish immigrant's son had known the men and women of Lincoln's day and had listened to their stories. Poet, fabulist, folklorist, and singer of the American dream, Sandburg felt in time that the Lincoln story had become a part of himself, not in the sense of blind hero worship but as evidence of the believable reality and fulfilled promise of American life.

More than thirty years of preparation, research, and writing went into the two divisions of Abraham Lincoln. At first Sandburg had in mind a story of Lincoln as the prairie lawyer and politician, but as his investigations continued he realized that his book was outgrowing its projected length and purpose. His increasing desire to tell all the facts of Lincoln's life as they existed in books already published, documentary records, or in the memories of men and women finally led him to divide his material into two parts, the first the story of the country boy and lawyer politician, the second an account of Lincoln in the White House.

The Prairie Years was published in 1926. In these two volumes Sandburg deals with the more legendary aspects of the Lincoln story: boyhood days and backwoods life; a young man's journeys down the Mississippi, a masculine schooling, mostly self-taught, in grammar, mathematics, surveying, debate, and law; the years of clerking in grocery stores and working at odd jobs; military service in the Black Hawk War; his relations with Ann Rutledge, Mary Owens, Mary Todd; his law practice, and his early political career. This material is presented with a wealth of anecdote—stories about Lincoln and by him—so that it resembles at times an anthology of Lincoln lore. This period of Lincoln's life lends itself at times to fabulous or lyric treatment of which Sandburg the poet takes full advantage. There are passages that read like poetry, sentences and paragraphs that celebrate the beauty of nature and the mystery and wonder of life. Yet these occasional flights of poetic fancy are held firmly within bounds by realistic portrayal and strict regard for fact. In these volumes Sandburg's Lincoln emerges as a man of the people but no hero in the ordinary sense. Circumstances had shaped him into a man of vision and resource, but he was also a troubled, threatened, doubted man when he left Springfield in 1861 on the eve of his inauguration as President of the United States

The War Years was published in four volumes thirteen years later. In the meantime Sandburg had traveled widely to gather material from every available source, read extensively in histories, biographies, newspapers, pamphlets, diaries, letters and handbills, looked at pictures and cartoons, collected memorabilia of every sort, and written steadily while he studied, pondered, and re-created—in effect, relived—Lincoln's life during the Civil War period. The result, in the opinion of historians and critics, is a biography not likely soon to be surpassed of a man linked inseparably to his country's history and the folk imagination of all time.

Sandburg makes no attempt to gloss over the dark years of 1861-1862. Lincoln, who had incurred ridicule by arriving in Washington in a military cape and a Scotch plaid cap—in disguise, his enemies jeered—found himself hated in the South, handicapped by his Cabinet and the Congress, and faced with the crisis of Fort Sumter. Having taken over the leadership which William Henry Seward, Secretary of State, had tried at first to withhold from the chief executive, Lincoln then proceeded to display a tempering attitude which history finds hard to explain. His declaration at the end of 1862—"Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history"—is open to various interpretations. But Lincoln was to ride out of the storm of public disfavor. The Emancipation Proclamation, the turn of the tide at Gettysburg, the appointment of Ulysses S. Grant to the high command, and the Gettysburg Address mark what Sandburg calls the "Storm Center" of the war years. Although the mid-term elections of 1863 were against Lincoln and his own party was prepared to abandon him for the sake of political expediency, he won the campaign of 1864 in the face of the bitterest opposition of his enemies and the apathy of his party. From this time on Sandburg shows the tide in full flood—the aggressive final phase of the war, Sherman's march to the sea, the passing of the Thirteenth Amendment, the surrender at Appomattox, and the night at Ford's Theater on April 14, 1865. The end of the story is starkly, movingly, eloquently told with a poet's power of words and the historian's respect for truth.

In handling the massive reportage of Abraham Lincoln, Sandburg never pretends to be more than a storyteller, a recorder. Ever since the publication of The Prairie Years critics had tried to find a term to describe his method as a biographer, since his work could not be judged by any of the accepted schools from Herodotus to Lytton Strachey. The War Years, with all its vast accumulation of fact piled on fact, detail on detail, gave them the answer. Sandburg's method is the way of the old chronicles and sagas in telling the stories of folk and tribal heroes. This biography is a work which expands within the consciousness of the reader because of its continuous addition and multiplication of concrete and evocative details—battle summaries, character sketches, anecdotes, letters, quotations of every kind—all presented without analysis or interpretation so that in the end they shape themselves to their own pattern and carry their own weight of meaning.

Nothing is too vast or too commonly known to be glossed over without patient attention to every living detail, nothing is too trivial to be included. Never has there been such a summoning of witnesses to testify to a man and his age. Foreign diplomats, members of the Cabinet and the Congress, military men of the North and the South, Tolstoy, Ibsen, Hawthorne, Mrs. Mary Chesnut, that shrewd, ardent Secessionist, and hundreds of obscure men and women appear briefly, make their gesture or have their say, and then disappear. His enemies make their insults and accusations, his detractors voice their ridicule, his friends speak in his praise All leave behind them something that adds to our understanding of Lincoln, something more important than the opinions of politicians or the decisive outcomes of battles and accounts of military campaigns in creating the illusion of life itself

These details, great and small, are the background setting against which Lincoln looms with increasing stature as his story unfolds Against this backdrop of history he appears as a man all too human in his weaknesses and failures, just as he appears greater than other men in the strength, wisdom, and sad serenity of his last months "Unfathomable" is the adjective Sandburg most frequently applies to him Many writers have tried to analyze Lincoln It remained for Sandburg simply to show the man, letting him speak and act for himself This also was the method of the anonymous writers of the ancient sagas

The War Years, more somber in tone, offers less opportunity than The Prairie Years for bardic song Occasionally, however, the poet breaks in on the biographer and historian One such passage occurs after the account of the Gettysburg Address when Lincoln, a wet towel over his tired eyes, was on his way back to Washington, and a moonlit hush had fallen over the battlefield and the new made

graves Then in Whitmanesque measures Sandburg speaks his requiem for the buried dead in the silent cemetery as he looks out over the land and into the homes where the son, the husband, or the father is missing from his familiar place and the clocks of time and destiny tick on Again, at the beginning of the chapter titled "The Calendar Says Good Friday," he employs another poetic passage to set the mood for coming tragedy Nowhere, however, is he more moving than in the solemn intensity of the three simple sentences that bring the Lincoln story to its irrevocable close

Sandburg's Abraham Lincoln is the biography of an American whose true story lends itself to the spirit of legend, a pageant of history, a poet's dream, a national myth It is a story that is vast, implicative, at times contradictory It is the stubborn, time defying stuff of life itself, a story in which Sandburg finds in Lincoln's life the meaning of all America But it is a poet's biography only in the sense that every true poet is a biographer providing insights to human experience Unfortunately, not all biographers are poets Carl Sandburg, to our enrichment, is the rare writer who is both If America has an epic, it is this story of a national hero recreated from the testimony of the men and women of Lincoln's time

ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

Author John Dryden (1631-1700)

Time Late seventeenth century

First published 1681

Principal characters

DAVID, King of Israel

ABSALOM his illegitimate son

ACHITOPHEL, chief of the rebels

Dryden claimed that Absalom and Achitophel was carefully planned to promote political reform To gain this end, Dryden used satire, the true aim of which he defined as "the amendment of vices

by correction" The particular vices he wanted corrected were those of the Whigs of his day, who were seeking to secure the succession of the Duke of Monmouth, illegitimate son of Charles II, to his father's throne. Second, realizing that direct satire might defeat its purpose by incurring resentment, Dryden chose to attack the Whigs by casting them as characters in the Biblical story of Absalom's revolt against David. Third, to dull the edge of the satire even more and thus increase its effectiveness proportionately, he cast it in verse, "for there's a sweetness in good verse, which tickles even while it hurts."

The poem is loosely organized, but several main divisions can be noted. The first of these, an account of the political situation in Israel (England), opens with a joking reference to David's (Charles II's) virility, which though wasted on a barren queen, produced a host of illegitimate progeny, of which by far the fairest and noblest was Absalom (Duke of Monmouth). David's kingly virtues were equally strong but unappreciated by a great number of Jews (Whigs), who because of a perverse native temperament wanted to rebel. Although David had provided no cause for rebellion, as the wiser Jews (Tories) pointed out, a cause was found in the alleged Jebusite (Catholic) plot to convert the nation to the Egyptian (French) religion. The plot miscarried, but it did create factions whose leaders were jealous of David and opposed his reign.

The second section consists of a portrait of Achitophel, the chief of these leaders (the Earl of Shaftesbury, leader of the Whigs), and an account of his efforts to persuade Absalom to seize the throne. Dryden characterized Achitophel as a brilliant wit touched by the madness of ambition. Unwilling to be remembered only for his distinguished career as a judge, he "Resolv'd to run or to rule the State," using the king's alleged sympathy for the Jebusites as an excuse for rebellion. Achitophel first used flattery to win over Absalom, proclaiming that the nation was clamoring for him—a "second Moses." At first Absalom resisted, pointing out that David was a wise and just king, and that David's brother (the Duke of York) was the legal heir. These half-hearted objections Achitophel met with sophistry. David's mildness, he claimed, had deteriorated into weakness; the public good demanded Absalom's strength; the rightful heir was planning to murder Absalom; David himself secretly wanted Absalom to be king and would support his claim as heir to the throne. To these specious arguments Absalom succumbed, whereupon Achitophel proceeded to organize all the Jewish malcontents into a single seditious party.

The third section of the poem lists the motives of these misguided patriots, opportunists, republicans, and religious fanatics. In a series of satiric character studies Dryden ridiculed their chieftains. In the character of Zimri, which Dryden considered "worth the whole poem," he poked fun at the fickleness and "extremity" of Buckingham, Shaftesbury's lieutenant in the Whig Party. Shimei represented the Sheriff of London, who had betrayed the king's interests, and Corah, the notorious Titus Oates, who had fabricated many of the details of the Catholic plot.

The next section of the poem describes Absalom's nation-wide tour, planned by Achitophel to gauge the extent of the people's support for their plan to exclude the legal heir from the throne and to establish Absalom's right to the succession by law. Traveling up and down the land, Absalom craftily represented himself as the people's friend, opposed to Egyptian domination, the Jebusite plot, and a senile king, but powerless to act because of his loyalty to the crown and the lawful succession. The Jews, always easy to delude, proclaimed Absalom a new messiah.

A long tirade follows in which Dryden attacked the Jews' naive support of Absalom and their willingness to overthrow legally instituted authority. Though not a believer in absolute monarchy, Dryden was a conservative who upheld the supremacy of established law over the voice of the people. He feared that the government would quickly deteriorate into anarchy if the people were given the power to make and break kings at will by changing the order of the succession. Dryden, like all the conservatives of his time, feared the judgment of the people, and, therefore, any movement toward democracy.

In the next section Dryden sketched portraits of David's supporters—the Tory leaders. Here, of course, there was no satiric intent. Barzillai (the Duke of Ormond) was lavishly praised as the noblest adherent to David's cause and one of Israel's true heroes. Two members of the clergy, namely Zadoc (the Archbishop of Canterbury) and the Sagan of Jerusalem (the Bishop of London), were commended for their services to the crown. Other loyalists praised for their services in Sanhedrin (Parliament), include Adriel (the Earl of Mulgrave), Jotham (the Marquis of Halifax), Hushai (Laurence Hyde), and Amiel (Edward Seymour). These loyal chieftains who defied the powerful rebel faction ultimately convinced David that concessions to the people would but feed their leaders' ambition, and that Absalom was being used as a tool by the treacherous Achitophel.

The last section of the poem consists of a long speech in which David finally reasserted the royal prerogative. Realizing that his enemies had been scoffing at his moderation and clemency as a sign of weakness and fear, he resolved to show his strength. David, regretting that Absalom would be compelled to suffer, expressed his willingness to forgive at the sign of repentance, but he refused to condone disloyalty. The Sanhedrin's attempt to change the line of succession he denounced, scorning their deceitful claim that they were trying to protect him from a scheming brother. Finally, he stated his reluctance to resort to force but declared his readiness to use it to defend the supremacy of established law over both Sanhedrin and king. In the last lines of the poem, heaven clapped its thunder in approval of David's words and the new era which they heralded.

Absalom and Achitophel failed, of course, to reform the Whigs, their attempts to put the Duke of Monmouth rather than the Duke of York on the throne were defeated only some fifteen years after the publication of the poem which is remembered for its literary, not historical, significance.

Critique

The Acharnians is the earliest known comedy of Aristophanes and, deservedly, his first prize winner. Thematically, it is the most inclusive of his plays, in it we find his powerful wit and satire against militarism and war, his contempt for petty politicians and informers, his de-light in earthy sex play, and his spirited spoofing of Euripides—qualities which make it the most personal of Anstophanes' works. When Dicaeopolis speaks directly to the audience in the parabasis, he does so with the voice of Anstophanes eloquently asserting his intellectual honesty and independence and declaring that he will always fight for the cause of peace and justice in his comedies.

Dicaeopolis, waiting for the assembly to convene, sat musing, making figures in the dust, pulling out his loose hairs, and longing for peace. He was fully prepared to harass and abuse the speakers if they talked of anything but peace with Sparta. Immediately after the citizens had gathered, his friend Amphitheus began to complain of hunger because of the wartime diet. He was saved from arrest only by the intervention of Dicaeopolis.

The assembly then listened to a series of fantastic claims made by the pompous ambassadors to Athens' allies, each speech punctuated by a scoffing aside from Dicaeopolis who knew full well that the entire alliance was wasting away from the effects of the Peloponnesian War. The high point of absurdity was reached when the last of the ambassadors ushered in a few scraggly, miserably dressed troops, introducing them as a Thracian host sent to assist in the war. Dicaeopolis, knowing of the assembly's willingness to adjourn upon the slightest provocation, then brought about the end of the session by claiming to have felt a drop of rain.

Finding himself unable to bring about the end of the war, Dicaeopolis determined to effect a personal, separate peace. Amphitheus, his own ambassador, returned from the enemy with three bottles of wine—the first five years old, the second ten years old, and the third thirty years old. The first two tasted vile, but the last was rich with a bouquet of nectar and ambrosia. Drinking it down, Dicaeopolis personally accepted and ratified a thirty-year peace. The Acharnians, whose vineyards had been ravaged by the enemy having got wind of this traitorous act, arrived in pursuit of Amphitheus just as Dicaeopolis was leaving his house to offer up a ritual prayer to Bacchus in thanks for the peace that allowed him to resume once more a normal existence with his wife. Upon hearing his prayer, the Acharnians began to stone him as he tried in vain to persuade them that peace was good. Threatened with further violence, Dicaeopolis seized a covered basket of coals and announced that it was an Acharnian child, a hostage, which he would disembowel if he were not permitted to plead his cause. When the Acharnians agreed, he asked further to be allowed to dress properly for the occasion.

Dicaeopolis then went to the house of Euripides to borrow the costume of Telephus, the most unfortunate and pathetic of all the heroes of Euripides' tragedies. The great playwright, in the midst of composing a new tragedy, was hardly in the mood to be disturbed, but Dicaeopolis could not resist the opportunity to tease him about his wretched heroes and about the fact that his mother had sold vegetables. Finally the irate Euripides gave him the miserable costume and turned him out.

The eloquent plea for peace that Dicaeopolis delivered to the Acharnians was so moving that the chorus was divided on the issue. At that moment Lamachus, a general dressed in full armor, arrived on the scene. He declared that nothing could dissuade him from eternal war on the Spartans and their allies. Dicaeopolis countered with a proclamation that his markets were henceforth open to all the enemies of Athens, but not to Lamachus.

Shortly thereafter a starving Megarian appeared in Dicaeopolis' market place with his two daughters, who had agreed with their father that it would be better to be sold than to die of hunger. After disguising them as pigs by fitting them with hoofs and snouts, the Megarian stuffed them into a sack and offered them to Dicaeopolis as the finest sows he could possibly offer to Aphrodite. Dicaeopolis, aware of the deception, nevertheless accepted them in exchange for a supply of garlic and salt. The next trader was a fat, thriving Boeotian with a tremendous supply of game birds, animals, and fish. All he asked in exchange was some item of Athenian produce not available in Boeotia. Careful bargaining revealed, however, that the only such item was an informer—a vessel useful for holding all foul things, a mortar for grinding out lawsuits, a light for looking into other people's accounts. At last the bargain was made, and the next meddling informer to enter the market place and threaten Dicaeopolis with exposure to the authorities was seized bound, and carefully packed in hay for the Boeotian to carry home.

Suddenly General Lamachus was ordered to take his battalions to guard the borders against invasion during the forthcoming Feast of the Cups. At the same time the priest of Bacchus ordered Dicaeopolis to prepare for joyous participation in the feast. The chorus wished them both joy as Lamachus donned his heavy armor and Dicaeopolis dressed in festival clothes, as Lamachus unhooked his spear and Dicaeopolis unhooked a sausage. After the feast Lamachus was carried in, hurt in a fall in a ditch before encountering the enemy, and Dicaeopolis entered, hilariously drunk and supported by two voluptuous courtesans. The blessings of peace were emphasized by the fact that, in the end, Lamachus the militarist was carried off to the surgeon while Dicaeopolis was conducted before the judges to be awarded the wineskin of victory.

Type of work Formal speeches

First delivered 1838-1865

Abraham Lincoln, sixteenth President of the United States and author of the Gettysburg Address, has come to be recognized as a creative speaker with an individual and appealing style. He had a perceptive sense of humor and an awareness of human dignity and of the tragedy which occurs with the loss of it. His arguments were logically respectable and responsive to the problems of his times. Although he always retained a directness of statement and feeling which reflected the conditions of his boyhood in Kentucky and Indiana, he was by no means a merely homespun speaker or writer. His poetic phrasing and imagery, Biblical allusions, and rhetorical devices all testify to the fact that he was a well-educated and intelligent man who could speak to any kind of audience in a manner and with the diction appropriate to the occasion.

But Lincoln was not perfect. If it is relevant to state the fact of his imperfection, the reason is that Lincoln's compassion and understanding and his contribution to the creation of American democracy as we know it have so impressed his fellow citizens that sometimes romantic legends lead us to believe that he never spoke without winning assent and admiration from those whom he addressed. But since he was human and to err is human, and since he was sometimes called upon to speak when there was no great problem to resolve or attack, he was on occasion ineffective in what he said.

Once the legend of Lincoln's perfection is dispelled, the fact of his greatness as a man, a President, and a speaker emerges. The Gettysburg Address of 1863 was no isolated phenomenon; the ideas, the sentiments, the clear eloquence had all been heard before, but never with such economy and depth.

"The Perpetuation of Our Political In

sstitutions," one of the earliest of Lincoln's speeches, was an address given to the Young Men's Lyceum of Springfield, Illinois, on January 27, 1838. Lincoln began by recalling the political and social legacy bequeathed the American people of the nineteenth century by their fathers, and he asked how the task of maintaining the liberties transmitted to them might best be performed. He argued that the danger of loss came not from abroad but only from Americans themselves. "If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher," Lincoln then referred to several violent instances of mob action and argued that such disregard for law could result in the loss of the legacy of freedom. Although the passion of revolution had helped Americans achieve their liberty, it was necessary to let reason and a reverence for law prevail.

In this early speech there is ample evidence of Lincoln's power—a power partly literary and partly spiritual. The young speaker reflected his sense of his role, as a citizen, to transmit the American heritage. Like his contemporaries, he placed his faith in reason, law, the orderly processes of government, and a sense of human dignity, but he added to this conventional faith his own clear conviction and commitment, applying the principles of democracy to the immediate danger he found about him. His philosophy of government was conservative; he did not speak for abolition—but what he conserved were the principles needed in critical times. His character, not the particular strain of his politics, was already the most persuasive element in his addresses, the demands of the Presidency in a time of civil war were to realize the nobility of that character.

At the close of the Republican State Convention at Springfield, Illinois, on June 16, 1858, Lincoln delivered an acceptance of the senatorial nomination. This speech marked the beginning of the campaign that was to involve him in the series of debates with Stephen A. Douglas. After referring to the increase in slavery agitation, Lincoln declared:

In my opinion, it will not cease, until a crisis shall have been reached, and passed—

'A house divided against itself can not stand'

I believe this government cannot endure, permanently half slave and half free

I do not expect the Union to be dissolved—I do not expect the house to fall—but I do expect it will cease to be divided

It will become all one thing or all the other

Lincoln went on to discuss the Nebraska Bill, which allowed the people of any state or territory to determine whether slavery was to be allowed in their state or territory, the Dred Scott Decision, and the opinions of Senator Douglas. Lincoln maintained that Douglas cared nothing about halting the advance of slavery, and he implied that Douglas' policy tended to divide the Union.

In the first Lincoln-Douglas debate at Ottawa, Illinois, on August 21, 1858, Douglas referred to Lincoln's acceptance speech and quoted Lincoln's remarks concerning the "house divided against itself." He argued that the founders of the nation had believed it possible for the union to exist with both free and slave states, and he suggested that Lincoln could hardly disagree with such men as Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and Hamilton. He endorsed the Dred Scott Decision, declaring that if Lincoln's opinions prevailed "black settlements" would "cover your prairies." "I am in favor of confining citizenship to white men, men of European birth and descent," Douglas asserted, "instead of conferring it upon Negroes, Indians, and other inferior races."

Lincoln replied by correcting a number of misrepresentations made by Senator Douglas, and in order to counter the charge that he was an abolitionist he quoted from a speech he had made at Peoria, Illinois in 1854. Although he stated that he had no intention of introducing political and social equality between the white and the black races, he added that "notwithstanding all this, there is no reason in the world why the Negro is not entitled to all the natural rights enumerated in the Declaration of Independence—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Even when, for the sake of politics, Lincoln agreed with Douglas that the black man was not his equal, he qualified his admission. "I agree with Judge Douglas that he [the Negro] is not my equal in many respects—certainly not in color, perhaps not in moral or intellectual endowment." Then, although the "perhaps" made a world of difference, Lincoln closed that particular subject. "But in the right to eat the bread without the leave of anybody else, which his own hand earns, he is my equal, and the equal of Judge Douglas, and the equal of every living man."

Even now, more than a hundred years after the debates, the speeches by Douglas and Lincoln bring the living man before the imagination. Douglas is the clever, urbane debater, but Lincoln is at least as clever, and he has the words to reach all minds and to express sentiments which make up the American ideal. In debate, Lincoln was as relentless as his opponent in the attempt to win his points, but he was never vicious, even when he was not as candid as a man could be. His homely sense of humor remained an invaluable instrument in his bag of rhetorical devices. Immediately after considering Douglas' charge that he was an abolitionist, Lincoln passed on to the question of whether he had ever been a grocery keeper. He said, "I don't know that it would be a great sin if I had been, but he is mistaken. Lincoln never kept a grocery anywhere in the world. It is true that Lincoln did work the latter part of one winter in a little still-house up at the head of a hollow."

At Springfield, Illinois, in his last speech of the campaign of 1858, Lincoln repeated that he admitted the right of the South to reclaim its fugitives and that he denied the right of Congress to interfere with the states. He declared that he had found the campaign painful particularly because former friends accused him of wishing to destroy the union. Then he concluded that some had charged him with ambition, but that he would gladly withdraw if he could be assured of "unyielding hostility" to the spread of slavery. The candor and intensity of this brief speech make it one of Lincoln's most moving addresses.

Lincoln's courage became most evident with his address at Cooper Union in New York on February 27, 1860. He took issue with Douglas' claim that the authors of the Constitution understood the "question" as well as the men of his own day. He agreed with Douglas that the fathers of the Constitution understood the issue, but he disagreed with Douglas' assertion that they sided with Douglas' view that the Constitution forbids federal control of slavery. Lincoln argued strongly against any interpretation of the Constitution which would have permitted the extension of slavery to the Free States and the territories. He referred to the secessionist threat to destroy the union if a Republican president were elected, and he urged that the Republicans do their part to maintain peace. He concluded, "Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith, let us, to the end, dare to do our duty as we understand it."

Later in the year, in May, Lincoln was nominated for the office of President by the Republican Party, although he had been defeated in his senatorial campaign against Douglas, his speeches had brought him into national prominence. In February, 1861, after having been elected to the Presidency in November of the preceding year, Lincoln said farewell to the people of Springfield, Illinois, with a few poignant sentences in which he asked for the assistance of "that Divine Being" who had attended Washington. The Civil War began in April.

Lincoln's inaugural addresses, his message to Congress on July 4, 1861, and his annual messages to Congress presented the facts of the national crisis with clarity and compassion. The Gettysburg Address of November 19, 1863, brought all of Lincoln's sincere idealism into focus and related it to the grief of a nation. His addresses will continue to remain a cherished part of the American heritage and a significant segment of the world's literature.

From one point of view it may be said that the modern psychological novel sprang full-blown from the brain of Benjamin Constant, from other points of view, however, Adolphe is too much of a sport in nineteenth-century literature to shed much light on the historical development of the novel. The work might be described as a little seventeenth-century tragedy written in lucid eighteenth-century prose about a nineteenth-century situation by a twentieth-century analytical consciousness. The brevity and the apparently effortless progression of the story result in a deceptive simplicity. Ostensibly about an unhappy love affair—from the first fixation of an abundant and unattached vitality, through the luminous point of love, to the final disillusionment, or dissolution—Adolphe represents a remorseless survey of a familiar modern interior waste land whose most marked characteristic is gradual emotional atrophy.

Having creditably completed his studies at Göttingen in spite of a somewhat dissipated life, Adolphe was expected, after a preliminary period of travel, to take his place in the governmental department of which his father was the head. The hopes entertained by his father, the minister of a German Electorate, inclined him to leniency regarding his son's indiscretions, but because of an inherent timidity shared by father and son—a timidity combined, on the part of the father, with a defensive outward coldness—no real sympathy was possible between the two. The constraint generated by this relationship had a considerable effect on Adolphe's character, as did a period he spent as the protégé of a woman much older than he whose strong and unconventional opinions made on him an indelible impression. This period, spent in long, passionately analytical conversations, culminated with the woman's death.

On leaving the university, Adolphe went to the small German principality of D—. At first he was welcomed at court, but eventually he attracted to himself the malicious judgments of those who resented the mannered frivolity, alternating with scathing frankness, which stemmed from his profound indifference to the available society. The woman who had formed his mind had bequeathed to him an ardent dislike of mediocrity and all its expressions, and he found it difficult to reconcile himself with the artificiality of society and the necessity for arbitrary convention. Moreover, his only interest at that time was indulgence in passionate feelings which lead to contempt for the ordinary world.

One thing which did impress him was the spectacle of a friend's joy at making a conquest of one of the less mediocre women of the court. His friend's reaction not only developed in Adolphe the regrets connected with piqued vanity, but also other more confused emotions related to newly discovered aspects of his desire to be loved. He could discover in himself no marked tastes, but on making the acquaintance of Count P——, Adolphe soon determined to attempt establishing a liaison with the woman who had shared the count's life for ten years and whose two illegitimate children had been acknowledged by their father. Ellenore was a spirited woman who came from a good Polish family ruined in her childhood by political troubles. Her history was one of untiring devotion to the count and constant conflict between her respectable sentiments and her position in society—a position which had gradually become sanctioned, however, through the influence of her lover.

Adolphe did not think of himself as being in love, but as fulfilling obligations to his self-esteem, yet he found his thoughts increasingly occupied with Ellenore's person as well as his project and, unable to make a verbal declaration, he finally wrote to her. His inner agitation and the conviction he sought to express rebounded, however, and his imagination became wholly entangled when Ellenore refused to receive him. Becoming perfectly convinced of his love, he finally succeeded in overcoming her resistance to his suit. When the count was called away on urgent business, Adolphe and Ellenore basked for a few weeks in the charm of love and mutual gratitude. But Adolphe began almost immediately to be annoyed at the new constraint imposed on his life

by this attachment, rewarding though he found it. The idea that it could not last calmed his fears, and he wrote to his father upon Ellenore's importunings, asking permission to postpone his return for six months. When his father gave the desired consent, Adolphe was immediately confronted again by all the drawbacks involved in his remaining at D——. He was irritated at the prospect of prolonging the deceptions required by his affair, of continuing the profitless life he led under Ellenore's exacting domination, above all, of making her suffer by compromising her position, for the count had become suspicious on his return.

Adolphe's resentment led to a quarrel with Ellenore in which were made the first irreparable statements that once spoken cannot be recalled. The quarrel and the forced intimacy which followed it only increased Ellenore's anxiety and aidor, and she decided to break with Count P—— when he ordered her not to see Adolphe. Adolphe could not summon the courage to reject her sacrifice even though it caused him great anguish and destroyed in a moment the social respect which Ellenore had acquired through years of effort. His sense of duty increasing as his love weakened, he was willing to fight a duel at the slightest disparaging remark about her, yet he himself wronged her in inconsequential social conversation. When the time came for him to leave, he promised to return, fearing her violent grief. Moreover, he discovered that the arrival of the break he had longed for filled him with keen regret, almost with terror. He wrote regular letters to her, each begun with the intention of indicating his coldness, but all ways ended with words calculated to restore her confidence in his passion. Meanwhile, he relished his independence.

Having understood from Adolphe's letters that it would be difficult for him to leave his father, Ellenore decided to join him. He wrote advising her to postpone her coming, with the consequence that her indignation was aroused and her ar arrival hastened Adolphe had resolved to meet her with a show of joy, concealing his real feelings, but she sensed the deception immediately and reproached him, putting his weakness in such a miserable light that he became enraged. Finally, the two turned on each other in a violent scene.

On returning to his father's house, Adolphe learned that his father had been informed of Ellenore's arrival and had taken steps to force her to leave the town. His father's concern with Adolphe's future was undoubtedly genuine, but it unfortunately took the form of adherence to the standard values of a corrupt society and could only have the effect of strengthening the bond between the lovers. Adolphe made hurried arrangements and carried Ellenore off precipitately, smothering her with passion. Always astute, she detected contradictions in his actions and told him that he was moved by pity rather than by love—thereby revealing something which he would have preferred not to know and giving him a new preoccupation to conceal.

When the two reached the frontier, Adolphe wrote to his father with some bitterness, holding him responsible for the course he had been forced to take. His father's reply was notable for its generosity, he repeated everything Adolphe had said and ended by saying that although Adolphe was wasting his life, he would be allowed complete freedom. In the absence of the necessity to defend Ellénore, Adolphe's impatience with the tie became even more pronounced.

The two settled for a time in Bohemia where Adolphe, having accepted the responsibility for Ellénore's fate, made every effort to restrain himself from causing her suffering. He assumed an artificial gaiety and with the passing of time once again came intermittently to feel some of his feigned sentiment. When alone, however, his old unrest gripped him and he made vague plans to flee from his attachment.

At this point Adolphe learned of a fresh sacrifice which Ellénore had made, the refusal of an offer from Count P—— to settle her again in suitable circumstances. Adolphe, grasping at this opportunity, told her that he no longer loved her, but at the sight of her violent grief he pretended that his attitude was all a ruse. Another possibility of escape occurred after Ellenore's father had been reinstated in his property in Poland; she was notified that he had died and that she had been made the sole heir. Because the will was being contested, Ellenore persuaded Adolphe to accompany her to Poland. Meanwhile, their relationship continued to deteriorate.

Letters came from Adolphe's father asserting that since Adolphe could no longer be considered Ellenore's protector there was no longer any excuse for the life he was leading. The father had recommended Adolphe, the letters said, to Baron T—— (a friend of the father's and the minister from their country to Poland) and wished Adolphe to call on him. When the young man did so, Baron T—— assumed the father's role and attempted to separate Adolphe and Ellenore. Adolphe spent a night wandering in the country, engaged in confused meditations in which he told himself that his mind was recovering from a long degradation.

Ellénore made another futile effort to penetrate the closed sanctuary of his mind, but a new alignment of forces emerged as Adolphe succumbed more and more to the influence of Baron T——. He continued to procrastinate in putting a definite end to the relationship, but he wrote incriminating letters which the baron forwarded to Ellénore. At last she became fatally ill. Adolphe was finally freed by her death, which produced in him a feeling of great desolation.

AESOP'S FABLES

Type of work Didactic fiction

First published in English 1484

A mid nineteenth century French lawyer, M L Hervieux, wanting his daughters to know something of Roman literature, decided to translate some of the animal stories which had been put into Latin verse by Phaedrus, a Macedonian servant freed by Emperor Augustus. The trouble was to find a definitive edition of the work. Years later, after visiting most of the important libraries of Europe, M Hervieux published Les fabulistes latins in two volumes and fifteen hundred pages, attributing only sixty seven fables to this Greek who translated into Latin verse the Greek prose of Demetrius Phalereus of the third century B C. In the third century of the Christian era, Valerius Babrius, Latin tutor to the son of Emperor Alexander Severus, had also put into Greek verse the fables in Latin prose by Nicostratus, a hanger on at the court of Marcus Aurelius. Three quarters of the fables set down by Nicostratus were attributed to Aesop.

Some scholars believe that Aesop was as much a fable as his fables. Of course, there is a Life of Aesop, written by a certain Planudes Maximus, a thirteenth century Byzantine monk who prefaced his collection of fables in Latin prose with what he claimed was a true biography of their author. According to the Byzantine monk, Aesop was a slave born in Samos and killed in Delphi in the sixth century B C. One statue shows him as deformed and animal like as the characters of his tales.

History does provide a few details. There is reference to a "noble statue" of him that once existed in Athens, the work of Lysippus, but that may have been as much a creation of the imagination as the sturdy, brown clad figure in Velázquez' painting. Herodotus, writing less than a century after Aesop was supposed to have flourished in describing the lovely courtesan Rhodopis, who lived about 550 B C, mentioned (II,134) the fact that the girl was a slave of Iadmon of Samos, and added 'Aesop, the maker of fables, was a fellow slave.' Also, Herodotus recorded the payment of an indemnity paid by the Delphians to the grandson of Iadmon for the murder of Aesop, supposedly because some fable symbolizing the misdeeds of one citizen had angered the others.

Aristotle, in his Rhetoric, II, xx, is the authority for Aesop's use of a fable in oratory, as he defended a demagogue accused of embezzling. The slave told of a fox who was infested by fleas but refused to let a hedgehog remove them. 'These have already taken their fill of me and do not continue to suck my blood. If you remove them, others less satiated will come to extract what blood I have left.' The story was a hint to the Samians to let his client continue in office, since he had already made his fortune.

Also tagged with Aesop's name is the story of the frogs who asked for a king and were sent a stork who gobbled them up, a fable intended to dissuade the citizens of Athens from deposing Pisistratus. But when researchers seek in Greek manuscripts other fables that can definitely be attributed to Aesop, they find hardly a dozen, of which that of the nightingale is the oldest. True, seven collections were ascribed to Aesop, but without proof, and usually their content goes still farther back into antiquity, to early Indian tellers of tales or even to Egyptian poets of the fourteenth century B C.

One explanation of the infrequent references to the Greek beast fables is that they were so well known that nobody bothered to mention them. The interesting thing is that Aesop has been called "Father of the Animal Fable," even though the form had existed cen tunes before his assumed time

Seventy years ago, Joseph Jacobs, an English investigator engaged in cataloguing fables attributed to Aesop, gave as good an answer as any. Before the time of Aesop, these stories, regarded as jokes, were told for amusement. Aesop, by his use of them, as Aristotle acknowledged, raised them in dignity to the ranks of serious oratorical material, worthy of use when a life was at stake and, if deductions about the cause of his death be correct, taken seriously enough to cause the death of their author.

Ninety-seven of the fables attributed to Aesop composed the first book printed in English with initial letters, printed by William Caxton at Westminster in 1484. Only one perfect copy remains, in the possession of the Queen of England. Others, damaged, are found in the Bodleian Library and the British Museum. The rest were probably as popular as Aesop's fables today and were read to pieces. The tales were equally popular in other lands. In 1496, the Infante Henrique made a Spanish translation that inspired Tomás Inarte (1750-1791) and his contemporary Samaniego to versify fables memorized by every Spanish school child. Marie de France, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, put more than a hundred of them into French, antedating what has probably been the most elegant form in which they have ever appeared, the twelve books of Fables written in verse by Jean de La Fontaine (1668-1694).

"Esope, man of Greece," explained William Caxton in 1484, "subtyll and ingenyous, techeth in his fables how men ought to kepe and rewle them well. And to thende that he shold shewe the lyf and customes of al maner of men, he induceth the byrdes, the trees, and the bestes spekyng to thende that the men may know wherfore the fables were found the whiche yf thou rede them, they shalle aguyse and sharpe thy wytte and shal gyve to thee Cause of Joye.' Then follow the fables, in their crude Gothic type and quaint spelling, each illustrated by a grotesque woodcut.

First comes the fable of the cock and the precious stone, in which the bird, discovering a diamond in the filth, saw no possible use for it. The fable writer ends with the implication that those who see no wisdom in 'this fayre and playsaint book,' are as stupid as the cock. The second tells of the wolf who accused the lamb of enough crimes for an excuse to eat him. The fifth deals with the greedy dog crossing the stream with meat in his mouth and trying to snap up also the piece he saw reflected in the water.

Part II begins with the famous fable of the frogs who asked Jupiter for a king and ends with the story of the frog who tried to swell up to equal the size of the ox. Book III contains the fable of the nightingale to whose nest the "sparre hawk" came with the demand that the songster entertain him; otherwise, he would eat one of the little birds. But a hunter came by and caught the mauler. This story follows a set form. It begins: "He that oppresseth the Innocent shalle have an evyle end whercof Esope reherceth to us such a fable." At the end the story restates the moral: "And therefore he that doth harm and letteth the Innocent is worthy to dye of evylle dethe, as Cayn dyd which slewe his broder Abel."

This is the formula of all the fables in this ancient volume, the forerunner of so many editions that have appeared throughout the centuries with or without their morals stated, to delight readers who know nothing about Aesop himself and care even less.

Critique

This novel, written in the first person, is the account of the tribulations of a poor governess trying to achieve respectability and independence in nineteenth century England. Agnes Grey, a governess because of economic necessity, finds the people among whom she works either bleak or frivolous representatives of the upper classes. They are neither understanding nor helpful, and Agnes, saddled with impossibly arrogant charges, is not a great success as a governess. Fortified by a loving though poor family and by an irreproachable character, she eventually marries the sterling and attractive clergyman Agnes. Agnes is the sentimental heroine, and the plot is not to be distinguished from that of the conventional sentimental romance. The good and the true ultimately triumph, the evil and the frivolous are ultimately unhappy. In spite of Agnes' pious sentiments, however, the novel is marked by sharp observations of contemporary life and a gentle and penetrating sarcasm in some of Agnes' comments on her employers. Anne Brontë never became an important novelist, but this novel suggests her ability lay more in the direction of Jane Austen than in that of her sister Emily.

The Story

Mrs Grey, a squire's daughter, had offended her family by marrying for love a poor parson in the north of England. She bore him six children, but only two, Mary and Agnes, survived. Nevertheless, the Greys were happy with their humble, educated, pious life in their small house and garden.

Mr Grey, never wholly at his ease because his wife had been forced to give up carriages and fine clothes in order to marry him, attempted to improve their fortunes by speculating and investing his patrimony in a merchant's sea voyage. But the vessel was wrecked, everything was lost, and the Greys were soon left penniless. In addition, Mr Grey's health, never robust, began to fail more perceptibly under the strain of his guilt for bringing his family close to ruin. Mary and Agnes, reared in the sheltered atmosphere of a clergyman's household, had spent their time reading, studying, and working in the garden. When the family situation became desperate, however, Mary began to try to sell her drawings to help with the household expenses, and Agnes, the younger daughter, decided to become a governess.

Overcoming the qualms her family felt at the idea of her leaving home, Agnes found a situation and on a bleak and windy autumn day, arrived at Wellwood the home of the Bloomfield family. She was received rather coldly by Mrs. Bloomfield and told that her charges, especially Tom, a seven-year-old boy, were noble and splendid children. She soon found that the reverse was true. Tom was an arrogant and disobedient little monster whose particular delight was to pull the legs and wings off young sparrows. Mary Ann, his six-year-old sister, was given to tantrums of temper and refusal to do her lessons. The children were frightened of their father, a peevish and stern disciplinarian, and the father, in turn, blamed Agnes when the children, as frequently happened, got out of control.

Agnes found it impossible to teach the children anything because all her efforts to discipline them were undermined by Mrs. Bloomfield, who felt that her angels must always be right. Even four-year-old Fanny lied consistently and was fond of spitting in people's faces. For a time, Agnes was heartened by Mr. Bloomfield's mother's visit, but the pious old lady turned out to be a hypocrite who sympathized with Agnes verbally and then turned on her behind her back.

Matters became a great deal worse with the visit of Uncle Robson, Mrs. Bloomfield's brother, who encouraged young Tom to torture small animals. One day, after he had collected a whole brood of young birds for Tom to torture, Agnes crushed them with a large stone, choosing to kill them quickly rather than to see them suffer a slow, cruel death. The family felt she had deprived Tom of his normal, spirited pleasure. Shortly after this incident she was told that her services would no longer be required, the Bloomfields felt that she had not disciplined the children properly or taught them very much.

Agnes spent a few months with her family at home before taking up her next post. She found the Murrays the owners of Horton Lodge, more sophisticated wealthier, and less bleak and cruel than the owners of Wellwood, but they were still hardly the happy, pious, warm family that Agnes had hoped to encounter. Her older charge, Rosalie, was sixteen, very pretty, interested only in flirting and in eventually making the most suitable marriage possible, her younger charge, Matilda, fourteen, was interested only in horses and stables. Although they treated her with politeness, neither girl had any respect for the learning and piety that Agnes had to offer. If Agnes' work was less unpleasant than it had been at Wellwood, it was equally futile.

After living at Horton Lodge for nearly a year, Agnes returned home for a month for her sister's wedding. During this time, the Murrays had given Rosalie a coming-out ball, after which she began to exercise her charms on the young men at Horton. Agnes was shocked, when she returned, to find Rosalie flirting with all the men and summarizing the marital possibilities of each with such a hardened and materialistic eye. In the meantime a new curate had come to Horton. Edward Weston was a sober and sincere churchman, neither climbing nor pompous like the rector, Mr. Hatfield. Edward Weston and Agnes, attracted to each other, found many opportunities to meet in their sympathetic visits to Nancy Brown, an old widow who was almost blind. At first Rosalie found Weston both dogmatic and dull, but Agnes found him representative of the true piety and goodness which she believed were the qualities of a clergyman. Rosalie, continuing to play the coquette, conquered first the unctuous rector, Mr. Hatfield, and then after Mr. Hatfield had proposed and been quickly rejected, turned her charms on Mr. Weston. Although Agnes was fiercely jealous of Rosalie's flirtation, she never really acknowledged her own growing love. Finally, Rosalie accepted Sir Thomas Ashby, his home, Ashby Park, and his fortune were the largest in the vicinity of Horton.

Shortly after Rosalie's marriage, before Agnes had the opportunity to see much of Edward Weston, she was called home by the death of her father. She and her mother decided to start a school for young ladies in the fashionable watering place of A——. Although Agnes returned to Horton Lodge for another month, she did not see Weston before she resignedly left to rejoin her mother. Although the school began to prosper after a few months, Agnes still seemed weary and depressed, and she welcomed an invitation from Rosalie, now Lady Ashby, to visit Ashby Park. She found Rosalie disappointed in her marriage to a grumbling, boorish man who ignored her and who, after a honeymoon on the Continent, had forbidden her the frivolous pleasures of London and European society. Agnes also learned from Rosalie that Weston had left Horton a short time before.

A few days after Agnes returned to her mother and the school, she was walking along the water front one morning when she was surprised by Weston. He had secured a living in a nearby village. He promptly began calling on Agnes and her mother and as time passed gained Agnes' love and her mother's esteem. One day, while walking with Agnes to the top of a high hill, he proposed. As husband, father, clergyman, and manager of a limited income, he was in after years the perfect mate for virtuous and worthy Agnes.

Al filo del agua is a Spanish phrase with two meanings, one literal, the other figurative. Literally, it signifies the moment that the rain begins. However, it is in its figurative sense that it takes on meaning as the title of this book: the imminence of something that is about to happen. The event about to take place was brought on by a growing dissatisfied faction with the political situation and the unnaturalness of the environment imposed by the Church as reflected by life in a small town in Mexico.

In 1910, Porfirio Díaz had been dictator of Mexico for more than thirty years. He had ruled with an iron hand and only now had the dream of political freedom and social improvement begun to filter through to the many semi-isolated towns of Mexico. The same few families had always been the social leaders and political bosses in the communities and Díaz' thirty odd years of rule had done nothing to lessen this strangle hold or to improve the lot of the common man. Education was nonexistent except for the privileged few, and superstition was rampant.

Another force which held the people in its grip was the Church, a circumstance especially true in rural areas where the long arm of Juárez' 1859 Reform Laws seldom reached. These laws had greatly reduced the political power of the Church, and such things as processions and public religious festivities were forbidden. In the small towns however, with the ever present threat of arrest hanging over their heads, the priests often continued their regular clerical activities in spite of the law.

Agustín Yañez has painted against this background a series of character studies portraying the effects of a narrow and rigid as well as dull and conventional life on people of different ages, with varying degrees of education and exposure to outside influences. (These influences, being outside ones and therefore bad, make up a long and varied list, and include such things as Free Masonry, bright clothing, strangers, uncensored written material, fun, spiritualists, people who had been to the United States, the list could go on and on.) Yañez creates a sense of monotonous semi gloom with the sure hand of an artist who has experienced this kind of life himself at one time or another. The fictitious, but very typical, town in which the action takes place is set in the state of Jalisco, of which the author is a native.

Each morning the church bells in this town call the people out of their beds as early as four o'clock to begin another dreary, quiet, prayerful day. Life is very serious. The women wear dark somber colors and do not leave the house except to go to church or to do necessary errands. There is no visiting except in the case of extreme illness or a death in the house of a neighbor. There is little laughter, dancing, or singing. Strangers and strangers are not only suspect, but already condemned. Nonconformity, even in small things, starts tongues wagging. At the end of each unvarying day, the church bells send the people to bed in an act which for many means the onset of sleepless hours or wrestling with guilty consciences and with wondering when and in what form God's wrath will be brought down upon their heads.

With this daily pattern providing the atmosphere broken only by funerals, special fiesta days, and an occasional scandal, the action in the story begins as the people are preparing for their Lenten and Easter activities. The panorama of people and events proceeds on through the year, displaying the special religious days of June, the expected deaths, illnesses, and bad luck of August, the celebration of patriotic holidays in September, the scandalous pranks of the students home for vacation in November, the Christmas season with its festivities, and continues on into the New Year, at which time the people are awaiting the appearance of Halley's Comet. This event is being anticipated so intently by Lucas Muñiz, the soothsayer, that the rest of the people do well to prepare for trouble, for Lucas has from the start associated the appearance of this comet with the stepping onto the scene of Francisco Madero, the man who is to lead the revolution against the tyranny of Díaz.

The person who can most nearly be described as the main character is Don Dionisio, the stern and upright, but just and compassionate parish priest. He alone touches in some way upon the lives of all the other characters in the book. His main ecclesiastical help comes from two assistant priests who present a vivid contrast to each other, one, Padre Reyes, being liberal and forward looking, the other, Padre Islas, narrow and conservative beyond belief. Although Padre Reyes is much more likable, it is Padre Islas, scurrying along the street from church to home so as to avoid meeting his parishioners on a personal basis, who wields more influence on the lives of the townspeople, for it is he who directs the organization to which all the unmarried girls belong. Into their minds he instills the urgent need to stay pure by remaining single, and he imbues them with a sense of guilt for even thinking wholesome thoughts connected with the opposite sex. This narrow man will never use the chapel of the Holy Family, but always the chapel of the Virgin Mary, and Padre Reyes, the other assistant, is not above teasing him by asking if he thinks Maria and Juan will make a nice couple, or if he is aware that Mercedes is just about ready to make someone a good wife. These questions are calculated to enrage Padre Islas. Padre Reyes, with his modern ideas about such things as life insurance—too far removed from the imaginations of the people to be noticed—is largely ignored, while Padre Islas is revered as a saint beyond the temptations and afflictions of ordinary man. Great is the disillusionment when the good Father Islas is found collapsed on the floor of the church in a fit of epilepsy, which results in his having to be removed permanently from the priesthood. The archbishop had chosen wisely when Don Dionisio was made head priest, with the authority for making final decisions, for he approaches the problems of his parishioners with the best elements of the philosophies of his two assistants—an urgent sense of responsibility for their souls accompanied by a forgiving and understanding heart.

Two other personalities who present a study in contrasts are María and Marta, the orphaned nieces of Don Dionisio, who has reared them since they were very small. At the time the story begins they are in their twenties, unmarried, and on the verge of taking opposite paths in life. Marta, the contented, with her love for children, her work in the hospital, and other gentle occupations, is the ideal end product of the social and religious forces at work in her environment. María, the rebellious, who has always read forbidden literature (The Three Musketeers and newspapers from the capital) behind her uncle's back, and who finally runs away with a woman of very questionable reputation to follow the revolutionary army, is a creature of reaction against this unnatural environment.

What happened to Maria happens with variations, to nearly all the young people who have had contact in any way with the outside world. Luis Gonzaga Perez, a young and talented seminary student, is unable to reconcile his inhibitions concerning the opposite sex with his natural desires, and at the end of the novel he is drawing lewd pictures on the walls of his room in the insane asylum.

Damian Limon, young son of a fairly prosperous landowner, leaves home, like the prodigal son, and goes to the United States to work. Upon his return home, when criticized for going to such a sinful place where Mexicans are treated like dogs, he counters by stating that at least they are paid in money instead of in promises, as in Mexico. Damian becomes scandalously involved in a flagrant love affair and kills the girl, after having just caused his father to have a fatal heart attack over an argument about his father's will. A corrupt political boss has a disgracefully light sentence placed upon him and, at the end of the story, he rides away to join the ranks of the revolutionaries.

The parents of Micaela Rodriguez, a spoiled only child, make the mistake of taking her to Mexico City for a few months. There she sees the parties, pretty clothes, and merriment of the capital's young people. Never again is she satisfied to stay in her dreary home town and, failing to force her parents to move away to a gay place, she threatens vengeance on the environment that binds her and shocks the town to its roots with her shameless flirting and indecent dress. She ends up being stabbed by a jealous lover, but dies forgiving him and putting the blame for her death on her own actions.

Doubt seems to be the villain that causes the downfall of these unfortunate young people. They have tasted of the world, compared it with their narrow surroundings, and found them wanting. Being few in number, these unlucky ones have fallen under the weight of a relentless social system that brooks no questioning.

But the time is near at hand when many doubters will join together with enough force to make a crack in this teetering wall of hypocrisy, a crack which will ever become wider as education and enlightenment seep through. And in this thought is captured the essence of the title, Al filo del agua.

Agustín Yáñez has given us an unprejudiced and intricately detailed view of life in a Mexican town just after the turn of the century. The purpose of the book is not a call to arms to reform, but to present an understanding, not necessarily sympathetic, but always touching story.

Critique

All Fools is one of Chapman's best comedies. A successful adaptation to the English stage of material from two Terentian comedies, it lacks the weakness in plot construction that mars several of his plays. Delightful comic situations are developed through his deft handling of the complicated intrigue. The major characters, although based on traditional types, are individualized, and their actions, except in the final act, are skillfully motivated.

Gostanzo fancied himself a man of true worldly wisdom. He loved money, relished his neighbor's misfortunes, and was unhampered by any petty scruples about honesty. Aware of the temptations that might lead a young man to become a waster, he had taken great care in rearing his son Valerio. He had lectured the boy on the importance of thrift and, to teach him responsibility, made him an over-seeer. But Valerio was also a man of worldly wisdom. Although he put on the appearance of industry and innocence in front of his father, he was well acquainted with the gentlemanly activities of dining, drinking, and wenching. He had, as the result of these pursuits, accumulated a respectable number of debts. To cap his sins, he had now married Gratiana, a girl with beauty but no dowry.

Fortunio was a young man of quite different character. Without parading his virtue, he led an upright life and was a dutiful son. In love with Valerio's sister Bellanora, he was not permitted to court her because Gostanzo was seeking a wealthier son-in-law. Fortunio's brother Rinaldo, having experienced the fickle

ness of women, was through with love and now devoted himself exclusively to cozenage of others

One day, when Rinaldo, Fortunio, Valerio, and Gratiana were together talking, they sighted Gostanzo coming their way, and all but Rinaldo rushed off. In answer to Gostanzo's questions, Rinaldo said that Gratiana was the wife of Fortunio, who dared not tell his father of the marriage. Gostanzo believed the lie. Although he promised to keep it secret, he nevertheless revealed it the minute he was alone with Marc Antonio, the father of Fortunio and Rinaldo. Acting on Rinaldo's suggestion, Gostanzo recommended that Fortunio and Gratiana be installed in his home. Marc Antonio accepted this offer, not because he was angry with his son, but because Gostanzo had convinced him that Fortunio was in danger of falling victim to greater evils. With the restraining influence of the strict Gostanzo and the good example of Valerio, he might still be saved.

Rinaldo's scheming thus enabled Valerio and his wife to live in the same house, and it also gave Fortunio a chance to pursue his courtship of Bellanora. When Gratiana was brought to Gostanzo's home, the old man told Valerio to kiss her, but the crafty youth feigned shyness. The father, gratified by this manifestation of a strict upbringing, congratulated himself on being a much better parent than the easy-going Marc Antonio.

Later, however, Gostanzo found Valerio embracing and kissing Gratiana. The old man, still not suspecting the true state of affairs, thought merely that his son was a fast learner. He decided that, to avoid mischief, Gratiana and Fortunio would have to leave his house. When he told Rinaldo of this development, Rinaldo suggested that his father be told that Gratiana was really Valerio's wife and that Marc Antonio now take her into his house. Rinaldo further advised that, in order to make the ruse effective, Valerio be permitted to visit her there. The plan met with the ready assent of Gostanzo, who, being innocently gulled, was happy in the thought that he would be gulling Marc Antonio.

Meanwhile, Rinaldo, encouraged by his success in this project, had been directing his genius to a new endeavor, a plan intended to gull Cornelio, an indomitably jealous husband who was an easy mark for a trickster and whose wife Gazetta complained that he brought home gallants and then upbraided her for being in their company. Rinaldo's accomplice in his scheme was Valerio, who had been angered at Cornelio for making fun of his singing. Valerio had little difficulty in awakening the jealousy in Cornelio. With the help of a page who defamed Gazetta on the grounds that women's wantonness was a result of weakness and not design, he so infuriated Cornelio that the jealous husband attacked and wounded his wife's supposed lover.

When Marc Antonio was told that Valerio, not Fortunio, was married to Gratiana, he made merry with Gostanzo for his blind pride. The latter, unable to tolerate gloating other than his own, declared that the plot had been contrived for entertainment. When they met Valerio, Gostanzo feigned extreme anger with him and threatened to disown his son Valerio, playing the penitent, protested his devotion to his father and avowed his love of Gratiana. Gostanzo, believing the whole affair a joke, disguised an appearance of being softened and gave his blessing to the match.

Cornelio, meanwhile, had procured a notary and was proceeding with the divorce of his wife. A nosebleed, which he took as an omen, caused him to suspend action just as he was preparing to sign the final papers. After the notary left, a friend explained to him that he had been tricked into his jealousy by Rinaldo and Valerio. Cornelio resolved to repay them with a deception of his own.

When Cornelio found Rinaldo, he told this master trickster that Valerio had been arrested for debts. Since Valerio had been dodging the officials for some time, Rinaldo believed the lie and, having gone on bond for Valerio, he felt that some immediate action was unnecessary. At Cornelio's suggestion, he took Gostanzo with him to the Half Moon Tavern, where Cornelio said Valerio was being held before being taken to prison. Valerio was at the tavern, but not as a captive. Instead, he was engaged in his usual pursuits of drinking and playing dice.

When Gostanzo saw his son's true nature and also learned that Valerio really was married to Gratiana, he threatened, this time in earnest, to disown the boy and to settle his estate on his daughter. But this plan was rejected when he discovered that Bellanora had married Fortunio. The old man, frustrated in his efforts to control events, decided to accept them. Finally, when Cornelio revealed that his jealousy had been feigned in order to restrain his wife's high spirits, the reconciliations were complete and happiness reigned in the Half Moon Tavern.

All Men Are Brothers translated by Pearl Buck, was published in the United States in 1933. She supplied the present English title, which is a translation of a saying by Confucius because she felt that the Chinese title, the Shui Hu Chuan (literally, "water margins novel"), conveyed little meaning. The stories which make up the plot originated many years before the novel as a whole was composed and probably have some basis in fact. The version chosen by the translator is the shortest, omitting the spurious chapters telling of the robbers' downfall. It runs to well over 1,200 eventful pages, and the reader is likely to be appalled by the enormous number of characters he must keep in mind, 108 named chieftains form the band at the close of the book. The plot outline which follows can convey very little of the extraordinary bloodthirstiness of these "good fellows," who slaughter entire households of their enemies, who occasionally indulge in cannibalism, and whose reasons for becoming outlaws are not always noble. But the characters are vividly portrayed, the story is always interesting, and all is presented with the greatest realism and vigor. Long attributed to Shih Nai an, many scholars now claim that Lo Kuan chung may well be the author, or that the real author is unknown.

To escape the persecution of evil Commander Kao, a military instructor fled to the borders. On the way he instructed a village lord's son, Shih Chin, in warlike skills. Later Shih Chin became friendly with the robbers of Little Hua Mountain. Discovery of this alliance forced Shih Chin to flee.

He fell in with Captain Lu Ta and Li Chung Lu Ta, after killing a pig butcher who was persecuting a girl, escaped capture by becoming priest Lu Chi Shen. But his violence and intemperance forced the abbot to send him to another temple. On the way he made peace between a village lord and the robbers of Peach Blossom Mountain, now led by Li Chung.

Shih Chin joined the robbers of Little Hua Mountain. Lu Chi Shen went on to his temple, where he became a friend of military instructor Ling Ch'ung. Because Commander Kao's son lusted for Ling Ch'ung's wife, Ling Ch'ung was falsely accused of murder, branded, and exiled to Ch'ang Chou. His guards were prevented by Lu Chi Shen from carrying out their secret orders to kill Ling Ch'ung. Again on his way, Ling Ch'ung was hospitably received by Lord Ch'ai Chin.

In Ch'ang Chou, Ling Ch'ung accidentally escaped a death trap and killed his three would-be assassins. Again he encountered Ch'ai Chin, who sent him to take refuge in Liang Shan P'o, a robbers' lair headed by ungracious Wang Lun.

Warrior Yang Chi, after killing a bully, was branded and sent to be a border guard. His skill delighted Governor Liang of Peking, who kept and promoted him and even selected him to transport rich birthday gifts to Liang's father-in-law. To rid the way of robbers, Chu T'ung and Lei Heng were sent out ahead of the party carrying the treasures. Lei Heng captured drunken Liu T'ang and took him to Lord Ch'ao Kai, but the lord arranged his release on privately discovering that Lei Heng had come to seek him. Lei Heng brought the news of the birthday gifts, which he, Ch'ao Kai and a teacher, Wu Yung, then plotted to steal. Magician Kung Sun Sheng and the three Juan brothers joined them.

The plotters cleverly drugged Yang Chi and his disguised soldiers and stole the treasure. Yang Chi in despair left the others, who resolved to throw the guilt on him. Yang Chi fell in with Lu Chi Shen, they went to Double Dragon Mountain and, overcoming the robber chief who refused to admit them, became the leaders of the band.

When Ch'ao Kai was discovered to have been one of the robbers, plans were made to catch him, but with the aid of scribe Sung Chiang and of robber catcher Chu T'ung, Ch'ao Kai and the others escaped to Liang Shan P'o. Ling Ch'ung killed the ungracious Wang Lun, and Ch'ao Kai was made the chief. Ling Ch'ung discovered that his wife had killed herself to escape the advances of Commander Kao's son. The robbers vanquished two groups sent against them.

Sung Chiang's connection with the robbers was discovered by his unfaithful mistress. Enraged at her blackmail threats, he killed her and escaped to Ch'ai Chin's village. There he met Wu Sung, who was on his way to see his older brother after a long absence.

Wu Sung killed a tiger and was greatly feted. He was of heroic size, his brother was puny and small. The latter's wife tried unsuccessfully to seduce Wu a lover and with his help killed her husband. Wu Sung returned, and killed the pair. Though generally pitied, he was branded and exiled.

After an eventful journey, Wu Sung defended his jailer's son against a usurper and so offended the tyrant that he plotted with General Chang to accuse Wu Sung falsely of a crime. Wu Sung killed the plotters and joined those at Double Dragon Mountain.

Sung Chiang, going to visit a military magistrate, Hua Yung, was captured by the robbers of the Mountain of Clear Winds but they recognized and welcomed him. One of them, lustful Wang The Dwarf Tiger captured the wife of a civil magistrate, Liu Kao. Thinking to please Hua Yung, Sung Chiang persuaded Wang to release her. Later the woman, a troublemaker, identified Sung Chiang as one of the robbers. Sung Chiang and Hua Yung escaped to the Mountain of Clear Winds, and Liu Kao was killed.

General Ch'ing Ming came against these robbers and was captured. Their plot to force him to join their band was successful. Liu Kao's wife, recaptured, was executed. Sung Chiang promised to get a wife for the disappointed Wang The Dwarf Tiger. The whole band decided to join those at Liang Shan P'o, but Sung Chiang was summoned home for the burial of his father. The report of his father's death turned out to be, however, a trick to keep Sung Chiang from turning outlaw. Persuaded to stand trial for his mistress' murder, he was branded and exiled. The trip was very eventful, involving many near escapes in encounters with robbers who later proved friendly. At his destination Sung Chiang became a friend of his gaoler, Tai Chung, who possessed magic enabling him to walk three hundred miles a day. Another friend, violent but loyal Li K'uei, caused much trouble which Sung Chiang was able to smooth over. One day Sung Chiang became drunk.

Tai Chung, sent to a distant city to get execution orders, went instead to Liang Shan P'o, where a letter was forged freeing Sung Chiang. But a mistake made in the seal resulted in Tai Chung's death sentence also. Both were freed from the execution grounds by the robbers. All went back to Liang Shan P'o, enlarging their group with additional robbers recruited along the way.

Sung Chiang set out to bring his father and brother to the robbers' lair. He was miraculously saved from capture by a temple goddess who gave great prophecies. The robbers took the Sung family to the lair. Kung Sun Sheng and Li K'uei went out to get their old mothers.

On his journey Li K'uei killed a false robber who pretended to be himself, but the impostor's wife escaped. Li K'uei's mother, on the return journey, was killed by tigers. Li K'uei killed the tigers but when he went to receive the reward money, the impostor's wife identified him and he was captured. Another of the band freed him, however, and they returned to Liang Shan P'o.

Shih Hsiu opened a meat shop with the help of Official Yang Hsiung. Shih Hsiu discovered adultery between Yang Hsiung's wife and a priest. They killed the adulterers and escaped. Later they fell in with a thief, Shih Ch'ien, who caused a row and was captured in the village of Chu. In Liang Shan P'o the robbers planned warfare against the Chu village, the others were at last victorious. Li K'uei, ignoring a pact between the robbers and the Hu village, killed all the members of the Hu household except the female warrior, The Ten Foot Green Snake, who had previously been captured by the robbers. Later she joined the robbers and married Wang The Dwarf Tiger.

Robber catcher Lei Heng, after killing a courtesan, was allowed to escape to Liang Shan P'o by Robber catcher Chu T'ung, who was, consequently, exiled.

However, he pleased the magistrate, who liked to have Chu T'ung look after his little son. By killing the little boy the robbers forced Chu T'ung to join them.

Li K'uei and Ch'ai Chin went to right a wrong. Ch'ai Chin was captured and the robbers attempting to free him were repelled by their enemies' magic. Kung Sun Sheng, now a hermit, was sent for, his magic finally enabled the robbers to overcome the enemy and free Ch'ai Chin.

A fresh advance planned by Commander Kao against the robbers resulted in many useful additions to Liang Shan P'o when enemy leaders were captured and persuaded to change allegiance. The robbers of Double Dragon, Peach Blossom, and Little Hua Mountains, after some difficulties of capture and escape, joined those at Liang Shan P'o.

A stolen horse intended for Sung Chiang had been stolen again by the Chun family. Instructor Shi Wen Kung, now possessor of the horse, boasted that he would destroy the robbers. Chief Ch'ao Kai, while leading his men, was mortally wounded. Dying, he asked that whoever should capture Shi Wen Kung be named the new chief. A long period of mourning followed.

Rich and respected Lu Chun I was enticed to Liang Shan P'o in hopes that he would join them. Returning, he was arrested and imprisoned as a robber. His steward, now in possession of his wife and goods, plotted to have Lu Chun I killed. Many events followed, including the near death of Sung Chiang, but finally the city was taken. The prisoners were freed and the adulterers killed. Lu Chun I refused Sung Chiang's offer to make him the chief.

The robbers captured additional soldiers sent against them and added many of the leaders to their ranks. Ch'ao Kai's death was finally avenged in the conquest of the Chun family and of Shi Wen Kung, whose actual captor was Lu Chun I, who still refused to become the chief. Since all the robbers wished Sung Chiang to remain the leader, he prepared a test. He and Lu Chun I each led a group against one of the two cities remaining to be taken. The first to take his city would be the chief. After some reverses, Sung Chiang was successful. He then went to the aid of Lu Chun I, who had been twice vanquished by warrior Chang Ch'ing. This general, finally overcome, was persuaded to join the outlaws. Sung Chiang received a heavenly message in the form of a miraculous stone tablet which listed all thirty-six greater and seventy-two lesser chieftains who made up the robber band. All swore undying loyalty, wishing to be united forever, life after life.

"The best of all books of this kind and unique in its art" was the description of Amadis de Gaul put by Cervantes into the mouth of Don Quixote. It had many competitors. Besides thirteen other versions in fifty years, dozens of other romantic tales of knights errant were written after the fifteenth century. Garcí Ordoñez (or Rodríguez) de Montalvo, Mayor of Medina del Campo, found a three volume novel in Portuguese by Lobeira, and, according to his testimony, "corrected the original—corrupt and composed in old style—and took out superfluous words and substituted others more polished and elegant," thus producing a piece of effulgent Renaissance prose. Scholars have disputed the identity of the Lobeira who wrote the version found by Montalvo, a manuscript reportedly seen in the library of the Duke of Alveiro as late as 1750, but destroyed, perhaps, along with the library, in the Lisbon earthquake of 1755. João de Lobeira flourished between 1258 and 1285. Vasco de Lobeira, knighted in the battle of Aljubarrota in 1385, could not have been born until after 1350, the year in which a book containing a reference to Amadis was circulated in Seville. If Vasco de Lobeira was the author of Montalvo's source, he must have based the work on an earlier story. But regardless of who wrote the first long prose novel with a single hero in modern European literature, Montalvo rewrote it and, adding a fourth part, produced the only surviving version of this long drawn out tale with an unreal plot believable only to those who lived in a rapidly expanding and newly explored world where anything might be credible. Certainly the Montalvo version is superior to its many sequels in which giants became taller, wild beasts fiercer, and magicians more powerful. Glorifying the ideals of chivalry, the story had great influence on the manners and thinking, and of course the literature, of its time.

Not many years after the passion of Christ there lived in Lesser Britain a Christian king named Garinther. His older daughter was married to the King of Scotland. The younger daughter, Elisena, found none of her suitors attractive until the day her father brought home King Perion of Gaul, whom Garinther had watched defeat two powerful knights and kill a lion. The scheming of Elisena's attendant, Darioleta, allowed the young people to meet secretly in the royal garden. King Perion departed ten days later without knowing the results of their nights of love.

When Elisena's son was born, Darioleta concealed her mistress' indiscretion by putting him into an ark, along with his father's sword and ring, and a parchment declaring the boy to be "the timeless Amadis, son of a king." She set the ark afloat in the river beside the palace; it drifted out to sea where it was found by a knight, Gandales, who was on a voyage to Scotland. Gandales, who brought up the foundling with his son Gandálm, called the boy "Child of the Sea."

Gandales, riding through the woods when the boy was three, rescued Urganda, an enchantress who was being pursued by a knight. The grateful witch, after prophesying that the adopted boy would become the flower of knighthood, the most honorable warrior in the world, promised to aid him should he ever need her help.

When the boy was seven, King Langunes of Scotland and his queen saw him and offered to bring him up at court. Five years later King Lisuarte and Queen Brisena paused in Scotland on their way to claim the throne of England. Until all was safe, they asked permission to leave behind their daughter Oriana. King Langunes appointed the "Child of the Sea" to be her squire.

The two children fell so deeply in love with each other that never again did they fall out of love, but they dared not let others know of their feelings. To be worthy of Oriana, Amadis determined to be knighted, and when King Perion visited Scotland to seek help against his enemy, King Abies of Ireland, Oriana asked her father's old friend to knight Amadis. The young knight then rode away in search of fame through adventures.

Urganda met him in the forest and gave him a lance with which he rescued King Perion from Irish knights. Though neither was aware of the blood relationship between them, Amadis swore always to aid King Perion in time of danger. Then followed a series of fantastic and extraordinary adventures, among them the encounter with haughty Galpano, whose custom was to stop and rob all who passed through his realm. Amadis defeated the bully and his two brothers, though in the battles he was so severely wounded that he had to be nursed back to health by a friendly noble.

Meanwhile, King Perion had married Elisena. Although they lamented their lost son, they took pleasure in a second son, Galaor. When King Abies sent an expedition against Gaul, Amadis overcame the Irish champion. In the celebration festivities at King Perion's court, the identity of Amadis was discovered through the ring he wore and King Perion proudly acknowledged his long-lost son.

Amadis remained melancholy, thinking himself unworthy to aspire to the daughter of the King of England. He did briefly visit her at Vindilsora (Windsor), only to be called away to rescue his brother Galaor. That summons was a trick of the enchanter Arcalaus, who cast a spell over the knight and disarmed him. When the villain appeared in the armor of Amadis and riding his horse, Oriana almost died. Only the timely news of further feats of arms by Amadis told her he was still alive, and so she was restored to health.

Oriana. Amadis and his brother, knighted by Amadis, rescued the princess, but in the absence of the king, the traitor Barsinan tried to seize Brisena and usurp the throne. Amadis, dressed in rusty armor, defeated the rebel, and when Oriana's father reappeared twelve days of feasting followed. Amadis, however, was no nearer to winning the hand of his beloved in spite of his great service to the king.

Continuing to seek knightly fame, Amadis and his friends sailed for the Firm Island, settled by Apolidón, son of the King of Greece, who had taken refuge there after eloping with the daughter of Emperor Siudan of Rome. Here was an enchanted arch through which only faithful lovers could pass. Beyond it was a marriage chamber guarded by invisible knights. After his arrival in that land, Amadis received a note from Oriana, who had believed the lying charges of unfaithfulness made against him by a malignant dwarf. She had signed herself as a damsel pierced through the heart by the sword of Amadis.

His ecstasy of grief upon reading the note and his withdrawal, under the name of Beltenebros (The Fair Forlorn One) to the hermitage at the Poor Rock, convinced Oriana that she had wronged him. However, there was nothing she could do to right matters, for King Lisuarte had given her in marriage to the Emperor of Rome.

When a fleet from Rome took her away, Amadis, calling himself The Greek Knight, defeated it and returned Oriana to her father, asking only that she be protected against further misalliances. King Lisuarte decided to punish such effrontery by an attack on Firm Island, a decision that ranged the knights of the world on two sides. King Lisuarte enlisted the help of the Emperor of Rome. Amadis visited the Emperor of Constantinople and sent a messenger to the King of Bohemia. Arcalaus, hating both Amadis and King Lisuarte, encouraged King

Aravigo to march with his army and prey on both sides

When the hosts assembled for the battle King Gasquillán of Sweden sent a personal challenge to Amadis to meet him in single combat between the lines. The king's overthrow was the signal for a general onslaught that lasted for two days, until at last the death of the Emperor of Rome disheartened and routed his army.

Out of affection for Oriana, Amadis did not pursue the defeated host, but

King Aravigo took this opportunity to plunder the followers of King Lisuarte. A hermit, who had been trying to bring about peace among the combatants, sent the youthful Esplandian to take the news of King Lisuarte's distress to Amadis. The hero marched at once to the rescue of King Lisuarte, a kindness that wiped out the enmity between them. The marriage of Oriana and Amadis was solemnized on Firm Island. Afterward the couple passed under the Arch of True Love into the magic bridal chamber.

It is a fact that much influence was exerted on the written works of Jean Giraudoux by the physical productions of all but two of his plays in the theater of actor-director Louis Jouvet. Such a close and mutually advantageous association of managers or directors with a favorite playwright (or vice versa) has become an established pattern in the modern theater. Where highly personal directorial techniques and positive artifice exist in director and author, the published product is likely to contain much that the playwright never conceived in the original manuscript. The result is as it should be, not only living theater, but an art form embodying a power of ideas. In the partnership between Jouvet and Giraudoux, the actor respected and hallowed the poet. The happy circumstance of complete understanding between the writer's temperament and spirit and the actor's interpretative powers insured a rarity in the theater. Giraudoux wrote in a prose style that is practically verse, and the words roll from the tongues of actors with an ease and fluency that many writers strive for but few attain. Amphitryon 38, the second production of the Giraudoux-Jouvet collaboration, conclusively established Giraudoux as a playwright of great wit and dexterity.

The recasting of Greek myths into modern molds has long fascinated playwrights. Giraudoux's Amphitryon 38 may or may not be the thirty-eighth version of that legend. The whimsical title, implying that legends and myths belong to time, sets the mood for the capricious events of the play.

The Amphitryon legend tells us that Jupiter impersonated Amphitryon and gained admission to the bed of his wife Alkmene. From this encounter Hercules was born. On this familiar framework Giraudoux draws fresh character, weaves new plot structure, and imbues the play with wit and ideas impossible in the orig-

mal The result is a mixture of theology, high comedy, satire, farce, and matrimonial and political commentary

Basking on a cloud and spying on their victim, Jupiter and Mercury lay plans for the seduction of Alkmena as if preparing for a tasty banquet In order to remove Amphitryon from his bed chamber, Mercury suggests that Jupiter have the friendly Athenians declare war on Thebes Amphitryon, a stalwart general of the Theban army, will hurry to engage the enemy Mercury will then take the place of Sosie, a servant, and tell Alkmena that Amphitryon will momentarily desert the battle and return to her bed that very night Jupiter, of course, will impersonate Amphitryon and partake of the delectable Alkmena

Giraudoux's writings have long been concerned with the causes of war, opportunities for comment on the high level planning of war appear early in Amphitryon 38 and in most of his other plays Giraudoux leaves the sordid, clinical reporting of battle for his colleagues, he himself, in play after play, shows us the causes of conflict, frequently a startlingly inhuman cause which frighteningly illustrates the workings of political power

Jupiter arrives before the palace of Alkmena amidst a great clanging noise, for he has forgotten the laws of gravity in his descent With the help of Mercury he goes through some difficulty in transforming himself from the guise of a god to that of a mortal Giraudoux sets for himself the difficult task of showing Jupiter the god and Jupiter the mortal simultaneously, a device of dual identity he uses in many of his works

Mercury has already prepared the faithful wife for the return of Amphitryon to whom she has promised fidelity or suicide if she knowingly deceives him Jupiter whets his appetite for love by demanding admission to her bed as a lover, not as a husband It is not enough to love within the union of marriage—the added filip is to be the tantalizingly illegal husband seducer With guileless logic, Alkmena swears fidelity to her husband wife vows and refuses to open her gates and admit the false husband Jupiter to her chambers as a lover As her husband, however, he gains easy entry through the gates which had been unlocked all the while

Mercury thoughtfully holds back the dawn until Jupiter consummates the union, but he takes the precaution of informing the universe that Jupiter has made another mortal conquest so that the proper celestial eruptions will signify the seduction He also practices a caprice of his own and has the real Amphitryon leave the battle and return to Alkmena the next day This is only fair, for Jupiter as has been his practice, will reveal his true identity to Alkmena with the coming of dawn and take leave of her in a burst of ego satisfying, celestial glory

But Mercury and Jupiter have underestimated the power of Alkmena Giraudoux shows us here, as he does in other plays, his strong conviction that the female possesses a brand of intellect of an extraordinary nature, mere feminine wiles and physical beauty are but a means to an end, for the true power of logic and incisiveness belong in the female mind Alkmena without deliberation, but because she is a woman, is more than a match for Jupiter When dawn finally arrives, she is found on her patio placidly eating breakfast fruit while Jupiter, the traditional ravisher of innocent womanhood, lolls in the drowsy sensuality of her bed When he joins her, he tries to reveal his true identity, but he is thwarted at every turn by Alkmena's charming and unclouded humanistic approach to divinity There is a clarity and lack of religious fervency here that might pass for naivete But Giraudoux has more in mind than mere flippancy, Alkmena's childlike reasoning is the embodiment of utter simplicity and faithfulness in the kind, matter, and form of the gods It is a perfectly satisfying and workable theology, uncluttered by the implementalia of animistic practices

Jupiter, having satisfied his desires, and knowing that if his true identity is revealed Alkmena will kill herself and his unborn seed now wishes to whet his holy ego by paying a formal celestial visit to Alkmena, thereby legalizing their secret union. Mercury makes the official proclamation of the impending visit, and Leda, Queen of Sparta, who has had some previous knowledge of heavenly unions, pays a duty call on Alkmena. In the scene between the two women Giraudoux epitomizes his own simplicity and clarity of style. With wit and candor, Leda describes her encounter with the heavenly swan. There is no pretense or pomposity here, only statement of fact which becomes a kind of understatement that runs through all of Giraudoux's plays and is particularly apparent in his female characterizations. The expected is avoided, humor for its own sake and wit as a result of syntax. The comedy is the result of character rather than situation, but the situation produces the character.

Alkmena, having discovered that Leda longs for another encounter with Jupiter, persuades the queen to take her place in the bedchamber. Jupiter will visit her in the form of Amphitryon, for he has a habit of appearing in the form most desired by his earthly mates. Leda agrees, and the real Amphitryon arrives, is mistaken for Jupiter masquerading, and is sent into the palace. Only when Jupiter himself appears to Alkmena does she realize her mistake.

The resolution of the provocative situation is brought about by the resourceful Alkmena. Will Jupiter forego the celestial visit for which she is so evidently unprepared, and remain only friends with her? Jupiter quickly agrees to this strange relationship and assures the suspicious Alkmena that he has never visited her before—as her lover. Jupiter then gives his blessing to Alkmena and Amphitryon and bids them name their unborn child. Hercules. As a twinkling afterthought, he offers to be godfather to the child.

Amphitryon 38 may appear to the casual reader or spectator to be comedy that is witty, satirical, and playfully suggestive. In order to appreciate Giraudoux fully, it is necessary to look further for the social and political playwright. Giraudoux does not obscure his point, nor does he burden his audience with a message. Rather, he tantalizes with ideas craftily derived from situation, character, and language that joins the comedy of manners and the comedy of ideas.

If the distinction between traditional poetry and modern poetry is that the traditional attempts to tell about experiences and emotions (has its own subject matter) whereas the modern attempts to present experiences and emotions directly (is its own subject matter), then St. John Perse can be said to be both a traditional and a modern poet at the same time. His five long works—Éloges, Anabasis, Exile, Winds, and the recent and magnificent Seamarks—have been called “epics of the soul" But each has a more definite, a more tangible, subject matter than the soul itself Eloges, for example, is about childhood, Seamarks is a poem in praise of the sea, a majestic symbol enclosing the beginning, perhaps the end, of life

There is always a coherent system of solid reality behind what T S Eliot calls Perse's "logic of the imagination" The modernist surface of the poems may present what seem at first glance to be fascinatingly juxtaposed but apparently disconnected images brilliantly phrased but completely gratuitous declamations, catalogues of wonderful but bewilderingly selected things Below the surface, however, is a firm foundation of experience, as systematized and coherent as that of The Knight's Tale or Madame Bovary

In Perse's Anabasis this concreteness is perhaps more clearly seen, more palpably felt, than in any of his other poems Anabasis is, first of all, a modern poem, reminiscent in its technique of Rimbaud and of the French Symbolist school in general Relying on the "logic of imagination" rather than on the logic of discourse, it attempts to present experience directly But as we discover (through the impact of the images and through our resultant awareness of their symbolic meanings) the nature of the experience being presented, we realize that we are being told about an experience, as well Something is happening in an epic more than in the figurative sense of the word, and it is happening somewhere—in time and in a certain place

The place is important for at least two reasons It is the East not the romanticized Orient, not specifically the Far East or the Near East, but the wide expansive East of the great conquerors like Alexander, Tamerlane, Genghis Khan, the East of ancient ceremony, the age-old source of knowledge As such, it is important symbolically, for the experience presented is in one sense the experience of knowledge—of awareness, of contact with (or, perhaps more accurately, of a return to) reality A theme that runs through the poem is the theme of power, the power of knowledge—

The Sun is unmentioned but his power is amongst us and the sea at morning like a presumption of the mind

Et le soleil n'est point nommé, mais sa puissance est parmi nous et la mer au matin comme une présomp tion de l'esprit

There is also a recurrence of ceremony

The language is important for the clarity and immediacy of imagery that it allows the poet His scene is not the romantic East in any vague or misty sense For the East is familiar to St John Perse as fact It must be remembered that Perse the poet is also Alexis St Leger Leger, a leading French diplomat until the time of the German occupation during World War II As a diplomat he had spent the early part of his career in China There undoubtedly, the keen senses of the poet Perse took in the sights, sounds and ceremonial ways of that ancient land, the poet's sensibilities transmuting them into images that make up the texture of Anabasis and give the poem its strong feeling of reality of the East that underlines its theme of contact with the real

Anabasis stands firmly on the substrata of the poet's life in still another way and again these facts work themselves up to the symbolic surface of the poem. It is a story of a quest and of conquest and of the continuing cycle of these things for after two conquests the poem ends at the beginning of a new search. The quest, the military advance into the new country, from which the poem derives its name, is at its basic level the search for reality (Eliot's note, that the title is not an allusion to Xenophon but is used in a literal sense, bears repetition). The quest is the Rimbaudian search, but with a significant difference. For Perse, there is no descent into hell, there is sufficient reality for him above ground. To capture it, he must return to ancient ways and ceremonies, but the reality is there.

In this princeliness the essential difference between Perse and Rimbaud can be found. The poem begins, "Sur trois

grandes saisons m'établissant avec hon
neur, j'augure bien du sol où j'ai fondé ma loi"

I have built myself with honor and dignity have I built myself on three great seasons, and it promises well the soil whereon I have established my Law

The poet is the Prince, the lawgiver, the conqueror, the founder of cities. As the Prince, Perse can do in this poem the very things that Rimbaud had to leave his poetry to do. Just as there need be no descent, so there need be no flight from poetry into action. Perse's life has been a life of action, for him there has been only the necessity of distilling the experience of the action into poetry. Born on a family owned Caribbean island, he had been educated as an aristocrat whose destiny was to serve his state. His diplomatic career had been one of authority and responsibility, of power, decision, and restraint. These also go into the distillation. The poem is powerful yet restrained and it is about power, the conquest of those "living things, excellent things."

Thus, while Rimbaud had to descend into hell to find himself and had then to fly to primitivism to find reality, Perse knows himself already as the Prince and knows from experience, not so much the primitive, but the ceremonial and ancient. With these he turns to poetry to find the reality of that experience. Aside from obvious technical similarities—and in technique Perse owes much to Rimbaud, particularly in his use of "poetic prose," which is really poetry measured in terms of paragraphs rather than in terms of lines—the two are alike in their search but different in their means of searching. In this respect, it is Perse who is the true poet: the maker, serene, detached, anonymous.

In this sense, Anabasis is a poem by the Prince and is about the quest and conquest by the poet as the Prince. It is divided into ten parts. These parts were indicated in the original merely by Roman numerals but later they were given titles (actually brief synopses) by Lucien Fabre Part I, following the beautiful introductory "Song" ('Under the bronze leaves a colt was foaled') ("Il naissait un poulain sous les feuilles de bronze") deals with the "arrival of the Conqueror at the site of the city which he is about to build" The dominating symbols here are those of power, knowledge, and humanity the Sun, salt, and thirst

"Him who has not praised thirst and drunk the water of the sands from a sallet
I trust him little in the commerce of the soul

"Qui n'a louant la soif bu leau
des sables dans un casque je lui fais peu credit au commerce de lame

The next three parts—"Tracing the plan of the city," "Consultation of augurs," and "Foundation of the city"—are quieter ceremony and the business of living take the place of power

Come we are amazed at you, Sun!
You have told us such lies!

Va! nous nous étonnons de toi, Soleil!
Tu nous as dit de tels mensonges!

Gradually blended with the ceremony are discontentment and lust The city is good, and it has its own beauty, more beauty

plus beau
qu'une peau de belier peinte en rouge!

But the sense of reality is dulled by its business and shoddy ways

In Part V, "Restlessness towards further explorations and conquests," the symbols of knowledge and power begin to serve as counterpoint to those of city and ceremony They reassert themselves more in Parts VI and VII—"Schemes for foundation and conquest" and "Decision to fare forth"—in which a new, erotic theme is added Now the lust felt in the second part assumes new meaning Love joins power knowledge, humanity, the scented girls, who shall soothe us with a breath, silken webs

"parfumees, qui nous apaiseront d'un souffle, ces

join the Sun the Law, and Salt as dominant symbols These symbols give way for a time to those of desolation and dryness in Part VIII, "March through the desert", but they rise with new strength in the penultimate section, "Arrival at the threshold of a great new country" Here the erotic theme reaches its climax in a song reminiscent of the Song of Solomon in its voluptuous grandeur It is spoken by one of the women (perhaps the Princess) of the city which the Prince is about to capture, and with its note of physical union the triumphant union of all the themes and symbols is announced The poet prince, victorious over reality, sees the 'living things, excellent things' in a state of full awareness in the final section of the poem Ceremony, the occupations of the men of the city, serve with love, law, power to make awareness of reality complete, triumph unconditional

The first half of the final section is called "Acclamation, festivities, repose" The second adds, "Yet the urge towards departure, this time with the mariner" There is still more "out in the vast spaces" where the mariner plots the way This is the reality of the earth, but there is one more conquest to be made

There is more for the Prince, but the poem, with its look to the heavens, is complete The reader has watched the conquest and participated in it, he has been told about an experience and has had it presented directly, thanks to the Prince's knowledge and power

CLEARCHUS a Spartan exile a general under Cyrus

CHIRISOPHUS a Spartan mercenary captain

AGASIAS a Stymphalian captain in the Greek army

The Anabasis is Xenophon's personal account of one of the most amazing marches in history, the march of a Greek army numbering ten thousand men from Babylon to the Black Sea. Xenophon played a leading role in the march and was, in effect, supreme commander of the army, although he refused the actual title. This account of the Persian expedition begins with the recital of Cyrus' effort to wrest the Persian throne from his brother Artaxerxes, but its principal part is concerned with the march from Babylon after the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa. The narrative is lively and vivid; it presents a great historical event from the perspective of a humane leader who organized his troops and maintained discipline by combining intelligence with the methods of Greek democratic leadership.

After the death of King Darius of Persia, his son Artaxerxes took possession of the throne. Cyrus, the younger son, with the support of his mother, Parysatis, began to build up an army to wrest control of Persia from his brother. By pretending to need troops to fight the Persian general Tissaphernes and the Pisidians, Cyrus acquired armies from the Peloponnese, the Chersonese (under the Spartan exile Clearchus), the Thessalians (under Aristippus), the Boeotians (under Proxenus), the Stymphalians (under Sophanes), and the Achaeans (under Socrates, the mercenary).

Cyrus marched from Sardis to Tarsus, gathering the elements of his army. At Tarsus the troops under Clearchus refused to move forward, arguing that they had not been hired to fight against the king. Clearchus dealt with the mutiny by first enlisting the loyalty of the men to himself (by pretending he would stay with them and not with Cyrus) and then by supporting Cyrus' claim that the enemy was not the king but Abrocomas, one of the king's commanders.

By marches averaging fifteen miles a day, Cyrus brought his army from Tarsus to Issus, the last city in Cilicia where he was joined by ships from the Peloponnese. The march continued through the gates of Cilicia and Syria without opposition.

When Cyrus arrived at the city of Myrindrus, Xenias the Arcadian and Pasion the Megarian deserted the army. Cyrus refused to pursue or punish them, declaring that they had served him well in the past.

The army moved on to the Euphrates and the city of Thapsacus. Here the word was finally given to the Greek soldiers that the campaign was to be against King Artaxerxes. At first the soldiers refused to go further without more pay, but when Menon led his forces across the Euphrates in order to set a good example and to win Cyrus' favor, and when Cyrus promised to give each soldier additional pay, the Greeks crossed the river in force, making the crossing on foot Since the Euphrates was usually too high for such a passage, the army was encouraged by this good sign

When they reached the Arabian desert Cyrus forced the troops to long marches in order to bring them to water and fodder He kept discipline by ordering important Persians to help with the wagons when the road was difficult A quarrel between the soldiers of Menon and Clearchus was halted by Cyrus' warning that they would all be destroyed if they fought among themselves

Orontas, a Persian under Cyrus, attempted to transfer his army to the king's forces, but Cyrus learned of the plan by intercepting a letter from Orontas to the king At a trial held in Cyrus' tent Orontas was condemned to death He was never seen again

Cyrus moved through Babylonia and prepared for battle with King Artaxerxes, but when the king's forces failed to take a stand at a defensive ditch which had been dug, Cyrus proceeded with less caution

The two armies met at Cunaxa, and the Greeks put the opposing Persian forces to flight Cyrus, with six hundred Persian cavalry, charged the center of the Persian line in order to reach the king, but after wounding King Artaxerxes, Cyrus was himself killed by a javelin blow The cavalymen with Cyrus were killed, except for the forces under Ariaeus who hastily retreated

While the main Greek armies under Clearchus and Proxenus were pursuing the Persians the king's troops broke into Cyrus' camp and seized his mistresses, money, and property Tissaphernes then joined the king's force and attacked the Greeks, but again the Greeks put the Persians to flight

Phalinus, a messenger from King Artaxerxes, attempted to force Clearchus to surrender, but the Spartan, regarding the Greeks as victors, refused The Greeks then allied themselves again with Ariaeus, who had been second to Cyrus, and pledged their support of him When Ariaeus refused to attempt further battle against the king, the joint decision was to take a longer route back, putting as much distance as possible between their forces and the king's army

The Greeks began their march and by accident came close to the king's army frightening it into retreat A truce was then arranged, and the king transferred supplies to the Greeks Finally a treaty was made which provided safe conduct for the Greek army, with Tissaphernes as escort

Many of the Greek leaders suspected Tissaphernes of treachery, but Clearchus, reassured by a conference with the Persian general, went to Tissaphernes with four of his generals and twenty of his captains in order that those who had been slandering the Persian commander could be named Then, at a signal from the treacherous Tissaphernes, the Persians massacred the captains and took the generals as prisoners The generals—Clearchus, Proxenus, Menon, Agias, and Socrates—were taken to the king and beheaded Ariaeus was discovered to have been involved with Tissaphernes in this act of treachery

After the capture of the generals Xenophon, who had accompanied the Greek army at the urging of his friend Proxenus, bolstered the courage of the Greeks and urged that new generals and captains be appointed The army responded to this decisive act of leadership

Mithridates, a Persian commander who had been with Cyrus, returned to the Greeks and pretended to be friendly, but he suddenly attacked them and had to be driven back The Greeks were then pursued by Tissaphernes and harassed by attacks from the Carduchi as they crossed the mountains to Armenia Hearing that Tiribazus, the governor of Western Armenia who had promised the Greeks safe passage, planned to attack them, the Greek generals ordered a raid on Tiribazus' camp and then quickly resumed the march across snow covered plains. The soldiers suffered from snow blindness, frostbite, and bulimia.

To encourage the soldiers, Xenophon often worked and marched with the men. He arranged to procure guides from the Armenians and conceived the idea of capturing the mountain pass beyond the Phasis River by climbing it at night. Chrisophus and Xenophon were the principal leaders of the march.

In the country of the Taochi the Greeks were delayed by an attack from a fortification out of which large boulders were rolled down a hill, but when the stones were exhausted and as the opposing forces—including women and children—began to leap from the walls, the Greeks took possession. Finally, after fighting the Chalybes, the Greeks came within sight of the sea on their arrival at Trapezus.

Chrisophus was sent to secure ships, and the Greeks, now numbering eighty-six hundred troops of their original ten thousand, went on plundering expeditions for supplies. When Chrisophus was delayed, the available ships were loaded with the sick and wounded and with women, children, and baggage, while the rest of the army continued by land. After battling their way through the country of the barbarous Mossynoeci, the Greeks arrived in the Euxine. There Xenophon considered founding a city, but he rejected the idea when the others opposed him. Some of the generals were critical of Xenophon's disciplinary measures, but he was able to defend himself against their charges.

The Greeks bought food and also plundered supplies from the Paphlagonians. During their stay in that territory the captains went to Xenophon and asked him to be commander in chief of the army, but after reflection and sacrifices to the gods he decided that it would be better both for himself and the army if the command were either kept divided or given to some other man. When Chrisophus was elected commander in chief,

Xenophon willingly accepted a subordinate position.

By this time the Greeks had enough ships to carry all their men, and they sailed along the Paphlagonian coast from Haimene, the port of Sinope, to Heraclea, a Greek city in the country of the Maryandyni. The army then split into three parts because of a disagreement about demanding supplies from Heraclea. The Arcadians and Achaeans who favored the demand, formed one body. Chrisophus, no longer in supreme command, headed a second body of troops and Xenophon commanded the remainder. The Arcadians landed in Thrace and attacked some villages. When they got into difficulties, they were rescued by Xenophon and his force. At Port Calpe the three armies were reunited.

Many Greeks were killed by the Bithynians while hunting for supplies, but the Greek forces finally achieved victory over them. A quarrel involving Cleander, the Spartan governor of Byzantium, and Agasias, a Greek captain who had rescued one of his men from arrest by Dexippus, a traitorous Greek acting by Cleander's order, was settled by Xenophon's diplomacy.

Eventually the army crossed the straits from Asia to Byzantium. After some difficulty with Ananibius, a Spartan admiral at Byzantium, the Greeks joined forces with King Seuthes of Thrace and participated in numerous raids on Thracian villages for supplies. When King Seuthes withheld pay from the Greeks, Xenophon was blamed, but after a long inquiry, during which Xenophon was accused of being too much concerned with the welfare of the ordinary soldier, King Seuthes finally gave the Greeks the money due them.

Xenophon then led the army out of Thrace by sailing to Lampsacus, marching through the Troad, and crossing Mount Ida to the plain of Thebe. When the army reached Pergamon in Mysia, Xenophon conducted a partially successful raid against the Persian Asidates. He then turned the Greek army over to Thibron, the Spartan commander, who used the Greeks to war against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, a Persian governor

THE ANATOMY OF MELANCHOLY

Type of work Philosophical and scientific treatise

The seventeenth century found men beset by intellectual ferment, even intellectual confusion. Ideas and theories, old and new, clamored for attention and consideration because science had not yet begun to classify, assimilate, accept, and reject what man found in the world about him. More than that, each man attempted, in an age before specialization to master all, or as much as he could, of human knowledge. Such was the age in which Robert Burton, who styled himself Democritus, Jr., wrote The Anatomy of Melancholy, which in many ways exemplifies the times in which it was written.

Burton was more than an educated man; he was a learned man who gave his life to learning, and much of his vast hoard of erudition found its way into his book. Ostensibly a study on melancholy, his work, before it was finished, absorbed into its pages most of the learning of Burton's time, either through his examination of everything he could associate with melancholy or through his many digressions.

The Anatomy of Melancholy is difficult to categorize. Its organization is complex, almost incoherent. An outline for each of the three "partitions" of the book, complicated though each is, does not indicate all that Burton managed to cram into the pages. The device seems really to be Burton's way of following a "scientific" convention of the times. Perhaps the best way to categorize the book is to regard it as an informal and heterogeneous collection of essays on man's dissatisfaction with the universe, as the seventeenth century saw it, and on ways in which that dissatisfaction could be cured. In that sense, at least, the book is a treatise on psychology, although the digressions Burton made are so numerous and involved that the reader sometimes wonders whether the author may not have lost his way.

Burton assuredly had no special theme or thesis he was attempting to prove. One critic has said that all The Anatomy of Melancholy proves is that a seventeenth-century classical education could produce an astounding amount of recondite learning. While Burton presented no set of principles, scientific or otherwise, to be proved, he did bring to his work a tremendous zest for learning as he found it in the books he read. This sense of gusto often puts the modern reader at a disadvantage, for Burton larded his paragraphs heavily, perhaps no English writer more so, with tags of Latin prose and poetry, and nowadays too few readers have a knowledge of Latin which enables them to read even tags in that language. The quotations are from countless authorities, many of them long since almost forgotten. A typical page, for example, cites Leo Afer, Lipsius, Zuinger, Seneca, Tully, Livy, Rhasis, Montaltus, Celsus, and Comesius. It is the host of references, allusions, and quotations that makes Burton's style seem heavy. Actually, he wrote in the tradition of Francis Bacon, studiously striving for a plain, even colloquial and racy style. Like Bacon, too, he frequently begins a topic with an allusion, an anecdote, or a quotation as a springboard and from such a start often moves to whimsy and humor.

Sections of The Anatomy of Melancholy are famous for various reasons. The opening letter, a foreword to the reader, is well known for its satirical tone and its catalogue of the follies of mankind. Humor and whimsy account for the popularity of the sections on marriage and bachelorhood, on the 'love of learning or over much study,' and on the nature of spirits. The last 'partition,' ostensibly on melancholy growing out of love and religion, has many short synopses of world famous stories. One contemporary critic has shown that if Elizabethan literature had somehow been lost during the intervening centuries, we could reconstruct a good bit of its nature from a study of The Anatomy of Melancholy alone.

The pervading tone of the book is satirical, but Burton's satire is always realistic, reflecting the point of view of an objective, even detached, observer of human folly. He begins the first "partition" with a contrast between man as he was in the Garden of Eden and man as he has been since the Fall. The result of man's transgression, according to Burton, is that mankind has since suffered a universal malady, a melancholy that affects both mind and body. Since he regards man as a whole, from a humanistic point of view, he proceeds to mingle sympathetically both religion and science. Much of the learning and many of the notions and theories which found their way into the book are nowadays of historical interest only, such as the analysis of the four humors, the discussion of the understanding and the will (as the seventeenth century used those terms), and the discussion of the nature of angels and devils. Still amusing, however, are his discussions of old age, diet, heredity, exercise, and constipation. While admitting that none is a panacea, Burton offers various cures for melancholy, including prayer, practice of the arts, the study of geography, coffee, traditional games, and moderate amounts of wine and other drink.

history, the writer often found himself discoursing on subjects on which there is perhaps no answer. Thus it is in his critique on marriage which he delivers under the heading of 'Cure of Love Melancholy,' that Burton, who himself never married, first quotes twelve reasons in favor of marriage, taking them from Jacobus de Voragine. Those arguments in favor of marriage include statements that a wife is a comfort and assistance in adversity, that she will drive away melancholy at home, that she brings an additional supply of the "sweet company of kinsmen," and that she enables a man to have fair and happy children. Immediately following these arguments, Burton himself adds an equal number as an Anti-parodia. He suggests that a wife will aggravate a man's misery in adversity, will scold a man at home, bring a host of needy relatives, and make him a cuckold to rear another man's child. At the last, all Burton can say is that marriage, like much of life, is filled with chance. 'Tis a hazard both ways I confess, to live single or to marry."

A sound observer of human nature, Burton also showed sympathetic understanding for his fellow beings. Living in an age when religious beliefs held a strong hold on men's and women's emotions, reinforced by fears of a physical Satan and Calvinistic doctrines of predestination and the depravity of man, he advocated that people afflicted by religious melancholy turn from contemplation of the more awful aspects of God and religion to such aspects of God as His infinite mercy and love. He even advocated recreation of an honest sort as an antidote to too much religion. In this, as in other ways, Burton was a man who stood out as being ahead of his time, a rare tribute to a man in any age.

Critique

Andromache is one of Euripides' most poorly constructed plays, both the plot line and the focus on personalities undergo a radical shift in the middle. It moves not by development out of the original situation, but by accretion, and new characters are introduced with no preparation whatsoever. The first half of the play concerns Hermione's foiled plot against her rival, Andromache, the second deals with Orestes' treacherous murder of his rival Neoptolemus, and there is only a very tenuous connection between the two. Written shortly after the outbreak of the war between Athens and Sparta, the play seems to be strongly motivated by Euripides' intense hatred of Spartan characteristics as they are shown in the arrogance of Hermione, the treachery of Orestes, and the criminal brutality of Menelaus. Although flawed, Andromache nevertheless has a certain hardness and brilliance that are fascinating.

After the death of Hector and the fall of Troy, Andromache had been given as a special prize to Neoptolemus, son of Achilles. As his slave and concubine, she had borne a son, Molossus, thereby arousing the jealous wrath of Hermione, the barren wife of Neoptolemus. Fearing Hermione's hatred and sensing impending doom, Andromache sought sanctuary in the sacred grounds of the temple of Thetis, after secretly sending her son to a neighbor for safekeeping.

Hermione appeared at the temple and accused Andromache of seeking to oust her, taunted her for bearing a son to Hector's slayer, and threatened her with death. Andromache protested that as an aging woman and a helpless slave she would be mad to compete with Hermione, and that she herself had gracefully accepted Hector's illegitimate children rather than let herself be corrupted by jealousy. Hermione, unmoved by these arguments, left the temple after threatening that she would find bait that would lure Andromache from her sanctuary.

She was true to her word, for soon afterward Menelaus arrived leading Molossus by the hand. The Spartan king warned that he would kill the boy on the spot if Andromache would not emerge and offer up her own life instead. Once again Andromache argued with a Spartan, pointing out that murder would surely pollute his reputation and that Neoptolemus would never condone the death of his only son. But Menelaus was adamant, and Andromache emerged from the sanctuary to learn that both she and her son were marked for slaughter. But before the order for execution could be carried out, the aged Peleus appeared and in response to her supplication commanded that her bonds be loosened. Furious with Menelaus, Peleus denounced Spartan cowardice and treachery and ordered the king to leave Thessaly at once and to take his barren daughter with him. Menelaus, however, announced that he was leaving with his army only in order to vanquish a city hostile to Sparta, after which he would return to confront Neoptolemus himself and settle the matter of his daughter's status in Thessaly.

terribly distraught Hermione entered carrying a sword with which she intended to commit suicide. After her nurse had wrested the sword from her, Hermione, in great anguish, lamented the horrible deed she had plotted and chanted her fear that Neoptolemus would banish her. Suddenly Orestes appeared, claiming that he was merely passing through on his way to the oracle at Dodona, and Hermione threw herself at his feet. Because Orestes had once been betrothed to Hermione and had always loved her, he revealed that he had actually come to carry her off, he was prepared to murder her husband even if the deed involved sacrilegious treachery. Hermione's taunts at Andromache were now ironically being fulfilled upon herself.

After the desperate pair had fled, Peleus appeared. Before he could question the chorus about the fearful rumors he had heard, a messenger brought sad news. Peleus' grandson, Neoptolemus, was dead, he had been horribly murdered and mutilated by Orestes and his brigands while praying to the gods in the temple of Phoebus. The body of Neoptolemus was then carried in on a bier and be reaved old Peleus lamented the end of his line, for the only son of his only son was now dead. Throwing his scepter on the ground, the distraught king resolved to grovel in the dust until his death. At that moment the dim form of the divine Thetis, the goddess who had once been his wife, appeared hovering in mid air. She commanded her husband to cease his mourning and take the body of Neoptolemus to be buried at the Pythian altar as a reproach to the Spartans. She further commanded that he take Andromache and Neoptolemus' son to Helenus, whom Andromache would marry so that the line of Peleus could continue. After this mission Peleus himself would be converted into a god and live with Thetis in the halls of Nereus forever. Peleus consented, moralizing that every prudent man should take heed to marry a wife of noble stock and give his daughter to a good husband.

Critique

Pérez Galdós, a great figure in Spanish literature of the late nineteenth century, wrote thirty novels in addition to the forty six in his series called National Episodes. Angel Guerra belongs to a group of about eight that present a picture of religious faith and the results of fanaticism on Spanish life. This group includes some of his best, Doña Perfecta (1876), Gloria (1876-1877), The Family of León Roch (1879), and The Crazy Woman in the House (1892). Angel Guerra is the story of a politician and a mystic, a character whose names, "Angel" and "War," were intended to present his dual personality. By environment he was made a rebel who hated his mother, yet received from her the wealth that meant his personal freedom. Not only does the novel depict the working of fate, but it also presents a philosophy of religion and the influence of a deeply religious atmosphere on a man who was essentially destructive and modern. Besides the intermingling of human and religious love, the novel contains a realistic touch in having violence and crime cure idealism. As always in the novels of this great local color artist, the painting of the background is unforgettable: the summer houses in the suburbs of Toledo, the narrow cobbled streets of the city, and the noble, austere cathedral.

Angel Guerra, thirty and a widower, father of an adored daughter Encarnación, had spent an unhappy childhood. An idealist, he had turned to the revolutionists, thinking that if everything were overthrown life could be improved in the rebuilding. His mother, Doña Sales, disapproved of him and treated him like a child, even after he was married. An extremely rich woman, she tried to starve her liberal-minded son into submission to her wishes, but she managed only to drive him into the company of advocates of violence, the Babels.

The Babel household contained an unsavory group. With Babel lived his brother, Captain Agapito, an ex-slaver, and his children, drunken Matias and slippery Policarpo. Babel's family was as bad. Aristides, an embezzler, had fled from Cuba; Fausto had been dismissed from the post office for speculation, and Dulcenombre had love affairs from which the whole family profited. She became attracted to Ángel and lived with him for a year in order to escape her family, but he was too poor to marry her.

At last the crimes of the Babels sent Ángel also into hiding, with a wounded hand that Dulce bandaged. After a month of skulking he went home to find his mother, Doña Sales, dying. Leré, the twenty-year-old tutor of "Ción," was nursing her. At first she and Dr. Maquís refused to let Ángel see the sick woman, but finally he was allowed to be with her during her dying moments. She left him a comfortable fortune, but when he tried to use it selfishly the convent-trained Leré shamed him into carrying out his mother's desires with it.

Troubles mounted for Ángel Dulce, his mistress, became ill. Ción died. Leré announced she was entering a convent in Toledo. In his loneliness, Ángel followed her, and when Dulce came looking for him he had already gone. Following the advice of her uncle, Captain Agapito, she sought solace in alcohol.

Ángel had both rich and poor relatives in Toledo. He became a boarder at the home of Teresa Pantoja, along with two priests. Leré was already working for one of the nursing orders. Discussing life with her, and moved by his loneliness, his affection for her, and the religious atmosphere of Toledo, Ángel also found himself seeking the comfort of the Church.

The appointment of one Babel to a government post in Toledo brought the whole family, including Dulce, to that city. To escape them, Ángel went to live with wealthy relatives in the outskirts of Toledo. Leré demanded that he marry Dulce or never see her again. Going to discuss the situation with Dulce, Ángel found her disgustingly drunk. In a quarrel that followed, he almost killed Aristides. Again, at Leré's bidding, he went to Aristides to ask forgiveness. He learned that Dulce's illness had cured her of her liking for alcohol and that she was planning to enter a convent.

Ángel's many conversations with Leré caused considerable gossip, with the result that the Mother Superior called the girl in for questioning. Although she was declared innocent, the lack of trust so angered Ángel that he declared his intention of founding a convent to be put in Leré's charge. She declared that she would accept his plan only if he became a priest Angel agreed

Padre Casado, a clear sighted priest, whose preference for farming instead of books had prevented his advance in the Church, prepared Angel for taking holy orders One night, while he and Lere were nursing an ailing priest, Angel felt desire for the girl Later he confessed his carnal thoughts to Padre Casado, who could not understand any sexual attraction to a woman in plain nun's clothing They also discussed Angel's plans for the convent, and his philosophy for improving mankind by a Christian revolution

Angel tried to prove his theories when Aristides, again caught in crime, and Fausto, also fleeing justice, begged him

for help and he hid them Joined by Policarpo, they demanded money for a flight to Portugal Angel was stabbed during a quarrel over his refusal Although badly wounded, he would not give the police the name of his assailant

Lere came to nurse Angel The dying man had no regrets Like Don Quixote he felt that the approach of death restored his reason and also solved his problems He would not have made a good priest he declared He apportioned his wealth, designating most for Lere's project, some for relatives and servants, before he died Lere, stifling her sorrow, returned to the convent where she was assigned to nurse another patient

Cornelius Tacitus is by an accident of fate the sole surviving historian of his day, all the writings of his contemporaries and immediate predecessors are lost It may be that the fates were guided by standards of literary aesthetics rather than scientific accuracy, for though Tacitus' facts and interpretations have from time to time been severely criticized, he has always been admired for his lucid, morally charged narrative style The Annals are not merely a skillful prose account of a half-century of Roman history, but also a compassionate evaluation of the horrors of imperial despotism In fact, the earliest extant manuscript is entitled Ab excessu divi Augusti (although in Book IV, the writer refers to his work as Annals)

Obviously, Tacitus saw in Roman history a gradual decline from a primitive Golden Age when no laws were necessary to times when laws became a necessity and, finally, an abominable evil As the Annals proceed from the reign of

Tiberius to those of Claudius and Nero (a section dealing with Caligula is lost, as are the last books) the tyranny becomes more cruel, the populace and patricians grow more submissive, the opportunists and informers become more despicable, and the dwindling number of virtuous men find themselves more helpless.

In these matters, Tacitus is by no means taciturn, in fact, so great are the horrors depicted in the Annals that until the atrocities of twentieth century politics and war recapitulated them on a horrendously magnified scale, civilized men were inclined to view Tacitus' account as grossly exaggerated beyond the possible depths of human nature.

Tacitus is modest about his aims, though the grave irony of his remarks should not go unnoticed.

The matter upon which I am occupied is circumscribed and unproductive of renown to the author—a state of undisturbed peace or only interrupted in limited degree the sad condition of affairs in the city and a prince indifferent about extending the bounds of the empire. Not unprofitable however will it be to investigate matters which, though unimportant in a superficial view, frequently give the first impulse to events of magnitude. I have only to record the mandates of despotism, incessant accusations, faithless friendships, the ruin of innocence, the one unvarying repetition of causes terminating in the same event, and presenting no novelty from their similarity and tiresome repetition (IV, 32-33).

In general, Tacitus presents not a sustained history, but a chronological depiction of selected events—some thoroughly detailed over several chapters and others sketched in lightly, continually referred to but not described extensively in any one place. It has been conjectured that the original Annals consisted of three hexads, the pattern employed by Vergil, Statius, Polynus, and Cicero, but there is no concrete evidence that there were two books written after XVI, and the loss of Books VII-X prevents us from being absolutely certain they fitted with Books XI-XII to constitute a middle hexad. At any rate, the Annals, as they now stand, can be conveniently arranged by subject matter—the reign of Tiberius is the concern of the first six books, of Claudius in books XI-XII, and of Nero in the final four books. This is not to say that the focus of attention is concentrated on the three emperors. In dealing with Tiberius, for example, Tacitus devotes the opening forty-nine chapters to the first year (more space than to any other year of the entire history), beginning with the jockeying for power after the death of Augustus. Since Tiberius never led troops in battle after he became emperor, the narrative shifts to Tiberius' son Drusus (Chapters 16-30) quelling the Pannonian mutiny and to Germanicus (most of Chapters 31-71) campaigning on the Rhine. These two men, logical heirs to the throne, were the objects of the intrigues of the utterly unscrupulous Aelius Sejanus, Tiberius' favorite. Jealous of Germanicus' successes, Tiberius had him recalled and sent to the East as king in Armenia, where he died in A.D. 19, probably at the hands of Piso under orders from Tiberius. Piso's trial ended abruptly with his unexplained murder, though Tacitus hints that Tiberius arranged that as well. Drusus, then, dominated the sons of Germanicus (Nero, another Drusus, and Caligula) as heir apparent, but Tiberius openly preferred Sejanus—"a stranger was called in as coadjutor in the government, nay how little was wanting to his being declared colleague." Thus Sejanus, "whose heart insatiably lusted for supreme domination," then dispatched Drusus with a slow poison that made him appear a victim of disease, and set out to marry Livia, his widow and the sister of Germanicus. There remained, however, Agrippina, widow of Germanicus, and her three sons. Sejanus contrived open enmity between Agrippina and Tiberius and skillfully arranged for the emperor to retire to Capri from Rome in A.D. 27. There, while Sejanus plotted his rise to power, the ruler "in indulged his cruel and libidinous disposition in the secrecy of a retired situation" One of the most tantalizing lacunae of the Annals deals with Agrippina's hopeless struggle for the rights of her sons and the final conflict between Sejanus and the emperor, a struggle leading to Sejanus' execution

The first hexad ends with Tiberius at the age of seventy eight, when he had outlived all the intrigues who surrounded him and relinquished "nothing of his libidinous excesses" His end was dramatic, and Tacitus relishes the irony Assured by Tiberius' physician that his death was imminent,

Caligula in the midst of a great throng of persons paying their congratulations, was already going forth to make a solemn entrance on the sovereignty when suddenly a notice came, 'that Tiberius had recovered his sight and voice and had called for some persons to give him food to restore him' The consternation was universal the concourse about Caligula dispersed in all directions Caligula himself stood fixed in silence—fallen from the highest hopes he now expected the worst Macro [Caligula's right hand man], undismayed ordered the old man to be smothered with a quantity of clothes (VI, 51)

The dramatic technique is magnificent Caligula is left as a monstrous legacy to Rome However, the extant history resumes in Book XI with Claudius' succession to the purple The new emperor is depicted as a cut above his predecessors he dignified the theater, augmented the alphabet, restrained predatory creditors, increased the Senate, and incorporated new provinces into the Empire But the intrigues flourished, centering upon Claudius' wife Messalina, who was concerned at the way in which freedmen (especially Narcissus and Pallas) had gained the actual power Messalina, knowing she was about to be murdered by Claudius' agents, committed suicide "Tidings were then carried to Claudius 'that Messalina was no more', without inquiring whether by her own or another's hand, [he] called for a cup of wine and proceeded in the feast" Tacitus brilliantly achieves a sense of horror at the moral corruption of the Empire with just such detail and understatement Book XII opens with the contest among the freedmen concerning the choice of a new wife for Claudius Pallas prevailed with his suggestion of Agrippina despite the fact that she was the daughter of Claudius brother Germanicus The horrendous narrative continues to delineate debauchery and chaos Nero destroyed the emperor's son Britannicus, and Agrippina afterward poisoned Claudius in order to secure the succession for her own son, Nero Book XIII tells of Agrippina's struggles for power, first against the freed woman Acte and then against Poppaea, Nero's wife—murders and counter murders and abortive palace revolts that went on while Nero engaged in his orgiastic debauches Book XIV opens with Poppaea's vigorously dramatic reproach against Nero for his cowardice in not destroying his mother, who had desperately clung to life and power by incestuously lavishing her own body on her son Tacitus handles Nero's attempts on Agrippina's life with almost grotesque comedy First she was put to sea in a faulty vessel, but she swam ashore while another woman, hoping to save herself by claiming to be the emperor's mother, was slain Finally, brute force was resorted to and she was slain in bed "to the centurion as he was drawing his sword to dispatch her, she presented her womb, and with a loud voice, 'Strike your sword into my belly,' she cried, and was instantly dispatched" Thus, Tacitus vivifies an important dramatic scene with a stroke of realism

Nero, struck with remorse and apparently unaware of the extent to which Roman society had degenerated to his own low level, feared to return to the capital Matricide during the Republic would have seemed the destruction of morality's basis, the family But Nero's entry into Rome was triumphant and he thenceforth "abandoned himself to all his inordinate passions which, though insuf ficiently controlled, had been somewhat checked by his reverence for his mother, such as it was." Throughout his career "Nero wallowed in all sorts of defilements, lawful and unlawful and seemed to leave no atrocity which could add to his pollution," including one which Tacitus describes with great disgust—a mock marriage "with all the solemnities of wedlock to a homosexual. The height of his inhuman cruelty was the great fire of Rome, in which he madly reveled and from which he gained enormous profits. The most sustained episode of the final books concerns the conspiracy in A.D. 65 of Piso and eighteen other leaders to assassinate Nero and set up Piso as emperor.

Piso gave no promise of better government since he was almost as addicted to sensuous pleasure as Nero himself, but some change was obviously necessary. The conspiracy had difficulty settling on a method, and before it could get under way the plot was inadvertently revealed when Epicharis, a freedwoman, attempted to solicit one of Nero's naval officers, Volusius Proculus, who alerted Nero. One of the rare cases of personal virtue was Epicharis' refusal to betray the conspirators, despite the horrible torture she endured. In their haste the conspirators betrayed themselves, and in panic Nero began wholesale slaughters. Chapters 37-70 constitute a steady series of death scenes—Epicharis, Seneca, Subrius Flavus, Lucan (who died reciting his verses), and others—each presented with vivid detail. Piso, himself, though urged to stir up a popular revolt, chose to sever his veins and "left a will full of odious flattery to Nero, in tenderness to his wife, a depraved woman and void of every recommendation but personal beauty."

The deaths of those close to Nero continued. Poppaea died "by a fit of passion in her husband who gave her a violent blow with his foot when she was pregnant, for I cannot believe he poisoned her as some have stated." Her funeral was sumptuous, she was embalmed with spices rather than cremated as was the custom, but her death was "rejoiced at by those who recollected her lewdness and cruelty." An account of the last two years of Nero's life is missing, and the Annals, ending in mid sentence, suggest that this section was lost.

Such are the main lines of Tacitus' history, but the text abounds in frequent digressions tracing in close detail the fortunes of the Roman Empire and its provinces and outposts so vividly that some authorities suggest that he must have had a host of reliable sources in the form of autobiographies and diaries. However, the Annals are clearly the personal document of a writer with sincerity, intelligence, courage, and enormous artistry. In a very real sense, Tacitus was an Existentialist in his view of social corruption replacing traditional morality. Convinced that human effort is absurd, he was sustained, however, by a faith in human solidarity and unity in suffering. The gravity of his tragic vision is relieved by a deeply felt compassion for suffering mankind, and he has left in the Annals one of the greatest histories of all time.

ANNALS OF THE ROMAN PEOPLE

Author Livy (Titus Livius, 59 B.C. A.D. 17)

Time 753 B.C.

Locale Rome, Spain, Carthage, Greece, Macedonia

First transcribed c. 26 B.C. A.D. 14

Livy undertook a great task. In his Ab urbe condita libri, he was attempting to narrate the history of nearly eight centuries, from the time of Romulus and Remus to the reign of Tiberius. The work occupied 142 books, of which barely a quarter have been preserved. Books I-X and XXI-XLV, along with some fragments of several others. Even so, this material is enough to fill six volumes in one

English translation and thirteen in an other

Titus Livius Patavinus (from his birthplace, Padua), was originally a teacher of rhetoric and apparently from casual references in his writing, a friend of the Emperor Augustus. Perhaps the emperor, as part of his program to glorify Rome, suggested that Livy stop teaching and write a history of the city. The project represented a challenge. His only sources were traditions, the official temple annals listing the consuls and the chief events of each year, and personal records, frequently exaggerated, kept by the famous families. Like Herodotus, however, Livy was always attracted to a colorful story. Macaulay declared in disgust: "No historian with whom we are acquainted has shown so complete indifference to the truth."

But probably a truthful chronicle was not what Livy set out to produce. In addition to his patriotic duty, he wanted by his dramatic power and the charm of his style to impress the sophisticated readers of Rome. Accuracy came second. He was no soldier in his battles, no statesman in recording the problems of government, even as a geographer he was most hazy. In an epoch when research was unknown, he was no critical historian. When he found two conflicting accounts, he was likely to choose the more colorful, or include both and let the reader be the judge.

The Annals were issued in "decades," or units of ten, a volume at a time, the first between 27 and 25 B.C., at the time Vergil was writing his Aeneid. The work did what the author intended: painted vividly the grandeur of Rome, even though, like an artist, he sometimes changed details for better composition. Whatever his faults as a historian, Livy the novelist, the dramatist, the orator, left unforgettable pages for readers of later generations.

It is a wonder that so much of his work has come down to us, for he had many enemies. Pope Gregory I, for example, ordered all available copies burned because of the superstitions they contained, and other Church fathers were also to blame for the hundred books that have disappeared, including those about Livy's own times. More than one modern historian has wished he could exchange the first ten books for those in which Livy set down what he had seen. Few, however, would willingly give up the books dealing with the sixteen years of the Punic Wars, the story of the life and death struggle between Rome and Carthage.

"It would be a satisfaction to me," declared Livy in the preface to the first decade of his Annals, "that I have contributed my share to perpetuate the achievements of a people, the lords of the world." He determined "neither to affirm nor refute" the traditions antedating the founding of Rome, even though they were "more suited to the fiction of poetry than to the genuine record of history." In writing them down, however, his aim was to acquaint the Romans of his day with the lives and customs of ancestors, who might serve as examples in the present low moral status of Rome, "when we can neither endure our vices nor their remedies."

He began by repeating the legend of Aeneas, who led the Trojans to Latium and married Lavinia. He listed the petty chiefs who followed, making no changes in the story of Romulus and Remus and their wolf nurse. He related briefly the account of the founding of Rome, April 21, 753 B.C., when the ceremonies ended with the quarrel between the brothers and the death of Remus. By inviting in the discontented from the neighboring tribes, Romulus populated the city; then provided wives by kidnapping the Sabine women who came as guests to a feast.

In the remaining books of the first decade, which carries the story through 460 years, Livy paid special attention to Rome's virtuous and exemplary citizens. Cincinnatus, summoned from his plow to drive back the Aequians, Virginius, protecting his daughter Virginia from lustful decemvirs Appius Claudius, Camillus, returning from exile to fight the Gauls, Manlius, defending the capitol, and the patriotic Curtius, riding his horse into a chasm in the Forum to preserve his city. The decade ends when the defeat of the Samnites left Rome the master of Italy.

The next ten books have been lost. Only because they were summarized in an epitome does the world know Livy's account of what happened between 294 and 219 B C.

At the beginning of the next decade, Books XXI-XXX, Livy declared "I am about to relate the most memorable of all wars that were ever waged, the war which the Carthaginians under Hannibal maintained against the Roman people." As far as ancient history goes, he was undoubtedly right. It was a war between the Indo-Germanic and the Semitic races for world dominion. The two were not only equally matched, but they were also familiar with the enemy's war tactics and potential power, and their hatred for each other, as the historian pointed out, was as strong as their armies.

Livy never minimized the exploits of twenty-six year old Hannibal, who became the outstanding figure in his book. What details he could not find recorded of the crossing of the Alps by ninety thousand infantry, twelve thousand cavalry, and thirty-seven elephants, he made up from his imagination.

Scipio the father, having failed to stop the Carthaginians in Gaul, tried again on the plains of Italy, but one defeat after another brought terror to the imperial city. After Trebia and Lake Trasimene, the delaying tactics of Fabius Maximus succeeded in holding back the invaders for a time, but the impatience of another consul, Varro, resulted in the culminating Roman disaster at Cannae (216 B C.). Had Hannibal taken advantage of his victory, he could easily have entered Rome.

Book XXV deals with another phase of the struggle. Marcellus, besieging Syracuse, was held at bay for three years by the craft of a seventy-four year old mathematician, Archimedes, with his invention of the catapult and the grappling hooks that lifted the prows of Roman ships trying to attack the breakwater, and sank them. Ultimately, however, the Romans found the weak spot in the defenses and captured the island.

On another battlefield, a second Scipio, later to be called Africanus, was trying to keep Spain from being used as the Carthaginians' European headquarters. A comparison of the version by Livy with another by Polybius shows the superiority of Livy's technique. Though Scipio could not immobilize Hasdrubal entirely or prevent his departure with reinforcements for his brother in Italy, the delay did contribute to the Carthaginian defeat on the Metaurus River, a Roman victory that was quickly neutralized by the death of Marcellus in a clash with Hannibal. Eventually, however, Roman might prevailed when Scipio carried the war into Africa. Although Hannibal was recalled for the defense of Carthage, his veterans were no match for the Roman legionaries at the Battle of Zama (202 B C.), and defeated Carthage was literally wiped from the map.

An additional fifteen books of Livy's history survive, dealing with Roman expansion in Greece and Asia and ending when Macedonia became a Roman province. But this story is an anticlimax. No longer were the soldiers fighting for the life of Rome, but the plunder they hoped to acquire, so that the reader does not follow the story with the same interest. But even in these pages, the storytelling ability of Livy is still apparent. It is easy to understand why he was called the greatest prose writer of the Augustan Age.

First published 1864

This long essay, also known as History of My Religious Opinions, is the famous reply written by John Henry Newman in answer to the attack made upon him by Charles Kingsley (1819-1875). The years 1833 to 1841 had seen the publication of the Tracts for the Times, to which Newman had been a contributor; these tracts, which gave their name to the "Tractarian Movement" or "Oxford Movement," were the spearhead of the great theological controversy of the middle years of the century. Newman and his friends were eager to return the Anglican Church to something like its position during past centuries; they valued tradition and hierarchy, they wished to go back to the severe, authoritarian faith of the past, from which they believed the Church of England had lapsed. In a word, they were the "High Church" party, and some idea of the rift that was created within the Church can be gleaned from Trollope's Barchester novels. In 1845, Newman left the Anglican Church for the Roman; two years later he was ordained priest in that communion.

In January, 1864, Kingsley, an Anglican clergyman of what was known as the "Broad Church" party and a popular novelist, attacked Newman in a magazine article, in which he stated that "Truth, for its own sake, has never been a virtue with the Roman clergy. Father Newman informs us that it need not, and on the whole ought not to be." To this article, Newman replied in a pamphlet in February of that year, whereupon Kingsley wrote still another pamphlet entitled "What, then, does Dr. Newman mean?" in which he accused Newman of having "gambled away" his reason, of having a "morbid" mind, and of not caring about "truth for its own sake." It was in answer to this pamphlet that Apologia pro Vita Sua was written.

Newman divided his work into chapters, each dealing with a crucial period in his life. The first gives the story of his youth and his education up to his thirty-second year, by which time he was a Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and had been ordained in the Anglican Church. By his own account, he emerges as an extraordinarily precocious lad, preoccupied at a very early age with religious questions. He resembled, indeed, the hero of his own novel Loss and Gain—which phrase might be applied as a description of his career. The modern reader will smile at Newman's decision, reached at the age of fifteen, that celibacy was the only course for him; yet his prodigious intellect shines through his very modest account of his youth. He tells us of his reading, but the real influences were his friends: Hurrell Froude and the older John Keble (1792-1866). It was Froude, with his love for tradition and for the external beauty of the Roman Church, who began to soften Newman's insular dislike of that institution.

The year 1830 was a momentous one for Newman. The revolution that deposed Charles X of France distressed him; the Whig victory in England distressed him even more. He had a violent hatred of Liberalism, and everywhere it seemed triumphant. The "Tractarian Movement" was largely a counterattack. Newman himself claimed that the movement had begun to stir as far back as 1828, when he was Vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, but the date of its beginning is usually set in July of 1833, when Keble preached a famous sermon at Oxford against the errors of the Whig government in Church policy. The Tracts for the Times, written by Newman and his friends, stated their position. As Newman saw it, the Whigs must be opposed and the Church of England returned to the position of authority it had held during the early seventeenth century. He considered himself as belonging to neither the 'High' nor the "Low" Church party; he was merely anti-Liberal. He explained his position as based on (1) dogma (he had no use for "religion as a mere sentiment"; there must be positive beliefs), (2) a visible Church with sacraments and rites and the Episcopal system, (3) anti-Romanism. Such was the general point of view of the Oxford Movement. Newman, inci dentally, had very little to say about ritual, usually associated with the High Church position. He was interested in theology, not liturgics.

Newman admitted frankly that in the vast amount of writing he did during these years he had attempted to refute many of the tenets of Romanism. What he was seeking for himself was a basis in reason for his beliefs, for the Anglican Church, he was seeking a theology of its own that would make it more than a via media. These investigations led him to a consideration of the common heritage of Romanism and Anglicanism and to the question of how much of the Roman belief could be accepted by an Anglican. He began to be convinced that in English history the real objection to Rome had been political rather than theological, that Romanism and Anglicanism had, after all, not been so far apart as was generally believed. Inevitably, he began to find a difference between Roman dogmas, which he could accept and Roman practice which he often could not. He confessed that, for a long time, the stumbling block had been the Roman veneration of the Virgin and prayers to the saints. But he was obviously drawing closer to Rome.

It was Tract XC, published in 1841, that brought the storm on Newman's head and led to his final break with the Church of England. In this tract he examined the question of how far the Thirty-Nine Articles, on which the Church rests, were capable of a Roman interpretation. Immediately he was accused of everything from "traducing the Reformation" to planning to build a monastery near Oxford. He himself was feeling grave doubts about Anglicanism, derived mainly from his reading on the abstruse doctrines of the Monophysites. When he could no longer conscientiously maintain his clerical position, he resigned his living of St. Mary's in September of 1843. As he explained, he had spent the years from 1835 to 1839 trying, in his writings, to benefit the Church of England at the expense of the Church of Rome and the years from 1839 to 1843 trying to benefit the Church of England without prejudice to the Church of Rome. In 1843 he began to despair of the Church of England.

The years between 1843 and 1845 were spent, according to Newman, in retirement. He had now reached the crossroads but was as yet unable to make his final decision. He had already retracted the "hard things" he had said against Rome, the things he had felt compelled to say in defense of the Anglican Church. He made a point of seeing no Roman Catholics; his struggle was purely an inward one. Though he still felt that the Church of England was a branch of the true Church, though he still deplored the "Mariolatry" of Rome, he was convinced that Rome was more in accord with the early Church. His horror of Liberalism also played its part; he very genuinely felt that the spirit of Liberalism was the spirit of Antichrist. As he now saw the situation, on the one hand there was Liberalism leading inevitably to atheism, on the other, Anglicanism leading to Rome. He still remained in lay communion with the Church of England during this difficult period, but more and more often he found himself asking this question: "Can I be saved in the English Church?" When he was compelled to answer in the negative, he made the great decision and was received into the Roman Communion in 1845. Two years later he was ordained priest.

In the concluding section of the essay Newman defended himself against the jibes that were hurled at him after his conversion. It was said that by submitting to Rome he had abdicated his power of personal judgment and that he was now compelled to accept dogmas which might, at any moment, be changed. His reply was that the Roman doctrines were not difficult for him, that historically the Church had not suppressed freedom of intellect. He felt that an infallible Church had been intended by the Creator to preserve religion—especially in an age of increasing skepticism. Lastly—and this is the most famous part of the essay—he advanced the idea that a conflict between

Though the Apologia won Newman a resounding victory over Kingsley, the work is not easy reading. The difficulty does not lie in the style for no one has written more clearly and simply than he. But he wrote for readers who were familiar with Church history and with theological problems so that most readers in our age of religious ignorance and indifference lack the knowledge to grasp many of his arguments. It is difficult today to understand his dilemma. Yet the Apologia remains a powerful and sincere work. Some, naturally, have seen in Newman, as Kingsley must have done only a man whose habit of mind made him take refuge in an authoritarian Church which would solve his spiritual problems for him. Others, taking the opposite view, would agree with Ramon Fernandez that "In him intelligence and faith act as mutual brakes and yet no attentive reader can accuse him of the slightest artifice."

AN APOLOGY FOR THE LIFE OF COLLEY CIBBER, COMEDIAN

Author Colley Cibber (1671-1757)

Time Late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries

First published 1740

Principal personages

COLLEY CIBBER actor, playwright, producer

WILLIAM CONGREVE playwright

SIR JOHN VANBRUGH, architect and playwright

JOHN GAY poet, author of The Beggar's Opera

JOSEPH ADDISON, essayist and author of the successful Cato

SIR RICHARD STEELE, essayist and playwright

ALEXANDER POPE, author of The Dunciad

To read Colley Cibber's Apology is to recapture intimate views of London: the atirical, social, and literary life during the last decade of the seventeenth and the first quarter of the following century, as observed by a successful actor and theatrical manager, a playwright of sorts, and a man of shrewd insight into his own foibles and those of his fellows.

Published ten years after his retirement from the stage (1730) and his acceptance of the poet laureateship, this autobiography is a frank and engaging account of his childhood experiences as the son of a well-known sculptor, his schoolboy activities, his early days as a stage-struck youth, his long career in the theater, and his candid and unprejudiced observations of people and events. For this is an apology, not in the sense of an acknowledgment of wrongdoing, mistake, or regrettable circumstance, but as an explanation of the life of a man who was regularly and closely connected with the theater, who knew and talked with many of the most influential people of his day who was acquainted with political actions, backstage gossip, and the infinite variety of public life and private in his time. Cibber was attempting, as he expressed it in the first chapter, to present "as true a picture of myself as natural vanity will permit me to draw," since "a man who has pass'd above forty years of his life upon a theatre, where he has never appear'd to be himself may have naturally excited the curiosity of his spectators to know what he really was, when in no body's shape but his own."

He also proposed to include "the theatrical history of my own time, from my first appearance on the stage to my last exit."

Following a simple chronological pattern of development, Cibber devotes the first three chapters of his autobiography to matters of his parents and family. His father had emigrated from Holstein many years before the Restoration in 1660 his mother was a member of the Colley family, formerly of some prominence in Rutlandshire. His education was regrettably limited to a few years in a free school. Early in life he says he was possessed of a "giddy negligence," an inconsistency of character, and these qualities persisted, he admits, frequently to his own embarrassment. But Cibber notes that Pope's selection of him as the heir to the throne of folly in The Dunciad was done not so much to satirize Cibber as it was to give publicity to the poem, for an attack on the laureate was likely to gain increased sales for any publication. Thus, with remarkable good nature, Cibber transforms Pope's malicious defamation into a device for "profit to himself." This was both a successful and extraordinary outcome for any controversy with Alexander Pope, "the wasp of Twickenham."

Cibber's attempts to gain entrance to Winchester proving fruitless, he next tried the life of a trooper in the Revolution of 1688. His father sought preferment for his lively and mercurial son in various ways, but by 1690, Cibber succumbed to the "allurements of a theatre," and so his long stage career began.

In the remaining portion of the book, chapters IV through XVI, Cibber intermingles autobiographical details and anecdotes with factual accounts of the history of the London stage from its restoration in 1660 until his retirement in the 1730's, with personal reminiscences and valuable word portraits of actors and actresses, playwrights, managers with first hand experiences with the licensing acts and Masters of Revels. For example, before recounting his early days in the theater, Cibber sets forth, swiftly but convincingly, his own "short view of the stage" from its rebirth in 1660 until the time he became an actor in 1690. To this he adds an account of the greatest players of the time, describing them in vivid and satisfying detail, evaluating their performances, enumerating their best roles. His highest praise goes to Betterton and

Mrs. Bracegirdle, for Cibber knew them all, regarded them closely as a student of acting, and valued their talents shrewdly as a stage manager. He writes of his own first appearance in a significant acting role as the chaplain in Otway's The Orphan, of the first prologue he composed, of his first play, the successful Love's Last Shift. This play led to his long acquaintance with Sir John Vanbrugh, an architect turned playwright. Cibber frankly admits that Gay's The Beggar's Opera was a "vast success" and that his attempt to offset this portrayal of highwaymen, thieves, and receivers of stolen goods with a comedy in praise of virtue, Love in a Riddle, was a resounding failure. In this instance, his middle class morality seems to have blurred Cibber's judgment, for the charm and delightful raciness of Gay's ballad opera have made it a favorite for countless generations, while no one but an avid student of the history of English comedy has ever heard of Love in a Riddle.

Cibber traces the complex and curious history of the rival acting companies, of the rise to great popularity of Italian opera, of his ultimate assumption of a position of authority as actor-manager. He pauses to comment upon the building of a new theater, the Hay Market, and its weaknesses acoustically. He remarks upon the actor-manager's difficulties with gentlemen who sought to master the intricacies of theater operation, of the intense rivalries and jealousies of actors and actresses, of the origin of actor's benefits. He admits freely his own inadequacies as a tragic actor, for his voice was unsuited to heavy roles, however, he does assert his success as a villain. He comments on the unfortunate public attitude toward the profession of acting, he even offers good advice to would-be playwrights, suggesting that they always pay particular attention to their plotting.

No doubt it is this union of the frank appraisal of a man who recognizes his own mistakes and strong points with his shrewd observations of personages and events that gives Cibber's book its continuing vigor, its essential charm. He can look upon the self-seeking defections of actors with charity, for he realizes intimately the insecurity of their profession and excuses their failure to fulfill certain obligations as understandable. He perceives that well-meaning patrons of the theater could not possibly understand all the implications of their amateurish decisions, and so he deals with them gently, despite all the trouble they caused him as an actor-manager. In short, Cibber is both a professional in the theater and a devoted, though not always gifted, master craftsman in the art of the drama. His youthful passion for the stage and acting and writing plays and refurbishing old dramas seems never to have left him. His lifelong interest in matters theatrical seldom wavers, hence his desire to record important happenings in dramatic history, his awareness of the significance of minor occurrences, and his appraisal of the people concerned with these events large and small combine to give this account remarkable value.

If the test of excellence in autobiographical writing is the author's ability not only to set down his views of people, events, and circumstances accurately and with satisfying detail, but also to portray his own qualities with rich revealing honesty, then Colley Cibber's Apology deserves recognition. For Cibber's enthusiasm for the stage and its people is intensely absorbing, his zeal to make his readers understand the development of English acting, the facts of play production during his time, and the history of the theater in those lively years is genuine and almost incomparable. Moreover, his sincerity, his good humor, his vanity, his strong armor against insult and vitriolic attack, his keen sense of justice, and his wholesome absorption in the "allurements of a theatre," make this autobiography a record unique in theatrical writings. Cibber the playwright, manager, actor, play doctor, poet laureate is dead long since save for specialists in theatrical matters. But Colley Cibber the apologist and commentator on dramatic history is still intensely human, vivid, and readable.

Critique

What Aristophanes was to the great age of Greek comedy, Menander was to New Comedy, that form characterized by the abandonment of the chorus and the intervention of the gods and by its concern with domestic problems of ordinary mortals. Tradition made Menander author of a hundred plays, of which about eighty titles are still known, but for centuries all trace of his writings, except for a few fragments, was lost. In the late nineteenth century papyri recovered from

Egyptian tombs enabled students to get a better idea of Menander's writing. Still more recent discoveries provided almost complete versions of two of his comedies. The Girl with the Shorn Locks, about a soldier lover who mistreated his mistress and almost lost her, but won her back by marrying her, and the Arbitration. Actually, the title refers only to one amusing scene in this comedy of a harsh father, a knavish slave, and a slave girl with a heart of gold. The play contains stock material and situations. The nurse, even to her name, is a type, as are the servant and the avaricious father. But Menander's clever plotting is shown in his use of the miser as the arbitrator whose decision regarding the fate of his own grandson brings trouble to him and provides material for the picaresque servant's amusing insults. The action is lively and the dialogue amusing, especially in the scene in which the two slaves, Onesimus and Habrotonon, outmaneuver each other.

Pamphila, the daughter of a respected but miserly Athenian citizen, had been ravished by a drunken young man of ordinarily good behavior during the night festival of the Tauropolia. The only clue she had to his identity was a signet ring which he had left in her possession. A short time later Pamphila was married to her ravisher, a young Athenian named Charisius, and Smicrines, her father, provided a good dowry for his idealistic but rather priggish son-in-law. Pamphila, who soon learned to love her husband, gave birth to her child during his absence and acting on the advice of her nurse Sophrona, exposed the infant and with the baby a pouch containing assorted tokens, including the ring. Charisius, learning of the birth from his prying servant Onesimus, decided that the child could not be his. Instead of repudiating Pamphila, however, he left home and began to waste his substance in rich feasts given at the home of his friend Chaerestratus, who lived next door. Pamphila was distracted because the husband she loved had deserted her for the company of hired dancing girls and harp players.

So matters stood when Smicrines came to investigate reports of Charisius' conduct, he had heard that his son-in-law was spending every night for a hired harp player a sum sufficient to feed a slave for a month. Just before his arrival a conceited, loud-mouthed cook, Carion, on his way to prepare a meal in the house of Chaerestratus, vainly questioned Charisius' servant Onesimus about his master, the cook also wanted to know why Charisius neglected his wife and paid twelve drachmas a night to be entertained by the lovely, harp-playing slave, Habrotonon. While Carion and Onesimus were talking, the musician was delivered by her master. The slave dealer managed to persuade bemused Charisius that he owed money for several previous nights' entertainment. Charisius paid, but wily Onesimus recovered the overpayments for himself.

When Smicrines appeared, Onesimus managed to befuddle the anxious, angry father with the story that it was Chaerestratus who was giving the parties and that Charisius attended only to protect his friend's possessions and good name.

After Smicrines had gone into his son-in-law's house, two of Chaerestratus' tenants appeared to pay their rent. They were Davus, a goatherd, and Syrus, a charcoal burner accompanied by his wife carrying a baby. While they waited they argued over another matter. A month earlier Davus had come upon a baby exposed in the hills. His first impulse had been to adopt the foundling, but later, having calculated the cost of rearing a child, he was returning the infant to the place where he had found it when Syrus offered to adopt the baby in place of his own child who had just died. Now Syrus, having learned that Davus had kept the trinkets left beside the baby, claimed them because they might some day help to identify the child's parents. Davus had refused to give up the tokens, but he had agreed to let someone else decide the matter Smicrines, reappearing from the house of Charisius, was persuaded to listen to the story and give his decision Deciding that the trinkets ought to go with the baby, he ordered Davus to give Syniscus the pouch containing them

While Syniscus and his wife were looking over the contents of the pouch, Onesimus recognized the signet ring that his master had lost at the time of the Tauropolia festival a year before The slave borrowed it to show his master, then hesitated because to return it would be to accuse Charisius of having fathered the abandoned baby Habrotonon came along about that time, saw the ring, heard the story, and concocted a scheme of her own She would learn the truth by wearing the ring and seeing if Charisius recognized it In that case, she would claim that she had been the girl he had ravished and so rescue the child from the life of a slave Onesimus knew very well that her chief purpose was to win her own freedom

Smicrines reappeared, determined to demand the return of his daughter and her dowry The neighbors tried to dissuade him by saying that everything would turn out all right As the party ended, broken up by Habrotonon and her claim that the child was hers, Onesimus infuriated the miser by congratulating him on bringing happiness to everybody by his arbitration

Pamphila begged her father not to meddle with her marriage, she had no desire for another husband, she declared If Charisius was infatuated with a harpist, that was only a temporary estrangement At her father's announcement that his current love was the mother of his child, Pamphila fainted

Regaining consciousness she accused her nurse Sophrona of causing all the trouble by preventing her confession to Charisius after the birth of the child While they argued, Habrotonon happened by and recognized Pamphila as the girl who had been Charisius' companion of a year earlier She told the patrician so when he came to keep his promise to arrange for her freedom At first he regarded the story as another of her lies To save himself, Onesimus also accused her of having invented the story Habrotonon maintained stoutly that it was true, and she declared that she would rather see the child looked after properly than win her own freedom

Chaerestratus, who had always admired the lovely slave, began questioning her about her own early history, but she remembered nothing of her infancy not even her name Then the sight of a small silver cup with an indecipherable inscription among the trinkets of Syniscus caused her to comment that she had once possessed a similar cup Smicrines, seeing the cup for the first time, identified it as having once belonged to his oldest daughter, who had been kidnapped by the slave traders during the siege of the city some years before Sophrona, recognizing the harp player as Smicrines' long lost daughter Clirista, stirred the girl's recollection by using her baby name of "grasshopper"

Chaerestratus, who had loved the girl from the first, now asked to marry her, and when he showed miserly Smicrines how he could get his daughter back without spending money in court trials, he got both the girl and her father's blessing Rascally Onesimus, instead of getting the beating he deserved, was probably given his freedom

Although the original version of this work was intended by Sidney as an entertainment for his sister Mary, Countess of Pembroke, and her friends (the tale was originally titled The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia), this light pastoral story holds a significant place in the development of the English novel for it serves as a bridge between the delicately written Italian romances and the more sturdy prose tales of the later Elizabethan period in England. The original Arcadia was revised and considerably enlarged by Sidney into an unfinished version which was published in 1590. The "old" Arcadia, although not published in its complete and original form until 1926, clearly shows the complete primary intention of its author. It has a rustic charm and coherence of plot not nearly so evident in the more ambitious later version. The presence of occasional passages of poetry and of the four eclogues, largely in the form of poetry, which are inserted among the five "books" of the romance is a carry-over from the earlier continental romances, but the plot, skillfully handled for its time, and the philosophical asides of the author pointed the way toward a more serious genre of fiction to follow.

Basilus, the powerful Duke of Arcadia, a quiet and peaceful province of Greece, ruled his faithful subjects happily and well. Being overcome by an ungovernable curiosity to learn what the future held for him, his wife Gynecia, and his beautiful daughters Pamela and Philoclea, he went to consult the Oracle at Delphos. There he was told that his older daughter, Pamela, would be stolen from him, his younger daughter would engage in an unsuitable love affair, his wife would commit adultery, and a foreign ruler would sit upon his throne—all within a year.

Basilus told the prophecy to his friend Philanax, whom he left in charge of the country while he, in an effort to escape the destiny foretold by the Oracle, took his wife and daughters into a secluded part of the country to live for the year. Basilus lived in one of two lodges with his wife and Philoclea, in the other he put Pamela under the care of Dametas, a rude shepherd of whose honesty Basilus had a high opinion.

Shortly after the duke's retirement two young princes, Pyrocles and Musidorus, arrived in Arcadia. Young men of great courage, personal beauty, and integrity, who had been reared together in close friendship, they had been swept ashore at Lydia after experiencing a shipwreck and many strange adventures as well as performing many acts of daring and honor.

Pyrocles saw a picture of Philoclea, learned of her enforced retirement, and fell in love with her. Determined to see the princess face to face, he told Musidorus of his love and of his plan to disguise himself as a chivalric Amazon and in woman's guise to approach Philoclea. For a name, he took that of his lost lady, Zelmane.

After a lengthy debate, in which Musidorus attempted to convince his friend of the folly of love, Pyrocles still remained firm in his intention, and the two princes traveled to the place of the duke's retirement, Pyrocles in his disguise as an Amazon. While Musidorus waited in a nearby wood, Pyrocles, now Zelmane, sat down and sang a melancholy song which awakened Dametas, who hastened to the duke's lodge to tell him of a strange woman who had arrived in the vicinity.

Basilus, upon seeing Pyrocles in his disguise, fell in love with the supposed Amazon. His true identity still unsuspected, he was introduced to the duke's family and invited to remain with them for a while. Soon a young shepherd appeared. He was Musidorus, who had fallen in love with Pamela on sight and assumed a disguise of his own. After telling his contrived tale of being sent by a friend to serve Dametas, Musidorus, under the name Dorus, was taken by the chief herdsman as a servant.

Zelmane saved Philoclea from a savage lion, but in doing so he was discovered by Gynecia, the duke's wife, to be a man, she immediately fell in love with him. Dorus, meanwhile, saved Pamela from a bear. Before long both princesses began to become enamored of the disguised princes.

The Arcadian shepherds, as was their custom, met and exchanged poetic songs for their own entertainment and that of the duke's family and his guests. The songs, often accompanied by dancing, chiefly concerned the gods and the human passions. This occasion only increased the intensity of the tangle of love relationships that had so rapidly developed.

After the pastoral festival, Gynecia and Basilus both declared their love for Zelmane, and Philoclea was puzzled greatly by the strange passion she felt for the person she thought a woman. In the meantime Dorus pretended to be in love with Mopsa in order to be near Pamela, who in this manner became aware of his affection for her. He also managed, by subtle stories and poems, to reveal his true station to her.

Pyrocles, distressed by the advances of Basilus, revealed his true identity to Philoclea, who at first embraced him joyously but then became ashamed of her sudden show of affection. Gynecia, suspecting this attachment, was overcome with jealousy.

While Gynecia, having sent Philoclea home from a meeting with Pyrocles, was starting to tell the disguised prince of the depth of her love, they were attracted by some roving ruffians. Pyrocles, Basilus, and then Dorus with the aid of some shepherds drove off the attackers. This was only the prelude to an uprising by the citizens of a nearby Arcadian village, who had become enraged by the duke's seeming unconcern about his country. In an impassioned speech, however, Pyrocles convinced them of their error and stirred in them a renewed loyalty to Basilus. This triumph was celebrated by another pastoral entertainment, largely taken up with a poetic debate between Reason and Passion. Once more, the poems, dances, and stories served to increase the depth of the emotions felt by the royal party.

Dorus then told his friend of his moderate success with Pamela, whom he had urged to flee with him to Thessalia. Pyrocles, sharing Dorus' sorrow over their separation, decided to press his suit of Philoclea and to rid himself of the importunate demands of Basilus and Gynecia. When they renewed their entreaties, Pyrocles, still in his disguise and fearing to deny them outright, gave them hopeful but obscure answers.

Meanwhile, Dorus, having tricked Dametas and his family into leaving the lodge, had escaped with Pamela to a forest on the way to Thessalia. There they were set upon by a band of ruffians

The false Zelmane, hard pressed by Gynecia's declarations, was forced to pretend a deep passion for her, a situation which so distressed Philoclea that she kept to her room in the lodge, in profound sorrow. In order to be free to execute a plan to be alone with Philoclea, Pyrocles moved from the lodge to a dark cave not far away. He then took the duke and his wife aside separately and made an as signation with each at the same time in the cave.

When Basilius met Gynecia, who had dressed like Zelmane, in the cave, he failed to recognize his wife. Gynecia, ashamed of her actions, embraced him lovingly. Back at the lodge, Pyrocles, now in his own person, crept into Philoclea's room and, after a brief time, won her over and stayed the night.

Dametas, realizing that he had been tricked, began a search for Pamela. Entering the duke's lodge by a secret entrance, he discovered Philoclea and Pyrocles asleep. He left hastily to inform the local citizens of the treachery.

In the cave Gynecia, angered at her husband's praise of Zelmane, revealed her identity. Basilius, ashamed, repented his weakness, pledged renewed love to his wife, and drank a long draught from a cup of a mysterious beverage standing close by. The liquid was a potion, believed by Gynecia to be a love philter, which the duchess had brought to give to Zelmane. After drinking it, Basilius fell to the ground and appeared to die.

The duke's death being discovered, Philanax, with a troop of soldiers, imprisoned Gynecia, Pyrocles, and Philoclea.

The rogues who had attacked Dorus and Pamela, the remnant of the rebellious band which had earlier caused much trouble, overwhelmed the lovers and captured them. While in captivity, Musidorus revealed his actual name and rank. A short time later some of Philanax's soldiers, sent to search for Pamela, came upon the band and their prisoners. Recognizing the princess, the soldiers returned the entire group to Philanax, who put the lovers under restraint.

There was now a great turmoil, and many opinions and beliefs were exchanged as to the real guilt in the death of the duke and the disgrace of the princesses.

Hearing that Evarchus, King of Macedonia, had arrived in Arcadia to visit the duke, Philanax persuaded him to be the judge in the trial of the five people involved. Gynecia admitted her guilt and begged to be executed. Then Evarchus, not recognizing his son and his nephew because they had been away for such a long time, condemned the two princes to death and the princesses to milder punishments. Even after learning the true identity of the young men, Evarchus refused, from a deep sense of justice, to alter his verdict.

At that point Basilius, who had swallowed only a powerful sleeping potion, awoke. The young lovers and the duchess were promptly forgiven. Basilius pondered on how accurately the Oracle's prophecy had been fulfilled and how happily events had turned out. The princes and their loves, soon wed, assumed the high stations for which their rank fitted them.

John Barclay, the son of a Scot, was born in France, died in Italy, and wrote in Latin. His last work, Argenis, finished only a month before his death, became immediately popular and remained so for two centuries. Seven years after its publication it had been honored by three translations into English (the first, by Ben Jonson, in 1623, is, unfortunately, not extant), and as late as the nineteenth century it received the high praise of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Its original popularity was not due entirely to its artistic merits, however, for it was as satire that it first caught the fancy of readers on both sides of the Channel. Barclay had already a reputation as a satirist, but in Argenis the objects of his attacks are generalized behind a screen of allegory. The story of the love of Poliarthus and Argenis is supposed to represent the wars and intrigues in France before the Concordat under Henry IV. As revealed by the Clovis published in the edition of 1623, Sicily, the scene of the action, stands for France, with Argenis a personified symbol of the throne contested during the religious wars and Poliarthus and Archombrotus representing different aspects of Henry of Navarre (later Henry IV). Meleander is Henry III, Mauritania is England, Hyanisbe, Elizabeth, and Radiobanes, the rapacious and deceitful Philip of Spain. The whole work is aimed at opponents of the monarchical system. Although interest in the work as satire lasted only as long as the controversy over the divine right of kings remained a vital issue, Argenis was long praised for the grandeur of its expression, the nobility of its theme, the heroic stature of its characters. Today, however, only its historical interest remains; it stands with Honoré d'Urfé's L'Astrée as an interesting transitional work between the Greek influenced prose romances of the sixteenth century on the one hand, and the interminable French romances of La Calprenède and Mlle de Scudéry on the other.

Before the Mediterranean world had ever come under the dominance of Rome a young adventurer from Africa landed on the shores of Sicily and was met by a distraught lady who begged him to assist her friend, who was being attacked by thieves. The young man, who gave his name as Archombrotus, sped to the rescue only to find that his help was not needed: the lady's friend had dispatched the thieves singlehanded. The three returned to the lady's house where Archombrotus learned that the lady was Timoclea, a respected Sicilian matron, and that her friend was young Poliarthus, also a stranger to Sicily, who had distinguished himself in the service of King Meleander.

against a rebel army led by the traitorous noble, Lycogenes Poliarachus, having urged more forceful resistance to the rebellion, had been banished when the over cautious king declared a truce Meleander, Archombrotus learned, had a beautiful daughter, Argenis, Archombrotus concluded immediately that Poliarachus was in love with her

While engaged in their discussion, they noticed signal fires blazing on the surrounding hilltops Timoclea explained that these were beacons fired to warn the people that a traitor was at large Presently a servant entered with word that Poliarachus was the one accused of treachery, the "thieves" had been Lycogenes' ambassadors, and the king had interpreted his defense as an attempt to break the truce Timoclea, loyal to her guest, hid him immediately in a cave on her estate and then sent for his friend Arsidas, the Governor of Messina Arsidas arrived promptly, and he and Poliarachus' servant, Gelanorus, devised a plan whereby it was given out that Poliarachus had been drowned after a fall from his horse Arsidas hastened to Argenis to tell her, secretly, the truth so that she should not be distracted by false news of Poliarachus' death

Meanwhile, rustics on Timoclea's estate mistook Archombrotus for Poliarachus, seized him, and carried him off to the king Meleander, realizing their mistake, took Archombrotus into his council but praised the peasants for their loyalty At the same time, Arsidas arranged to have Argenis see Poliarachus As a priestess of Pallas presiding over the sacrifice to celebrate the truce, she was to insist that the common people be allowed to worship the goddess beforehand, and Poliarachus was to come before her in the dress of a peasant Thus the lovers were briefly united Poliarachus then fled with Arsidas to Italy Argenis, throwing herself into a frenzy, claimed that the goddess would not honor the sacrifice or the truce

he was almost drowned when his coach driven by a rebel spy plunged into the river, but he was saved by Archombrotus, who was thus made secure in his favor

The war going badly for the king, Archombrotus convinced him that their only hope lay in the return of the champion Poliarachus The king sent a precious brooch to Poliarachus as a peace offering, however, spies of Lycogenes poisoned the brooch, and the rebel sent his own messenger with a letter warning Poliarachus that the brooch was fatal If the king's messenger arrived first, Poliarachus would be dead, if Lycogenes', he would become an enemy of the king—either way Lycogenes would no longer have to fear him

But Poliarachus and his servant Gelanorus had already left for Sicily Shipwrecked off the coast they were rudely hauled aboard a pirate craft The two routed the pirates and turned the ship over to its rightful owner

Discovering among the pirate treasure jewels and letters belonging to Queen Hyansbe of Mauritania, Poliarachus immediately ordered the ship to Mauritania so that he could return the royal property The queen was delighted, for the letters concerned the whereabouts of her knight errant son She ordered a celebration which would have continued indefinitely had not Poliarachus been anxious to return to his beloved But in spite of his anxiety, he was forced to stay when smitten by an attack of the ague Gelanorus was dispatched with letters in his stead

In the meantime, at Epercte, Meleander's situation was becoming untenable When matters seemed hopeless, the tremendous fleet of Radiobanes, King of Sardinia, arrived to help defend the rights of the monarch against rebel upstarts The combined forces of Meleander and Radiobanes routed the army of Lycogenes, and Archombrotus slew the rebel leader in single combat

The rebellion ended, Archombrotus became the king's favorite Having fallen in love with Argenis, during the siege, and with Poliarachus gone, he thought himself

the foremost claimant for her hand But Radirobanes also announced his claim to the hand of the princess Meleander was in a quandary Archombrotus was his favorite, but both gratitude and the armed fleet in the harbor lent weight to Radirobanes' cause Meleander solved the problem by leaving the decision up to Argenis The Sardinian ruler advanced his plea, the Sicilian princess rebuffed him Radirobanes then gained the confidence of Argenis' nurse and companion, Selenissa, who in nightly installments told him the following story

Lycogenes had also demanded Argenis and, being refused, had threatened to abduct her To forestall his design, Meleander had his daughter, along with Selenissa and certain young ladies of her court, placed in an inaccessible and heavily guarded castle While they were thus secluded, a beautiful stranger who gave her name as Theocrine came to Selenissa and begged sanctuary Admitted to the castle, she shared the chamber of the princess When Lycogenes' men stormed the castle, Theocrine seized a sword and put the attackers to flight The supposed Theocrine was in reality Polarchus, who, having heard of the beauty of Argenis, had used that disguise to be near her When he begged forgiveness, Argenis immediately fell in love with him He had then disappeared, to return later in Meleander's service The king, convinced that Theocrine was warlike Pallas, had dedicated his daughter to the service of that beautiful, austere goddess

Despairing of winning the princess by fair means, Radirobanes planned to black mail her into acceptance of his proposal, but Selenissa persuaded him that abduction would be the better course But Argenis, having overheard part of Selenissa's betrayal, feigned an illness that kept her inaccessible, thereby frustrating Radirobanes' plans Thwarted, Radirobanes returned with his fleet to Sardinia, leaving with Meleander a letter informing him of the true identity of Theocrine and demanding payment of three hundred tal ents for his aid When Meleander confronted his daughter with the information he had received, she denied any untoward dealings in the affair Meleander, only half believing her, demanded that she marry Archombrotus Selenissa seeing the damage she had done, killed herself, and Timoclea succeeded her as chief lady of the household

Meanwhile, Polarchus, having recovered from his illness, had returned in disguise to Sicily Seeing no chance of amicable dealings with Meleander, he asked Argenis to delay her marriage to Archombrotus while he found some means to settle the matter Then he sailed away Weeks passed and he failed to return Finally Argenis sent Arsidias to find him with letters pleading for his return

Arsidas' ship was wrecked however and he was rescued and taken aboard the leading ship of a great war fleet Cohnias, the captain, received Arsidias hospitably and informed him that the fleet belonged to the King of France, who was preparing to attack Sicily The king himself was commanding the flagship, which was leading the second half of the fleet

To entertain his guest, Cohnias told him the strange history of the French ruler, King Astoristes—how his mother had kept his birth a secret so that he would not be murdered in a rebellion that was going on at the time, how he had been reared by foster parents, had proved himself a hero in battle, and had finally been revealed as the true prince how he had heard of the beauty of the Sicilian princess, Argenis, and had sojourned in Sicily under the name of Polarchus to win her, and how now—as king, the old king having died in his absence—he was sailing to claim her

Arsidas immediately identified himself as Polarchus' friend and offered his assistance Cohnias was delighted, but before the two halves of the fleet could establish a rendezvous, a terrible storm came up, driving each part to a different point on the African coast The flotilla commanded by the French king found safety in the harbor of Mauritania, and once again Astionistes, the one time Poliarchus, was entertained by Hyanisbe. His arrival was most fortunate, for Radiobanes was threatening Mauritania. Hyanisbe had sent for her son, Hyempisal, who was at the court of King Meleander in Sicily, but he had not yet returned. When the Sardinian troops arrived, they were repulsed by the French. Poliarchus and Radiobanes met in single combat, and the Sardinian ruler was slain. Disheartened, his followers were routed, but Poliarchus was injured and again confined in Mauritania.

Returning belatedly to his mother's defense, Hyempisal turned out to be Archombrotus. Hyanisbe was dismayed when she found that her son and her protector were enemies, but when she learned the cause of their quarrel she was relieved and she wrote to Meleander a letter which, she promised, would end their difficulties.

While Astionistes was recovering from his wounds, Hyempisal led a successful expedition to Sardinia. Then the two returned to Sicily and presented Hyanisbe's sealed letter to Meleander. The message proved as effective as Hyanisbe had promised. Hyempisal, it was revealed, was the son of Meleander and the king's secret first wife, Hyanisbe's sister. Thus he was both the heir to the Sicilian throne and Argenis' half brother. Since there was now no obstacle to the marriage of Argenis and Astionistes, Meleander gave them his blessing, the wedding took place at once, and an epithalamium was written by the courtier poet Nicopompus.

A PEASANT GIRL

Critique

Hartmann von Aue, a knight in the service of a Swabian nobleman and one of the first truly German writers, received his education in monastery schools. Later he traveled in France and translated many French poems into Middle High German. The death of his much admired master in 1195 was the chief reason for his participation in a crusade in Palestine, possibly in 1197. This experience revealed the basic conflict of his life, the struggle to choose between the pen and the sword. The presence of secular and religious elements in Der arme Heinrich mirrors the author's dilemma as knight and poet in one person. Regardless of the existence of other legends embodied in the story, Der arme Heinrich is considered one of the earliest forms of original German literature. The poem shows the influence of martyr legends popular at the time, especially in the inspired speech of the heroine, a simple peasant girl. The writer also displays remarkable ability for characterization and gives the reader a vivid picture of medieval life and thinking. Hartmann von Aue is regarded as the founder of the German court epic, surpassed only by that master of the chivalric romance, Wolfram von Eschenbach (c. 1170 c. 1220).

Heinrich von Aue, a Swabian knight, was a fortunate man. Wealthy and of noble birth, he was known throughout the land for his high standard of honor. Fulfillment of his obligations as a knight was his goal, nothing but purest virtue and upright truth marked his life.

Suddenly, however, all his happiness was blighted by a terrible disaster. Heinrich became leprous. As in the case of Job in ancient times, his physical appearance deteriorated rapidly, but he did not have the patience of Job. All his life seemed a curse to him, and his pride left him without friends. His cheerful nature vanished, he detested even the light of day. Only one thing kept him alive, the hope of a cure for his terrible disease.

Trying to find a cure for his malady, he searched out the most famous doctors in all Europe. The school of Montpellier was known for its able doctors and so he went hopefully to that place, only to learn that there was no medicine to heal him. Disappointed, he traveled to Salerno, where he talked to many skilled physicians. At last he met a master who told him that he could be healed, yet the cure itself would be of such a nature that it would be impossible to achieve it, therefore the doctor preferred not to talk about it.

Desperately, Heinrich begged the doctor to reveal his remedy. After some hesitation the physician yielded and told the knight that he could be cured only by the heart's blood of a virgin who would submit willingly, out of love, to a fatal operation.

Heinrich, realizing the hopelessness of his situation, returned sadly to Swabia. All his worldly belongings he gave to the poor and to the monks. Of his land and estates, he kept no more than a clearing in a wood where a poor but contented peasant lived. When Heinrich decided to live in his house in the wood, the peasant and his family did all they could to ease the suffering of the leprous man. Loving the knight, they were concerned for his health because they realized that they would never find such a good master again. The young daughter of the peasant was, in particular, deeply moved by Heinrich's suffering.

One day the peasant asked why the doctors had been unable to help his master. Heinrich told him of the visit to Salerno and described the impossible cure of which the doctor had spoken. The young girl overheard this tale. Late that same evening she told her parents that she wanted to be the virgin who could save their master's life. Her parents were horrified when they heard her request and her father threatened physical punishment if she dared to mention the subject again. But the next evening the girl began to talk once more of her desire to help the leprous knight. She spoke in such a convincing manner that her parents did not interrupt her but listened in amazement as their daughter begged with heart-moving words to be allowed to gain the eternal life which would be assured her. She spoke also of the uncertainty her earthly life offered, of the catastrophe which could befall the whole family if their master should die and a harsh ruler scourge the countryside. At last she was able to convince her parents that her service to God and her master would be the only honorable thing to do, and sorrowfully they gave their consent to her intended sacrifice.

Very early the next morning she told the unbelieving Heinrich of her willingness to offer herself for his cure. He warned her that she should not talk lightly about such a subject and assured her that she would soon forget her impulsive idea. After the parents confirmed the seriousness of their daughter's wish, Heinrich took a long time to consider her offer. Finally he too yielded to her pleas.

Beautiful clothes and furs and a fine horse were bought for the girl, and at last she and Heinrich set out on their journey to Salerno. When the doctor there heard from Heinrich that the girl was willing to sacrifice herself in that fashion, he doubted the knight's words and took the girl aside to implore her to speak the truth by telling him whether she was ready of her own free will to face so horrible a fate. Impressed by her sincerity and beauty, the doctor declared that he would be much happier not to take her heart's blood. Still the girl remained steadfast and begged the doctor to proceed with the operation at once.

Sitting in a neighboring room Heinrich heard the doctor sharpening his knife. The knight peered through a small hole in the wall and saw the girl tied to a table. For the first time he realized how beautiful she was, and he bitterly accused himself of trying to circumvent the judgment of God by sacrificing the girl's beauty to his ugliness. At the very last moment he was able to stop the doctor before an incision had been made. Although the girl implored him not to become weak and called him a coward, a man without the courage of a true

During the journey back the grace of God touched Heinrich and rapidly his leprosy disappeared; he and the girl had passed the test given to them by God. Heinrich looked younger and handsomer than ever before. The rumor of his miraculous cure having spread throughout the countryside, Heinrich's vassals came to meet the travelers two days before they arrived at their destination. The happy parents of the girl were the first to meet them, and all thanked God for her deliverance and the knight's cure.

In spite of the peasant girl's low birth, the council of knights agreed that the hand of God had surely chosen her to become Heinrich's wife. All in the land, rich and poor, rejoiced when Heinrich and the girl were wed.

ARS POETICA

Type of work Poem on critical theory

Author Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus, 65-8 B.C.)

First transcribed 13-8 B.C.

To Horace, this poem was the last of his Epistles, but almost at once his contemporaries began referring to it as Ars Poetica (The Art of Poetry) and by "poetry" they meant any field of literary composition. Horace addressed it to his friend Lucius Calpurnius Piso, famous for his battles in Thrace, and to his two sons. Apparently the older son yearned for a career as dramatist or epic poet. Whether he was deterred, and kept his work unpublished for nine years, or whether his assassination while a praetor in Spain was the reason, no writing has survived bearing his name.

While not a formal treatise or abstract discussion, like the similarly named composition of Aristotle, the 476 lines of this unsystematic letter in verse influenced Joachim du Bellay (c. 1524-1560) in writing the manifesto of the Pleiad, and a century later inspired Boileau's L'Art poétique (1674) and Pope's Essay on

Criticism (1711). Some of Horace's suggestions, like the classical five-act division of the drama, are no longer important, but today's writers still can learn much from the rest of the poem. The double purpose of literature, a mingling of "the useful with the sweet," has been quoted through the centuries in every literary movement.

One would be amused rather than impressed, begins Horace, by the painting of a creature with a horse's body and a man's head, with limbs from every sort of animal, adorned with feathers from a variety of birds. Yet poets combine just such outlandish elements, adding "purple patches" where they are entirely out of place in order to give color and brilliance to pompous openings in portions of their writing. Therefore he begins his Art of Poetry with a plea for simplicity and unity.

Horace confesses that most poets are misled by what looks like truth. When striving for brevity, the poet becomes unintelligible. Attempts to write smoothly result in loss of vigor and spirit. Aiming at grandeur, he becomes bombastic. Only when he is guided by art can a writer avoid some errors without committing worse ones. The remedy, therefore, is to select subjects equal to one's ability and to use appropriate language. Old words, properly used, seem new, new words, borrowed from the Greeks, may also have a place. Man is admired for making over nature when he builds harbors or drains marshes. Usage, then, should maintain or change the material and rules of speech.

Homer, according to Horace, showed the writer how to handle the deeds of kings and sad tales of war. No one is sure who invented the elegiac couplet, but Archilochus devised the iambus, used in tragic and comic drama, and since it was born of rage, it is designed to record man in action. The Muses gave the lyric for singing about victories, lovers, and gay banquets. All these meters have their specific uses and the poets would do well to employ them only in their appropriate places, though sometimes a writer of comedy may borrow from other forms of poetic art or an author of tragedies set aside his sesquipedalian words in favor of shorter ones to touch the hearts of his audience.

Feeling is the true test of literary worth, for beauty of writing is not enough. Unless a writer feels, he cannot make his audience feel. One style of writing goes with a gloomy face, another sort goes with an angry one, or a playful one. Nature first makes us reveal our feelings physically, then with the tongue for an interpreter she voices the emotions of the heart. There is also a difference in language between the gods and men, between old men and young, between merchants and farmers, among Colchians, Assyrians, and Thebans.

Either follow tradition or be consistent in your inventions, Horace advises Achilles on the stage must be hot tempered, appealing to the sword rather than to the law. Follow tradition and make Medea haughty, Ino tearful, and Ixion perjured. If the writer presents original characters, he must keep them consistent. Do not let them be too bombastic or promise too much out of prudent fear that the mountain in labor will bring forth no more than a ridiculous mouse.

If the writer wishes the applause of his audience, he must paint accurately the characteristics of the four ages of man. The young boy is unsettled and changing; the beardless youth is fond of horses and dogs, boastful, scornful of advice in middle age, man is ambitious but cautious; and the old man is surrounded by discomfort. Do not, therefore, attribute the wrong qualities to a stage of human life.

In touching lightly on the rules laid down by classical dramatists, Horace believed in the superiority of showing action rather than telling about it, but there are, he adds, things too horrible to be seen. He comments on the number of actors—only three—and the place of the chorus. He comments on the rules and restraints of satyric drama. Then after an appeal that Greek, not Roman tastes be followed in selecting verse forms, he embarks on a history of the theater.

Slightly confused, he gives Theophrastus credit for inventing the tragedy and traveling in a cart to put on plays in which the faces of actors were stained by dregs of wine. Then came Aeschylus, with the invention of the raised stage, the mask, and the buskins. Old comedy followed, soon to degenerate into license, and the chorus lost its role of abuse.

Roman playwrights, he continues, tried all forms of drama, but most were not successful because they were careless. Horace adjures his student reader to condemn any literary composition that has not been erased and amended. Even genius cannot discard rules. Characterizing himself, he says that he is too lazy to be a genius, he will perform his duty and criticize

Answering the question of what to write, Horace declares that knowledge is the basis of good writing and that moral philosophy will supply matter. Life and manners should also occupy a writer's attention. The purpose of the poet should be to benefit and entertain. "He has received the votes who has mingled the useful and the sweet, by instructing and delighting the reader at the same time."

People do not always expect perfection from a poet. Some faults can be pardoned, for even Homer failed at times, though usually he excelled in his craft. But continued carelessness is unforgivable, and eternally second rate material cannot be tolerated. A person who cannot play the game should keep off the field unless he craves the jeers of the spectators. If you write something, he told Piso's son, let the censor of plays see it, then show it to your father and me. Afterward, keep it in your desk for nine years. What you have not published, you can always destroy.

Horace, Orpheus represented the dignity of poets who, by their wisdom, distinguished between public and private property, divine and earthly things, lore and law. By their songs, they won honor. Homer and Tyrtæus inspired men to battle, oracles guided men by their verses. It is a question for debate whether a poet is born or made, but at any rate, without art and study even a genius will fail.

The best of writers need criticism, but they should avoid mere flatterers. One good critic used to mark, for improvement and reworking, lines in poems submitted to him, and if the would-be poet defended his mistakes, the critic had no more to do with him. The honest critic puts black marks before poor verses as Aristarchus did to Homer. Self-willed poets will not like such treatment, comments Horace, but in that case they are not worth trying to save. They are probably mad, each one, like a bear, clawing at an innocent bystander. Such a poet will be your death, reading you his poetry.

Some books seem to have a universal value that transcends the time in which they were written. Others seem to be particularly representative of their epoch, and eventually stand as a milestone in the development of a genre. Artamene, ou le grand Cyrus belongs to the latter category. It consists of ten volumes, each in two books. In spite of its length, it has a remarkable unity of interest, if not of plot. The story is centered around the pursuit of Mandane by Cyrus, Mandane being constantly abducted by various other suitors. The author indulges in lengthy stories within the story. These successive stories are ingeniously knitted together, one character being introduced casually in one, and being caught up with later in another. The organization of the novel is such that it is actually quite difficult to read only parts of it and still understand it. This type of novel was expected to provide a pastime, in the literal sense of the word. Although this may seem ironic in view of its length, Artamene fulfilled this purpose. It provided noble sentiments together with a little learning. It is still possible to understand why it was such a great success.

Cyrus, son of the King of Persia, had been given away as a child to a shepherd who was ordered to kill the infant because his grandfather had been told by an omen that his grandson would eventually kill him. Instead, the shepherd had reared the boy to manhood and now, under the name of Artamene, he was the best general of Cyaxares, King of Cappadocia. He was also secretly in love with Mandane, Cyaxares' daughter.

The kings of Cappadocia and of Pontus had decided to settle a dispute between themselves by a combat, using two hundred men on each side. Artamène had been given the command of the Cappadocian warriors, to the great disappointment of his explosive rival, Philidaspes. Although all the odds were against him, Artamène was the only survivor and won the victory for the Cappadocians.

He discovered however that Philidaspes was also in love with Mandane. They had a violent fight and Cyaxares, unaware of the real cause of the quarrel, had them both put in prison.

There were other great battles fought, and Artamene, now out of prison, was again victorious. Then he disappeared and was believed dead. This was the occasion for Mandane to confess her love for him to her confidante, Martesie, a thing she had never dared do before. Eventually Artamene returned. He accidentally learned that Philidaspes was actually the prince of Assyria heir to the throne of his mother Nitocris, and that he was plotting to take Mandane away. The King of Pontus had also become a new rival for the love of Mandane. To make matters worse, Thomyris, Queen of Scythia, who had never loved before, had fallen in love with Artamene the moment she saw him when he was sent on a mission to her court.

Philidaspes, now King of Assyria, had succeeded in taking Mandane to Babylon, where he pleaded with her to love him or at least to let him hope that she would, some day, accept his suit.

Meanwhile, Artamene sent in pursuit of Mandane. He had laid siege to mighty Babylon but Philidaspes managed to escape to Sinope with Mandane and Mazare, the chivalrous prince of Sion. Sinope was set afire and while the Assyrian king was locked up in a tower, Mazare took Mandane away to sea. A shipwreck brought her to the fortress of the King of Pontus.

When Cyaxares arrived at Sinope and failed to find his daughter, he also discovered that Artamène was in love with her. However, he still did not know the hero's real identity, and he was about to have him executed when the army assailing the castle rescued Artamène and proclaimed him as Cyrus.

When Cyrus set out to get Mandane back, Philidaspes insisted on a paradoxical alliance in order to rescue their common love. They besieged Sardis and captured two hostages, Panthea, the wife of Abradantes, one of the enemy rulers, and Araminta, the sister of the Queen of Pontus. Unfortunately this action provoked Mandane's jealousy, and in a letter she accused Cyrus of using her as a mere pretext to further his ambition. She was particularly jealous of Araminta, whose lover Spithridates resembled Cyrus and could easily have been mistaken for him. Cyrus, with his best paladins, managed to enter Sardis, but Mandane was gone, carried away by the King of Pontus, and perhaps not unwillingly. The hunt for Mandane had to be resumed. Philidaspes stole away to search for Mandane by himself.

Cyrus then learned that the King of Pontus had taken Mandane to Cumae, a place protected by marshes and open to the sea on which she had so often been taken away from him. Meanwhile, the Queen of Corinth, who had conceived a romantic but platonic admiration for Cyrus, sent her fleet to help him. Martesie wrote that Mandane was at last no longer jealous, for Panthea had killed herself over the dead body of her husband, and Araminta had been taken away against her will by Prince Phraortes. Spithridates was desperate.

Cumae was captured and the lovers met at last. A certain Anaxoris had been instrumental in keeping Mandane from being carried away from Cumae. When Philidaspes turned up again to keep watch on Cyrus, he later entrusted Anaxoris with his secret, asking him to take care of Mandane should anything happen to him. Anaxoris, however, was actually Aryante, the prince of the Massagetae, and brother of Thomyris, the formidable Scythian queen. Aryante surrendered Mandane to his sister, and Cyrus went to fight Thomyris.

Spargapises, the son of Thomyris, considering himself disgraced because he had not been recognized when he was captured in battle, killed himself. Thomyris then threatened Cyrus by declaring that she would deliver Mandane's dead body to him unless he surrendered unconditionally. Aryante, not wishing to have Mandane murdered or to have Cyrus near her, sent him a message begging him not to surrender. A tremendous battle followed in which Cyrus set fire to some forests between the two armies. The unfortunate Spithridates, clad in a suit of armor given to him by Cyrus, was mistaken for Cyrus and was killed. His head was taken to Thomyris. Unfortunately, she was not the only one who was mistaken. Cyrus' troops gave up the fight and he was seized by an ally of Thomyris, but his captor later allowed him to escape because of his admiration for his noble prisoner. Cyrus escaped, but only after many difficulties. Thomyris then ordered Mandane killed, but a maid of honor was mistaken for her and killed in her place. Meanwhile, the queen's allies were preparing to desert her. When Cyrus' faithful friends arrived, she fled.

Now Cyrus and Mandane were free to wed, except that an ancient law stated that a prince or princess could not marry a foreigner. But an oracle declared that he who had conquered every kingdom in Asia could not be considered a foreigner in any of them. Thus, to the satisfaction of all concerned, the last obstacle to their union was cleared away.

Critique

Aleksei Maksimovich Peshkov, whose pseudonym was Maxim Gorky (the bitter one), was the son of poor parents and received no formal education. By the time he was nine years old he was earning his own living. During his long wanderings across Russia he educated himself and gained knowledge of all types of people. About 1900 he became a Marxist and was arrested for revolutionary activities. He was exiled in 1906 to Capri, but was permitted to return in 1913. In 1918 he joined the Bolshevik revolution and became one of the best known writers of Communist Russia. His novels first excited Russian intellectuals but were popular with the masses after the revolution. In spite of his predominantly political influence he was not able to eliminate elements of romanticism in his novels, as is shown in his presentation of the pre-revolution characters of the The Artamonov Business. The author is here still far away from a purely socialistic novel, and he does not attempt to discard the strong influence which orthodox Christianity exercised on his heroes. As a description of the social climate in one particular Russian town before the revolution the novel is successful in its effects, however, if the writer intended also to make a plea for the revolutionary cause, it is not, on this thematic level, wholly convincing.

A year or so after the liberation of the Russian serfs Ilia Artamonov arrived with his two sons, Peter and Nikita, and Alexey, his nephew and adopted son, in the little town of Dromov along the Vartaksha River. Ilia Artamonov had served as a bailiff to a prince, and the nobleman had recommended him highly to the authorities. Without giving the mayor of Dromov, Evgeny Baimakov, a chance for objections, Artamonov announced that he planned to build a linen factory and that he considered the mayor's daughter Natalia a good wife for his oldest son Artamonov, disregarding the resentment his dictatorial behavior provoked in the town, went ahead with plans for the factory and preparations for Peter's marriage. The mayor, who died before the wedding, advised his wife Uliana to let Artamonov have his way. But Peter's marriage to the mayor's daughter and the prospect of employment for many citizens did not reduce the enmity felt toward the intruders.

When Uliana Baimakov became Ilia's mistress, she decided to live with the Artamonovs on the other side of the river where the factory was located. Ilia tried to be a strict but humane superior to his men. Among his workers, Tikhon Vialov was the most able, although he begged not to be promoted because he did not want to supervise others. Meanwhile, Nikita, the hunchback, had fallen in love with Natalia, and when he overheard an unkind remark she made about him, he tried to hang himself. The attempt failing, Nikita entered a monastery.

The factory developed rapidly under Ilia's direction. Peter was the second in charge Alexey, unhappy at the factory, wanted to join the army, but Ilia refused to give him permission to enlist

When Natalia bore her first child, the baby died after five months. Another girl, Elena, followed. Then a much desired son, also named Ilia, was born. Alexey married a woman nobody in the family liked or understood.

During the transportation of a heavy steam boiler Ilia senior suffered a hemorrhage and died soon afterward. As time passed, Peter's only true happiness was his son. Against his wife's wishes he let Ilia attend a good secondary school away from Dromov. While Peter devoted his time almost exclusively to the factory, Alexey made the necessary business trips to trade fairs and to Moscow. Although Natalia gave birth to a second boy, Yakov, Ilia remained Peter's favorite.

In spite of all efforts to prepare Ilia as Peter's successor as the factory director, his son showed a completely different attitude. He liked to talk to Vialov, the philosopher among the workers, whom Peter despised, and he also formed a close friendship with an uneducated child of a worker. When Ilia, after completing his schooling, announced his desire to become a historian, his father objected because he still wanted Ilia to take over the factory. Ilia refused and left Dromov without receiving any financial assistance from his father. Thereafter Peter became an unhappy man, his wife could not please him, and he tried to find distraction with a local prostitute.

Often Peter had difficulty in controlling his temper, and one day he accidentally killed Ilia's former playmate Vialov, too, irritated him with philosophizing whenever he had a question to ask. Hoping to find some spiritual guidance, Peter finally decided to visit his brother Nikita in the monastery. Nikita explained that he had failed in his efforts to become a good monk. Although he considered himself unworthy, the monastery valued him highly because he was able to give visiting pilgrims some comfort

When Peter failed to find peace of mind with Nikita, he attended a trade fair in a nearby city. Alexey had told him so many exciting stories about city life that he hoped to find distraction there. After a series of extended drinking sprees and orgiastic behavior with prostitutes, he was finally discovered by Alexey, who had heard from a friend of the family about Peter's disgraceful behavior. Back home, Peter heard rumors that his son had become a member of a revolutionary extremist party. He also detected unusual new ideas in Alexey's son Miron. Only his younger son, Yakov, seemed unconcerned about the new ideas that were spreading among workers. Yakov was not good looking, however, Peter considered his interests, mainly girls, more normal than all the ideas expressed by the others, ideas which he believed a threat to the factory.

The rapid growth of the factory had brought a large settlement of workers to Dromov, along with many hardship cases. Peter tried to show his interest in his workers by building a new hospital or arranging a big party for them.

Alexey died suddenly. A telegram was sent to summon Nikita, but he had left the monastery. Only Vialov knew his address. After the funeral Nikita and Vialov were seen together frequently. Peter's feelings grew against all people who did not think primarily of the factory, and when Nikita died four days before the outbreak of World War I, he had no kind word for his dying brother.

When Peter grew too old for most of the factory work and Yakov took over in his place, Yakov also became concerned over the growing signs of unrest among the workers. One worker, who spied for him in the factory, became his oppressor. Early in the war many workers were drafted. Some returned, crippled, to the factory. Yakov's fear of being killed by his workers increased rapidly. With his mistress Pauline, a girl of easy virtue and expensive tastes, he planned to go away. Trying to avoid suspicion, he let Pauline leave Dromov first. His own plan was to meet her in Moscow with all the money he could raise. But he never arrived in Moscow. Reports reached Dromov that he had been robbed, killed, and thrown from the train.

Peter, who had tried to ignore all rumors about uprisings and a new way of life for the workers, lived in a state of semicomatose and asked constantly the whereabouts of Ilia and Yakov. He failed to realize what was going on around him until one day, he felt a sharp sense of hunger and realized that he was in his garden house. Outside he saw a soldier. When Peter called for his wife, only Vialov came. He explained that Peter was a prisoner.

At first Peter thought Vialov was jeering at him. Later he believed that he had been taken prisoner because someone had learned the truth about the death of Ilia's former playmate. Vialov tried in vain to inform him about the revolution which had taken place and to explain that he was still alive only because of Ilia's influence. Peter thought Vialov had gone mad. When Natalia arrived with a cucumber and a piece of bread, Peter considered himself insulted that she dared offer him such meager food when he was so hungry. Angrily he threw the food away and with abusive words asked her to leave him alone.

ASH WEDNESDAY

First published 1930

After the publication of The Waste Land, in 1922, had established his reputation as a major poet, T. S. Eliot wrote one important poem, "The Hollow Men" (1925), which seemed at that time to be a postlude to its predecessor but which now appears more as a prelude to Ash Wednesday. In any case, it should be read as a connecting link between the two longer poems. Its theme is the emptiness of modern intellectualism, which amounts only to Shape without form, shade without colour,

Paralysed force, gesture without motion

It is another aspect of the Waste Land, desiccated and meaningless, inhabited only by the empty and futile hollow men.

Ash Wednesday marks an important point in the author's poetic development, for it sprang directly from his acceptance of the Anglo-Catholic faith. This biographical aspect of the poem, even more than its theme, influenced its reception by Eliot's former admirers and caused a schism among them that gave an interesting insight into the modern mind.

The tone of the poem is the humility appropriate to Ash Wednesday, the first day of the penitential season of Lent; its theme is the dilemma of the modern man who wants to believe and who yet cannot bring himself to do so because of his dry, sterile intellectuality. This theme is stated in the first of the six parts: the poet, turning his irony upon himself, describes this characteristically modern predicament of a man caught in the web of his own intellectualizing but who can yet know that he must pray that I may forget These matters that with myself I too much discuss Too much explain, and that at this stage of religious experience the proper prayer is Teach us to sit still

Throughout this opening section sound the echoes of the Penitential Office "Turn thou us, O good Lord, and so shall we be turned" as well as of Guido Cavalcanti's poem, "In Exile at Sarzana"

The second part is based on a reminiscence of the Valley of Dry Bones described by Ezekiel, the language of which it echoes. Eliot once said in a lecture that the three white leopards could be taken as representing the World, the Flesh, and the Devil. They have fed on the body of the speaker, but Ezekiel was told to prophesy that these bones should live again, that "I [the Lord] shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land." There is also the figure of the Lady, who seems to play a role analogous to that of Beatrice as an intermediary: she is dressed in white, the color of Faith. The speaker, then, having been stripped of everything, has learned resignation but through the intercession of the Lady and the prophecy of Ezekiel he has found hope.

The third section, with its description of the spiral stairway, obviously recalls Dante's winding ascent of the Purgatorial Mount. There seems to be no direct connection with any particular canto of the Purgatorio, only a linking of the journey of purgation with the penitential spirit of Lent. There is also the glimpse through the window of a scene suggestive of sensual pleasure that distracts the pilgrim from his journey. Dante is again recalled in the fourth section, this time by the Earthly Paradise and the Divine Pageant at the end of the Purgatorio. Again there are echoes of St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians and of the "Salve Regina."

For the fifth section Eliot made use of a sermon by Lancelot Andrews that he had already quoted in an essay on the Bishop: "the Word of an Infant? The Word and not be able to speak a word?"—an elaborate play upon the word (speech), the Word (the Logos, the most abstruse of Christian doctrines), and the Word made Flesh.

The last section, doubling back upon the opening lines of the poem, suggests a scene in a confessional ("Bless me father") during which the beauty of the natural world intrudes into the mind of the speaker and distracts him from his proper meditation. Thus, the world seeks to draw us back to itself. Then, appropriately, the poem ends with words taken, with one slight change, from the Penitential Office for Ash Wednesday in the Book of Common Prayer:

And let my cry come unto Thee

Thus, the poem deals with various aspects of a certain stage in religious experience. "Lord, I am not worthy", it is a poem of spiritual, as Cavalcanti's was one of physical, exile. The dweller in the Waste Land who "cannot drink/there, where trees flower, and springs flow must find his way back through penitence, with the humble prayer "Suffer me not to be separated."

This is a simpler poem than The Waste Land, though Eliot used much the same technical devices of ellipsis and echoes. It rises to heights of verbal beauty unequalled in any other contemporary verse. Its reception, however, was curious and not without irony. To many readers of the 1920's, Eliot had become the spokesman for the disillusionment of the now famous "lost generation"—a statement that he himself characterized as "nonsense" in 1930, with its Marxian enthusiasm for proletarian literature, was probably the high point of the secular humanism of our time. Bertrand Russell's A Free Man's Worship was dominant. It was among the adherents to this secular humanism that Eliot's greatest admirers were to be found. For him to become a member of the Anglican Church and to write a poem with a deeply religious theme was to them a grievous shock.

Some of them flatly refused to believe in his sincerity, his membership in the Church of England must be a pose, a kind of romantic, aesthetic Catholicism. To others, to whom religion was a retreat from reality, a "failure of nerve," he was a lost leader, a writer whose significant work had ended with 'The Hollow Men.' Yet it might not be an exaggeration to claim that the publication of 4th Wednesday marked the beginning of the swing from the intellectual Left to Right, with the consequent decline of the secular humanist attitude.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

MR MEREDITH, Franklin's partner in the print shop

ALEXANDER HAMILTON

GOVERNOR MORRIS

Addressing himself to his "Dear Son," Benjamin Franklin first began in Twyford, England, at the age of sixty-five, to set down reminiscences of his early days. For years he had been collecting data about his ancestors, who had lived in Ecton, Northamptonshire, as far back as 1555, the oldest date of the town records, and he thought that his son William Franklin (1731-1813) would someday be interested in the "circumstances" of his father's life, just as Franklin had delighted in anecdotes relating to his family.

The work was composed in installments, the first section, dealing with Franklin's first twenty-four years, the product of a week of leisure in England in 1771. Then, because of his political activities abroad and at home, he had no further opportunity to continue his task until the urgings of friends persuaded him to resume his writing in 1783. The final section was probably written between November, 1789, and April, 1790. Titled Memoires, it was first printed in

In spite of the lengthy period of composition, only Franklin's life before July 1757, is covered, with a few comments on his activities in the following year. But the failure to complete the Autobiography beyond his fifty-first year does not mean that Franklin failed to write of his activities over the next thirty years. Some of his most important diplomatic missions are reported in individual compositions, such as the sample he showed to Jefferson of the "history of my life" that he said he was preparing. They cover "Negotiations in London for Effecting a Reconciliation between Great Britain and the American Colonies" and the "Journal of the Negotiations for Peace with Great Britain from March 21st to July 1st, 1782."

In addition, this indefatigable letter writer filled his correspondence (in many ways the most interesting part of his writing) with details and sketches. Some of the most complete are the letters to his wife, whom he addressed as "My dear Child" By combining the correspondence chronologically, a biographer can obtain Franklin's personal reactions to practically everything that happened to him These letters show Franklin as the first real American who stood apart from European influences

The Franklin family, whose ancestors had lived in the Northamptonshire village of Ecton from the time they assumed a surname originally signifying a middle class landowner, was transplanted to Boston about 1682, when Benjamin's father Josiah brought his wife and several children to Massachusetts After his wife's death, the older Franklin remarried Benjamin, born of the second marriage, was the youngest son of seventeen children

Fond of study and quickly learning to read, Benjamin was destined for the ministry until his father, a tallow candler and soap boiler by trade, began calculating the cost of education and the pitiable salary received by most ministers So the boy was taken out of school to learn a trade After a brief period as his father's assistant he was, at the age of twelve, apprenticed to his half brother James, a printer In his brother's shop he saw his first writing in print, topical ballads written to be sold in the streets

He continued to read The Pilgrim's Progress, Plutarch's Parallel Lives, essays by Defoe, Burton, and Mather A volume of the Spectator, acquired by chance, revealed to him the importance of style and, like Robert Louis Stevenson at a later date, he taught himself by rewriting and comparing sentences From this printshop came the fifth—Franklin mistakenly says the second—newspaper in America, the New England Courant, to which Franklin became an anonymous contributor

Quarrels with his brother eventually sent the seventeen year old apprentice to Philadelphia looking for employment His arrival early in the morning, with three penny worth of rolls in his mouth and under his arms as he walked up Market Street past the home of Miss Read, whom he was to marry later, was Philadelphia's first sight of one of its most distinguished citizens

Neither Bradford nor Keimer, the only printers in Philadelphia, was very advanced After the boy found a place in Keimer's shop, his wide reading and his ability to talk and to listen brought him many friends Finally Governor Keith offered to send him to England to buy type and equipment for a shop of his own Arriving in London, he learned that Keith, whose credit was not good, had provided nothing but promises To support himself, Franklin found work in a printing house After eighteen months he was happy to accept the offer of a merchant who wanted him to take back to America a consignment of merchandise Back in Philadelphia, he worked for a time in Keimer's shop, then, finding a partner in Hugh Meredith, he and the Welsh Pennsylvanian set up their own establishment They prospered and in 1729 Franklin became the sole proprietor, having bought out Meredith whose drinking habits were distasteful to the temperate, frugal Franklin He branched out as a stationer In 1730 he founded the Pennsylvania Gazette and also married Miss Read At this point the first section of the Autobiography ends

In 1784, in Passy, France, Franklin again began to write his story, this time addressed more generally to the reading public than to his son With friends interested in scientific and intellectual matters he had in 1743 founded a Junto for their mutual exchange of ideas and intellectual improvement, this was later to become the American Philosophical Society The members sponsored a library for the use of the public

Now that he had educated himself, Franklin sought moral perfection He set down twelve virtues, then added a thirteenth, Pride, at the suggestion of critical friends But he had reason to be proud He had learned to speak fluent French, Spanish, and Italian His civic spirit, born when he was appointed postmaster of Philadelphia, induced him to reorganize the fire department, start a movement to pave and light the streets, and to establish an academy which later became the University of Pennsylvania. The death of a son from smallpox caused him to argue for inoculation against the disease. He invented an improved form of heating stove and offered it free for general use, only to learn that he had brought wealth to one stove manufacturer. Meanwhile, beginning in 1732, he published Poor Richard's Almanack, the usual collection of agricultural and astronomical data to which he added a compendium of practical wisdom and moral maxims. This venture also brought him wealth and enabled him to retire from active business in 1748.

His thoughts about defense caused him to campaign for the establishment of a militia, but this man who so candidly confessed his 'errata,' his mistakes, was too well acquainted with himself to accept the appointment as their colonel. Other civic improvements, when initiated by others, needed his approval before his fellow citizens would adopt them. He extended his influence beyond his own city to the whole colony, and to other colonies. Yale and Harvard awarded honorary degrees to this self-taught scholar, and he was elected to membership in cultural and scientific societies at home and abroad.

Braddock sought Franklin's advice in campaigning against the Indians, only to disregard it with disastrous results. After selling out his shop to his foreman, he occupied his time with philosophical concerns and scientific experiments, particularly those relating to electricity. His theories, when ignored or contradicted abroad, led to his experiments with lightning in 1752.

Having represented Pennsylvania at the Albany Congress of 1754, he was chosen to represent it in protests to the English crown. His arrival in England, July 27, 1757, is the last date in his story of himself.

THE POET, friends of the Autocrat who, though never present, contribute to the discussion

At one point in the recounting of his breakfast-table experiences, the Autocrat observed that, since medieval times, the reputation of Aristotle had passed through two stages and was then (one hundred years ago) entering its third. First came the period of idolization when everything attributed to the Greek sage was accepted not only as scientifically sound but as absolute and ultimate truth. Then came the period of critical examination, the stage at which his scientific inaccuracies were discovered and, as a result, all of his ideas belittled and discredited. Finally in Dr Holmes' time, there was the third stage, the enlightened period when the scientific inaccuracies were excused, being viewed in historical perspective as unavoidable and the value of his philosophical insights reasserted.

On a smaller time scale, the reputation of Oliver Wendell Holmes, along with that of the Cambridge Boston group as a whole (as opposed to that of the Concord group), has gone through the first two of these stages but shows no signs, as yet, of entering the third. Although few and certainly never Dr Holmes himself, actually believed that Boston was "The Hub of the Universe," Harvard Yard and the eastern end of Beacon Street (including the first eight doors on Arlington Street so as to take in the offices of the Atlantic Monthly) were for better than half a century regarded as the dual nerve center as it were, the cerebrum and cerebellum, of American culture. A Cambridge born Harvard Professor of Anatomy, a member of the Saturday Club, a resident of Beacon Street, Dr Holmes did not merely share in such regard, he helped to create it. It was he, in fact, who coined the term, "The Hub" (But the original statement, as it appeared in Chapter VI of The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, was made, not by a Bostonian, but an outlander whose remark was, "Boston State House is the hub of the solar system.") As lecturer, poet, novelist, biographer, and most of all, perhaps as the author of The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table and later The Professor at the Breakfast Table (1860) and The Poet at the Breakfast Table (1872), Dr Holmes helped to establish in the public mind a concept of Bostonian wit, sensibility, and culture.

Gradually—not suddenly as did the Wonderful One Hoss Shay (Chapter XI of The Autocrat)—the reputations of many of the New England writers seemed autumnal and dry, and a season of critical neglect set in. Today, however, the situation has somewhat changed. Hawthorne has been resurrected by the New Critics; the cautiously radical Emerson has been turned into a spokesman for the Neo-conservatives; and Thoreau is a pet nonconformist in these conformist times. The Concordians have entered their third stage, but not the Cambridge Bostonians. Yet, while it is no doubt true that the poetry of the Cambridge Boston group is a mixture of neoclassic moralizing combined with a nostalgic and academic romanticism, it should be remembered that Longfellow had a gift for storytelling; that Lowell was a sprightly satirist, and that Holmes possessed wit, urbanity, a background of knowledge and a tolerant, all-encompassing view of life, the like of which has not appeared in English letters on either side of the Atlantic since his death.

It can be argued that in regard to Holmes such qualities did not produce the reputation, but are deduced from it; that the alleged wit and urbanity are really provincial smugness, and that what passes for a tolerant and total life view is in reality a carefully cultivated dilettantism. Such arguments have been made, but they neglect both the facts provided by history and the literary evidence provided by The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. The facts show that Holmes was learned in both science and humane letters and that he was one of the foremost advocates of technological progress in the nineteenth-century United States. One English critic has said that he, rather than Emerson, deserves the title, the "American Montaigne."

It is on an objective reading of The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table that the case for Holmes must finally rest. The Autocrat appeared originally in the first twelve issues of the Atlantic Monthly (1857-1858) and was published in book form directly after this appearance. Its plan is simple enough: the Autocrat lives in a Beacon Hill boarding house, the essays are, we are told, reports, somewhat condensed, and interlarded with the Autocrat's comments, of the conversations that take place each morning at the breakfast table of this remarkable establishment, a table at which is found a most heterogeneous collection of boarders. Each has his say occasionally, but his main purpose is to provide a sounding board for the wit and philosophizing of the Autocrat. There is conversation, but mostly (as it is finally reported, in any case) there is monologue. The varied responses of the boarders allow Holmes' wit to play over a wide range of subjects, to jump easily from point to point, and to juxtapose ideas that have no apparent relevance.

The result may seem chaotic at first. One is carried along by the bubbling cleverness easily enough, but apparently to no particular place. For example, the topics of the first chapter are, in order of appearance: (1) the algebraic classification of minds, (2) the value of mutual admiration societies, (3) the meaninglessness of brute fact, (4) the typing of various kinds of speakers, (5) the dangers of specialized learning, (6) an attack on the use of puns (Holmes deprecates the use of them here but cannot always resist them; later, for example, he speaks of the land lady's economically minded poor relation as standing by her guns, "ready to repel boarders"), (7) the poverty of pure logic as opposed to common sense, (8) the foibles of young poets, (9) the superiority of men of family over self-made men, "other things being equal" (Holmes' italics), (10) the rendering of a pair of poems. Holmes makes these points interesting in themselves, but there seems to be little connection between one and another. As the reader continues, however, he becomes aware that certain ideas are recurrent, that certain themes are announced, dropped, but repeated later with variations, that there are psychological connections in the apparently chance juxtapositions of ideas—that the whole thing develops in a geometric, not in an arithmetic, progression.

The effect is produced by a means that is at the same time modern and metaphysical. Holmes was a Proper Bostonian, a Victorian American, and it has been said that his sympathies lay with the eighteenth century, that he was at heart a Neo-Johnsonian. This assertion is in some respects valid. But if his conscious affinities turned back one hundred years, his unconscious ones turned back two. Andrew Lang notes "a fleeting resemblance to Sir Thomas Browne," a resemblance based on "a community of professional studies," but this similarity between Holmes and the author of Religio Medici and Urn Burial is not explained simply by the fact that both were medical men. Holmes possessed the "divided sensibility" found also in the metaphysical school, and Browne, it is now acknowledged, was a metaphysical poet writing in prose. This division in Holmes, obscured as it is by his neoclassical pose, has been too often neglected.

He was divided along a different axis from Browne's, for he lived under different conditions, but the division is still there. First was the religious division. Holmes had disavowed the Puritanism of his fathers, but the scars of his youthful indoctrination were never completely gone. More important, perhaps, at least as far as its reflection in The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table is concerned, is his divided allegiance between Brahminism, which stood for all the deeply rooted things that meant the good life to him, on the one hand, and science, which meant technology and, with it, the unleashing of those forces, human and mechanical, that would destroy Brahminism, on the other. The division could not exercise itself in Holmes' poetry because the moralizing romantic tradition was too binding. But when Holmes found in his hands a form free from restrictions and with which he could experiment as he wished, his divided sensibility found expression in the essay through the use of what are very close to metaphysical techniques.

First, there is the juxtaposition of topics. The most extreme, and the one that most strongly anticipates the modern reflection of the metaphysical, is Chapter IX, in which Holmes presents a series of childhood reminiscences—the stuff of poems.

Many times I have come bearing flowers such as my garden grew, but now I offer you this poor, brown, homely growth you may cast it away as worthless. And yet—and yet—it is something better than flowers: it is a seed capsule.

There is also the shift in prose styles—from the colloquial or the scientific to the lofty and poetic—a device that harks back to the style of Browne. But most important are the similitudes—the similes, the metaphors, the extended analogies. The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table is full of them. But the important thing is that they are functional, not decorative; they are the very fabric of the work. Holmes uses them to bring into focus the two parts of his divided world. Science and beauty stand for the two parts of the key dichotomy, represented in character by Holmes' own two alter egos, the Professor and the Poet, and playing their dual parts in all of the analogies.

We get beautiful effects from wit—all the prismatic colors—but never the object as it is in fair daylight. A pun, which is a kind of wit, is a different and much shallower trick in mental optics, throwing the shadows of two objects so that one overlies the other.

Poetry uses the rainbow tints for special effects, but always keeps its essential object in the purest white light of truth.

Through the interplay of these two conflicting worlds, by means of analogy and opposition of character, the themes of the work are brought out. They appear as questions, not as answers, for awareness of the divided world permits no dogmatic assertions. What is love and what is beauty? How are human communication and expression achieved? What, after all, is really important? And how can it be found—by sculling beneath the bridges of the Charles, by searching for seed capsules of poetry in one's memory, or by counting the rings of an elm that stood when Shakespeare was a boy?

To bring out these questions in a meaningful way is a decided literary achievement. Not that The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table is entirely a great literary work. Holmes cannot maintain his metaphysical detachment. He becomes too concerned with his characters and they begin to lose their reflecting qualities. He becomes too concerned with love; in the end the Autocrat and the Schoolmistress degenerate into the principal figures of a rather sentimental romance. So there are weaknesses, true, but they are not the weaknesses for which the "Genetel Tradition" is usually condemned. Only half of Holmes was in that tradition anyway. In respect to that other half, he deserves to have his reputation advanced to its third stage.

In The Awakening of Spring, Wedekind presents a plot stripped to its naturalistic essentials: the suffering inflicted on the very young when their burgeoning native, erotic consciousness confronts the deadly, adult, hypocritical unconsciousness of the society to which they are answerable. The plot is, however, only the crude skeleton for a powerful anti-naturalistic dramaturgy which relies on its own intractable poetic logic. Within a loose episodic structure, scenes are articulated by means of ironic parallel actions, and an unsubtle but dramatically effective use of symbolic references. Dramatic tension depends not upon the formal plot revelations, but on swift modulations of response elicited in the spectator by the mixture of satire and tragedy, caricature yields to lyrical statement, the horrific yields to the commonplace, the commonplace to that realm of parable inhabited by the existential absurd—or rather haunted, in this case, by the figure of the muffled gentleman, to whom the play is dedicated.

Wendla hung up again in the closet the long, grown-up dress which her mother had just completed, protesting that she did not see why next year would not be soon enough to put on such a penitential garment. Mrs. Bergmann acquiesced with motherly affection to her daughter's wish to continue wearing, for the present, the freer, familiar clothes of childhood, remarking at the same time on the fact that Wendla had retained her childhood grace without a trace of the gawkiness usual to her age. Mrs. Bergmann was not without misgivings, even while she cherished that appearance of innocence and grace, and she expressed her uneasiness in various equivocating substitutes for her real fears, all of which Wendla gaily laughed away.

Melchior Gabor, Moritz Stiebel, and their classmates broke up their games to go prepare their homework. Moritz and Melchior, walking home in the spring night, became involved in a discussion of the meaninglessness of the exam system and the sexual phenomena of adolescence which they were beginning to experience. For Moritz, the mysterious sexual pressures were a great burden, partly because they hindered his already desperate attempts to meet the rigid demands made upon him by school and parents. Though a poor student, and excessively timid, he possessed an acute sensitivity in certain areas which went unrecognized by all but Melchior, who was his closest friend and, unlike Moritz, an extremely promising student. The ease with which Melchior dealt with his schoolwork left him time not only for metaphysical speculation, but for a scholarly acquisition of the facts of reproduction, which he now offered to impart. Moritz accepted Melchior's offer on the condition that the facts be in written form and slipped into his books where he could come upon them as if by chance.

On a blustery spring day not long afterward, Wendla, Thea, and Martha also exchanged confidences on the subjects of parental tyranny, love, marriage, and children, embellishing their remarks with the gaudy and arbitrary imagination of childish ignorance. The talk turned to boys of their own age, and to the peculiar behavior which they sometimes exhibited. Wendla disclosed that Melchior had once told her he believed in nothing. Mention of the spring floods revealed the fact that Melchior had come near drowning in one of the swollen streams, but was saved by his ability as a swimmer.

In another gathering of the schoolboys, it was revealed that Moritz had illicitly entered the staff common room (repository of all records), driven by the desire to learn whether he was to be promoted. When Moritz appeared, dazed by his own boldness but relieved by the knowledge of a provisional remove, he was taunted by the boys for his statement that he would have shot himself had he not received it.

Melchior and Wendla met by chance in the woods, where Wendla had gone to gather woodruff for her mother and had stopped to daydream by a brook. Melchior persuaded her to sit down and asked if she enjoyed going among the poor to take them food and money, errands on which she was often sent by her mother. Wendla's answer, that it gave her pleasure, began an argument on the reality of virtue and selflessness.

Wendla also confessed that she daydreamed of being a poor beggar child, beaten by a cruel father, although she herself had never been beaten. She picked a switch and begged Melchior to strike her, to show her how such punishment felt. The boy at first refused, then, as she persisted in her request, he threw the stick aside and pummeled her with his fists before he ran away into the wood, crying out in anguish.

Moritz found himself again on the verge of school failure. While reading Faust with Melchior, he related his grandmother's story of the headless queen, a tale which had been haunting him during his studying. It told of a fabulously beautiful queen unfortunately born without a head who was one day conquered by a king who happened to be provided with two heads that argued constantly. The court wizard gave one to the queen, on whom it proved surpassingly becoming, and the two were married with great joy, the heads now being on the best of terms. Melchior's mother entered with tea and words of encouragement for Moritz. Noticing the Faust, she wondered if they ought to be reading it, saying elliptically, however, that she preferred to place her trust in Melchior rather than in pedagogical principles. Realizing that she was thinking of the Gretchen episode, they became annoyed, Melchior because everyone insisted on acting as if the world turned on nothing but obscenities, Moritz because he had begun to fear that it actually did. He had received Melchior's sex essay which affected him like a series of dim recollections. He was disposed to exalt the satisfaction experienced by the woman, and regarded that of the man as insipid.

Meanwhile, Wendla persistently interrogated her mother on the subject of her sister's latest baby. She mocked her mother's giggling fairy tales by pretending to see a ridiculous vision outside the window. At Wendla's insistence, Mrs. Bergmann was forced to begin telling her daughter how babies come about, but finally she managed to evade the issue by saying that the things required were marriage and an enormity of love which Wendla was too young to comprehend. A short time later Wendla went looking for Melchior and, disarmed by his intensity and his tortured insistence that there is no such thing as love, she remained with him in the hayloft, where she conceived a child.

Moritz finally reached the end of his resources and, at the brink of suicide over the realization that he was about to fail, wrote to Mrs. Gabor for a loan which would enable him to leave home. She, considering it her duty to refuse, appealed to his common sense and better nature. At dusk, in a parting soliloquy pervaded by his unfailing wry humor but mixed with self-pity, he concluded that life was not his responsibility. The Headless Queen beckoned. Life was a matter of taste. His only regret was in not having known sexual fulfillment, the most human experience of all When Ilse, a young model with an insatiable appetite for life, appeared to tempt him with tales of her warm, carefree, animal existence, he wavered but then rejected the opportunity she offered

Moritz' suicide precipitated an investigation on the part of the school officials Melchior, charged with indecency on the basis of the notes on sex discovered among Moritz' books, became the scapegoat

At the funeral service Moritz was condemned for his crime against man and God by the adults in attendance Rentier Stiefel comforted himself by repeating he had never cared for the boy from a child he was no son of his The pastor urged with consummate coarseness that he seek comfort in the arms of his wife While the reaction of the schoolboys at the funeral was largely one of curiosity as to the exact manner of the suicide, Martha and Ilse brought to the grave a profusion of flowers Ilse had discovered the suicide pistol and concealed it

Mrs Gabor, meeting with indignation her husband's determination to send Melchior to the reformatory, defied anyone to perceive moral corruption in what the boy had written, but she was unable to stand up to the discovery that Wendla was pregnant and Melchior responsible

Shortly after her discovery of the cause of her illness, Wendla succumbed to the combined concoctions of Dr Von Brause pulver and Mother Schmidt for inducing abortion After her death, Melchior hounded by society and by his own self contempt, managed to return to look at her grave As he wandered enviously among the graves, he encountered Moritz Stiefel, with his head under his arm, who attempted to persuade Melchior to join him in his life among the dead which he pictured as a fabulous if grotesque freedom While Melchior hesitated a muffled gentleman appeared to take Moritz to task for his attempt, his lack of a head, and his general crumbling condition He accused Moritz of charlatanism and asked Melchior to submit himself to his care Melchior, contending that he could not entrust himself to a masked unknown, subjected the muffled gentleman to questions regarding his moral position Moritz admitted that he had been boasting and urged Melchior to accompany the muffled gentleman, who was, in any event, alive The two alive withdrew together while Moritz returned to warm himself with putrefaction

Back to Methuselah is Shaw's only major drama of ideas which falls flat as a play. It is true that both Man and Superman and Major Barbara contain lengthy speeches which contribute little to the action, but Shaw's mastery of idio syncrasy and dialogue compensates for those stretches of verbosity and often justifies them. Back to Methuselah, however, has no such redeeming stylistic touches. For the most part, the dialogue is declamation and the characters are orators. Worst of all, talk takes the place of action—ninety thousand words of talk in the play itself and thirty thousand in the preface which Shaw the essayist wrote to explain the dramatist's ninety thousand.

The play does have moments in which theatricalism relieves the tedium of the talk. In one scene, for example, a make-believe sibyl appears to the accompaniment of lightning and thunder. In another, a full-grown girl is hatched from an egg. In still another, characters appear on a simulated television screen. But all these devices are so obviously contrived that they fail to delight.

Properly speaking, Back to Methuselah is not a play at all. A far more appropriate designation is the subtitle Shaw gave it: A Metabiological Pentateuch. It is a pentateuch because it consists of five separate plays which add new information to the Bible. It is biological because the information concerns evolution. It is metabiological because the concept of evolution expounded in the play transcends the conventional theory of Darwin. Back to Methuselah is Shaw's attempt to explain the theory of Creative Evolution to a public unwilling or unable to read biological treatises. That the public might be unwilling or unable to sit through a play which takes two or three evenings to perform apparently did not worry him.

Yet Back to Methuselah is an important play, a work important in the development of modern drama because it stretched the drama of ideas as far as it could go and important in the body of

The theme of the play and the central tenet of Shaw's belief and teaching is that man does not live long enough but that he could if he would. As soon as man has lived long enough to acquire the knowledge and experience to solve some of the problems of life, life ends. The knowledge and experience are wasted. Life itself is wasted. Such waste, in Shaw's belief, is shameful, for all that man must do to avoid it is resolve to live longer. What man wants, he can have, whether it be an extra head, arm, leg, or additional years of life. This is the secret of Creative Evolution: species acquire new characteristics not through random mutations which are confirmed or rejected in the struggle for existence but through the recognition that new characteristics are needed and then the desire, conscious or unconscious, for their development. A disciple of Lamarck and Samuel Butler, Shaw believed that man could create his own evolution. In Back to Methuselah he attempts to show how and why.

Creative Evolution, according to Shaw, was one of the mysteries which the Serpent explained to Eve in the Garden of Eden—the setting of "In the Beginning," the first part of the pentateuch. Paradoxically, the great problem of life in the Garden was not how to extend life but how to end it. Faced with the horrible prospect of living forever, Adam longs to die and yet is unwilling to end life on earth. The Serpent solves the dilemma for him by explaining to Eve the doctrine of creative imagination. All they need to do to die is to will to die, to ensure the perpetuation of life, to create new life. The secret of creation is one the Serpent is only too willing to whisper in Eve's ear.

The second act, which takes place a few centuries later, is a variation on this theme of life and death. It is actually a debate on the purpose of life, with Adam, Eve, and Cain taking three different views Adam contends that the purpose of life is to live, quietly working to pass away the years. Cain, the inventor of murder, believes that to live bravely, daring death and dying gloriously is the goal of man. Eve, believing that there is something nobler than either working or fighting, scoffs at both. Though she has not yet discovered just what it is, she has hope that man will find and cherish it.

By 1919—the date of “The Gospel of the Brothers Barnabas,” the second part of the pentateuch—the triumph of Cain’s apostles of death and destruction has shortened man’s life span to its current length. But Franklyn and Conrad Barnabas have rediscovered the Serpent’s secret of Creative Evolution and have settled on three hundred years as the ideal life span. Their task is to convince enough people that extending life is possible, then let nature do the rest. Although they are notably unsuccessful in persuading two politicians, Burge and Lubin, to adopt “Back to Methuselah” as the Liberal Party slogan, they remain confident that someone will soon live for three hundred years.

By 2170 the date of “The Thing Happens,” the miracle has been accomplished. The Archbishop of York and Mrs. Lutestring, both of whom had been exposed to the Barnabas gospel, have lived 283 and 274 years respectively. Except for their ages, both are typical Shavian heroes in that they are so superior to a conventional society that society rejects and despises them. Their plight is more ironic than that of most Shavian heroes because by 2170 England is a Utopia, albeit a bureaucratic Utopia, administered by Chinese men and African women. When confronted with the prospect of a race of supermen, the rulers of the Utopia can only contemplate their own impotence.

By 3000, the date of “Tragedy of an Elderly Gentleman,” the rulers’ worst fears have materialized: the new race has expropriated the British Isles for its own use and banished ordinary mortals. The thematic significance of this section of the play is drawn from the contrast between the new race and the old. From Baghdad, the new capital of the British Commonwealth, comes a politician posing as a statesman to seek counsel from the supermen. The supermen are so contemptuous of the politician’s intellect that they present the advice, which itself is humiliating, through a humbug oracle. True to form, the politician ignores it, fabricates his own counsel, and departs. An elderly gentleman, a member of the delegation, decides to remain behind, but he is so feeble in contrast to one of the super beings that he dies upon meeting her gaze.

By 31,920, the ordinary human race is extinct. Children are hatched from eggs at the age of seventeen and live indefinitely. “As Far As Thought Can Reach,” the fifth and last section of the play sketches the development of the new human being, who, after a four-year accelerated intellectual and physical growth devoted to playing, dancing and mating, becomes an “Ancient,” one who devotes himself to pure thought and whose goal is existence as pure, disembodied thought.

That this goal will be reached is affirmed by Lilith, the mother of Adam and Eve, in the closing speech of the play. In fact, the only reason Lilith has permitted the human race to evolve is that it has been striving toward such a goal. But, Lilith concludes, the attainment of the goal is merely a step in a greater plan, the nature of which even she knows nothing.

In such a fashion Shaw finally reaches the conclusion that life, some form of life, will endure. Admittedly, the conclusion is not a profound one, but the insistence that man can forge his own destiny and create his own form of life is well worth considering if only because it is the underlying assumption of every one of Shaw’s major plays.

Barabbas in surface and in details of action and characterization seems a very realistic historical novel. In this fable, however, Lagerkvist has created a symbolic story which treats a primitive man's unwitting search for God. His portrait of the criminal Barabbas' emerging conscience patterns the emergence of Christian doctrine from the superstition and bewilderment which, the author implies, were the first reactions of the populace to the Crucifixion. The symbolic meaning of Barabbas' story is probably to be extended to include the blind search of all men of all times for belief. In 1951, two years after the appearance of this novel, Lagerkvist was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature.

At Golgotha, Barabbas, watching the Crucifixion from which he had suddenly been saved, was startled by the words uttered by the figure on the cross. "My God my God why hast thou forsaken me?" Even stranger to him was the darkness which seemed to come over the world. As he was leaving the scene he was also disturbed by the look of silent reproach directed at him by the dead man's mother.

Back in Jerusalem, he met and walked with a young girl, whom he had known before. The girl, who had a harelip, went with him to a dive where some of his low companions were gathered. Barabbas and the people there discussed Barabbas' rescue and the strange rabbi who had made such extreme claims and yet permitted himself to be crucified like any criminal. Barabbas was considerably relieved that the people in the cafe did not believe in the rabbi's divinity, though he was rather troubled that they had not even noticed the darkness which had for a while hung over the land. The young girl having left the dive, Barabbas indulged, as a kind of escape from his worries, in a drunken debauch with one of the patrons of the cafe—a fat, crude woman.

Later Barabbas met a red bearded follower of Christ who expected Christ to rise from the dead the next day. He explained some of Christ's teachings to Barabbas, but shamefacedly admitted that before the end he had denied Christ. The girl with the harelip, to whom Barabbas also talked about Christ, said that she had met Him. She was wilder in her predictions than was the red bearded man, she expected the millennium and divine miracles any day. Superstition did not blur everything, however, for she told Barabbas that Christ's message was one of love. Barabbas thereupon went to the grave, and watched all night, but saw nothing. The next day, however, the stone was gone from the entrance. He believed that the followers of Christ had taken the body, the girl thought He had risen.

Barabbas asked the followers of Christ about these events, but found little satisfaction in their answers. He could not understand. One who used His power by refraining from using it. Barabbas was later taken to a man who had been dead four days and had been raised again by this rabbi. This man told Barabbas that death was nothing; it was there, but it signified nothing. He added that after one had experienced death, life also was as nothing. As Barabbas further questioned the followers of Christ, it became clear that though they were believers they were quite confused as to the meaning of all these happenings. When the followers learned Barabbas' identity, as sooner or later they did, they naturally hated him.

About this time Barabbas became estranged from his fellows in the low life of Jerusalem—so much so that he left off his sensual life. The fat woman, his sometime lover, thought that Christ's soul had possessed Barabbas. One day, by accident, Barabbas was present at a church meeting and heard a rather disappointing sermon by the red bearded man who had denied Christ. The snuffing testimony of witness given by the harelipped girl he found even more distasteful. Yet later, when a blind man denounced the girl as a Christian, Barabbas knifed the first person who stoned her. She died a humble martyr, but one who saw Christ as she died. Barabbas carried her body to the grave of a baby she had had, Barabbas had been the father of that child.

A short time later Barabbas left Jerusalem and returned to the robber band which he had at one time led. The robbers were distressed by his seeming character change. Formerly the boldest of all, he had become apathetic. So bold had he been that years ago he had fought and killed and supplanted the bandit leader; thus he had come by the scar on his face. What none of the characters knew was that Eliahu, whom Barabbas had killed, was his own father. Sensing that he no longer fitted in with the robber band, Barabbas silently stole away from the camp.

For an indeterminate period Barabbas wandered the face of the earth. Later he was enslaved and put to mining for the Romans. There he met Sahak, a slave who was thrilled by the knowledge that Barabbas had seen Christ. Without revealing to Sahak the true nature of that relation, Barabbas increased the details of Sahak's belief by telling him things about Christ. Some of these were lies such as that he had seen an angel come down from the sky on the night that he had watched outside Christ's tomb. After a time Barabbas apathetically suffered Sahak to enter into Christian observances with him. He even permitted Sahak to draw Christ's symbol on his slave's disk, and for a time he prayed with him. Years later a new mine overseer, attracted to Christianity but mystified by its doctrine of love, noticed the two slaves, bound to each other by a chain. The overseer, having talked to them about Christianity, was moved to secure positions above ground for the two men. Though still slaves, Sahak and Barabbas were at any rate free of the deadly conditions of primitive mining.

Matters soon changed when the Roman governor of the territory learned through another slave that both men were Christians. Sahak refused to renounce his faith. Barabbas, who by this point would have liked to believe in Christ but could not, readily renounced his. He let the governor scratch through the sign that Sahak had put on his disk. He then had to witness Sahak's crucifixion, but he himself was rewarded. He was relieved when no miraculous occurrences accompanied the death of Sahak.

bas with him. Once Barabbas went to the catacombs to see a Christian religious service, but no worshipper was there. In the darkness of the catacombs he felt terribly alone. He also felt that, as he had dreamed one night, he was still chained to Sahak, just as he had been during the days when he had pretended to believe.

After he had left the place of the dead he smelled fire, flames were everywhere. He thought that Christ had returned to save the world, the first step of which would be to destroy Rome—for Rome felt that Christ was the enemy. Barabbas seized a burning brand and began to set everything afire that he could, he thought, wildly, that he was helping the Christians and his Saviour.

Thrown into prison with the Christians, Barabbas learned that there had been no service in the catacombs because the followers had been forewarned that an attack was to be made on them. The fires were probably set by agents or spies to discredit further the Christians.

The Christians in the prison naturally denied that Barabbas, who had been caught red handed, was one of them.

When they protested to the jailer, the man showed as evidence Barabbas' disk which still had the Christian symbol dimly scratched on it. A venerable old man among the Christians turned out to be one whom Barabbas had met before, the man who had denied Christ. Now he explained to Barabbas that it was Caesar who had set the fires, not Christ, it had been Caesar, therefore, whom Barabbas had helped by trying to burn Rome. Christ's message was still that of love.

To the others the old man added that they must not condemn Barabbas, though he was the Acquitted One. He continued that Barabbas was unhappy, and he had to wear his crossed out disk. The others were also weak and full of faults; their belief had come from God. They must not condemn a man who had no god in whom to believe.

Soon the Christians were led out in pairs to be crucified, but Barabbas was taken alone. When death was coming, he spoke rather ambiguously into the darkness, saying that he delivered up his soul "to thee."

BATOUALA

Locale Ubangi Shari, French Equatorial Africa

First published 1921

BATOUALA, the chief of many villages

YASSIGUINDJA, the favorite of Batouala's nine wives

INDOUVOURA, another of Batouala's wives

Batouala is important not as a story, although within its modest limits it provokes suspense and sustains interest in the affairs of its characters, but as a sensitive evocation of the experience of being an African native in the French Congo. René Maran, who was born in Martinique, served from 1909 until 1925

as a member of the diplomatic service of the French government in French Equatorial Africa. His novel, the result of six years of study and writing, is an attempt to render in a thoroughly objective manner the thoughts, beliefs, and attitudes of an African chief.

presentation of thoughts and attitudes necessarily involves the author's sympathetic extension of his imagination. Maran's work rings true not because he is a Negro—for the knowledge of the temperament and customs of an African Negro is not inherited with one's skin—but because he is a man concerned enough about the men whose lives he writes about to have become like them in loving life and in condemning French colonialism, which has done much to destroy the values of life for the African native.

The technique of the novel can be described as the stream of consciousness, supplemented to some extent by descriptive passages which maintain the perspective of the African. But the style differs markedly from that of such writers as Virginia Woolf and James Joyce, for the persons whose experiences are being evoked are not of the same society as their author, but are removed, both spatially and in degree of civilization, from the world of the man who attempts to reconstruct the temper of their days. To overcome the distance between himself and his subject, Maran adopts a modification of the speech of the Africans: he writes as if their minds were speaking, and he keeps the simplicity and naivete of native phrasing. Even more important, he manages to express the smoldering, helpless anger which is part of the daily experience of the African in the grip of the white man. Such writing is objective in the sense that it puts across what is, in fact, part of someone's experience, but it is passionate and subjective in the respect that one knows that the author shares the anger and, by sharing it, throws in his lot with that of his characters.

For a brief novel that does no more than tell how a young man's desire for the favorite wife of his chief is finally satisfied as the chief lies dying from the wound of a panther's bite, Batouala succeeds remarkably well in immersing the reader in a different culture. Considered didactically, the novel is powerfully effective largely because of its success as a representation of the experiences of the African. The reader's conclusion must be that the African is worthy of consideration and respect as a human being; the differences between him and the white man are differences of custom and learning and if one begins to make moral comparisons, it is not always the white man who wins.

Maran's indictment of the colonial administrators in the introduction to his novel speaks of the vileness of the white colonial and of civilization built on corpses. He calls upon his fellow writers to correct France's brutal policies, and he mentions the colonial administrator's excessive use of alcohol. But these remarks, impassioned as they are, do not compete in persuasive power with the sparse but ter comments of the Africans themselves. The whites are criticized for treating the Negroes like slaves, for punishing them unreasonably, for using Negroes as police to keep their former brothers in line, for lying, for believing lies, for callously dismissing the suffering and death of the natives about them. One incident in the novel tells of the French commandant who, upon hearing of Batouala's imminent death, cheerfully replied that Batouala could rot to death and all the others with him.

The native, because of his unavoidable ignorance of the ways of the white man, understandably confuses convention with magic, and in his reflections on the white man's magic we find something of the native's contempt for the white man and something of his awe. Batouala, in his reflections, thinks of the white man's stench, particularly of his foul smelling feet encased in skins, he marvels at the white man's ability to remove his teeth or even an eye, he thinks of white men who can look through tubes at objects far away, and he remembers the white "doctorro" who can make anyone urinate blue. But then, at other moments, he remembers the white man's drunkenness,

If the novel expressed nothing more than the Negro's bitterness, it would not be convincing and would fail to achieve its revolutionary intention. But the chief, Batouala, is a living man, a convincing tribesman, not a mouthpiece for Maran. He knows the value of doing nothing and distinguishes between resting for the joy of it and sheer laziness. When he discovers that the young man, Bissibingui, wants to possess Yassiguindja, Batouala's favorite wife, he does not accept the fact of desire, as most do in his tribe, he determines to pursue Bissibingui and pounce on him like a panther, tearing him to bits. Bissibingui had already been successful with eight of Batouala's nine wives, but his attempt to add Yassiguindja to his list of conquests is frustrated by Batouala's pride, a manifestation of Batouala's eminence as chief. Only an accident of the hunt, brought about by Batouala's act of hurling a javelin at Bissibingui instead of at a charging panther, brings about the downfall and death of Batouala. Ironically, the chief who would kill like the panther dies by the panther.

Not these events alone, but, rather, the thoughts and responses of the natives to the events, intrigue the reader. While a man is alive, he glories in life; he thinks there is nothing better in all the world than to be strong, to run with the hunters, to be in danger, to kill the beasts that are hunted. He delights, too, in calling his friends to the circumcision ceremony, and the rhythm of his drumming not only conveys the invitation but also the spirit of it—the joy of anticipating good food, drink, dancing, and riotous love making. But when a man dies, as Batouala's father died, from too much drink at the circumcision festival, he is soon forgotten; he is no longer useful to anyone, and only convention prompts the mourning which extends over eight days in order to make sure that the man is truly dead, not merely sleeping. For death, to the native, is a profound sleep perhaps so profound that a man sleeping such a sleep never wakes again. The references to the gods are more conventional than pious, the concerns of the day—the joy and sorrow of it, are too compelling to leave time for either religion or metaphysics.

Batouala compels the reader to a strange conclusion. The natives are not romanticized, they are not noble savages. But they are noble, nevertheless, in their direct acceptance of the needs and conventions of their lives. Even in their acceptance of superstition and in their giving way to the lust of the native dance they seem to relate themselves more honestly to the earth about them than do the white administrators who fortify their fancied superiority with alcohol, brutality, and disdain. The problem for the white man becomes that of using his knowledge and power to develop something more respectable than human meanness.

There is more than truth and power to Batouala, there is poetry, the rhythmical expression of jungle images and jungle emotions. This dimension of style gives the novel a beauty which makes the crime it uncovers even more reprehensible. As long as the Negro suffers, Batouala will continue to be not only a work of art but also a severe indictment.

THE BAY OF SILENCE

The outstanding Argentine writer, and one of the most important figures in the literature of Latin America, is Eduardo Mallea, a skilled technician in fiction and the literary editor of the Buenos Aires Nacion. Among his experiments he has written short stories like The City beside the Motionless River (1933) and essays like History of an Argentine Passion (1937), both seeking, behind the faults and the grandeur of a new country, the basic principles of Argentine life. This theme pervades most of Mallea's writing.

Of the group of young writers who considered individual freedom and man's responsibility Mallea reveals the greatest power and possesses the greatest technical skill, though his work is sometimes marred by a turgid style. He demonstrated these qualities as early as 1936, with the publication of Fiesta in November, an impressionistic portrait of the decadent upper class of the Argentine capital. Into the small talk and the evidences of corruption that reveal the "buyers and the bought," is woven an incident of fascist violence, presented with complicated technique.

Between paragraphs of the account of an armed patrol dragging a poet out of bed, rushing him off to an open space, and shooting him, is the story of Eugenia Rague and her weak family: the husband trying to conclude an advantageous stock transfer, one daughter undergoing an abortion, and the other exchanging philosophies with an anarchistic poet.

There is more plot and more optimism in The Bay of Silence. Mallea's belief is that there has been a decline in the moral qualities of Argentine national life. "It was marching along, then the motivating force broke down," is the way he expresses it. Even those only casually acquainted with the nation can realize how Argentina had deteriorated economically, culturally, and spiritually, even before the era of Peron. This decline is especially noticeable in its theater.

In The Bay of Silence, a roomer in a student boarding house, the aging Dr. Dervil, expresses his sentiments when he declares that Argentina is a lost nation, still colonial in spirit. He wonders when the healthy but submerged country, which exists because men believe in it, will rise from depths of ignorance and sloth. Mallea's own hope, like that of the young law student supposedly writing The Bay of Silence, is that the re-creation of Argentina will come from the unspoiled rural areas.

Martin Tregua, who had stopped attending law school because of his disgust with methods of teaching and the unscientific, spiritless faculty, turned to writing. His first project was to give meaning to the life and suffering of the average Argentine in a volume called The Forty Nights of Juan Argentino. Then the sight of a lovely woman of his own age, never once mentioned by name, but called only "You," inspired Martin to write to her, telling her the story of his life and letting her see her effect upon him. So The Bay of Silence comes into being.

The book is divided into three parts. The first, "Youth," covers Martin's life from his birth in Rio Negro, through his student days, to his first success as a writer in 1932. Part II, "The Islands," tells of his trip to Europe. The last section, "The Defeated," brings his life up to 1939. The novel ends as it began, with the narrator's glimpse into a flower shop in Buenos Aires and of the woman he had adored in silence for twelve years.

The story is developed with a wealth of detail. When Martin takes a walk, the streets he traverses and the buildings along the route are named, and the casual actions of unimportant people along the way are fully described. There is very little action in the first part. It is mostly an exchange of ideas about the fundamental problems of the world that the students discuss endlessly in their boarding house or pass around the editorial table of the magazine Enough, which they have founded with the financial assistance of a wealthy man of the city.

In the course of Martin's European trip, the author contrives to get him into conversations with a Czech munitions millionaire, several fascist underlings, and a disillusioned surgeon in Brussels. Then he returns, in the final section, to his own country, whose destiny he feels as keenly as his own, to write a sequel to his Juan Argentino. This task becomes complicated when he is attracted to a lending librarian named Gloria Bambil, one of many women in his life. Earlier, the unsettled and unsettling Mercedes Miro had been his companion at art exhibits, French theatrical performances, and musicales, circumstances related with many details and references that reveal Mallea's wide acquaintance with contemporary culture.

Because Gloria was unconsciously an Existentialist, Martin must occupy his time by reassuring her, in taking her from the mountains to the seashore in an attempt to give her confidence in herself and her future. Failure in this effort made him one of the many defeated in the final section of the novel. Meanwhile, Martin Tregua has been finding his way from the uncertainties of youth to the disillusioned wisdom of middle age.

The title is twice explained. Once, in discussing The Forty Nights of Juan Argentino, Martin declares that his book is to be a sea, rich and abundant, where there are storms and stresses, and delightful bays of silence, filled with the dreams and sufferings of his people. Again, at the end, he tells the unnamed woman to whom he is writing that she has reached that place at which the angry sea of persecution beats in vain the place a bay of silence, where those who have turned their failure into triumph may wait.

Critique

A suspenseful tale of intrigue in the South Seas, The Beach of Falesa is distinguished, among Stevenson's works of fiction, for its realism. It pictures unregenerate human nature—the natives with their superstition and gullibility, the traders with their crudeness, treachery, and degradation, the missionaries with their misguided zeal. A memorable feature of the story is the characterization of Wiltshire, a rough, uneducated man, some thing of a braggart, but withal a man of courage and rudimentary decency

The Story

Wiltshire welcomed his transfer to the trading station at Falesa after spending four years on a Pacific island where he had no white neighbors. In Falesa lived Case and old Captain Randall. Even though they operated a competing store, Wiltshire was grateful for their presence. At first he was not disturbed by the fates of his two predecessors. One of them, John Adams, had become ill and, after a period of insanity, died. The other, Vigours, had left suddenly because of his intense fear of Case and Black Jack.

When Wiltshire first met Case and his colored colleague, Black Jack, he was pleased with the clean appearance of both and with the educated speech of the white man. Case was very obliging. It was he who suggested that Wiltshire get a native wife and he who pointed out Uma, a shy, slender girl whom Wiltshire agreed to take. Because Wiltshire did not know the native tongue, Case made all the arrangements with the girl and her mother.

The wedding took place in the store operated by Randall, Case and Black Jack. This store, a small and filthy place with few supplies other than firearms and liquor, was nominally owned by Randall, a sottish old derelict, but Case was obviously in charge. The marriage service was conducted by Black Jack, who pretended to read the service from a novel and said a few obscene words in English, which Uma could not understand. Case prepared a document which stated that they were illegally married. At first sight, Wiltshire had been favorably impressed by Uma, and this impression was deepened by her modest and serious demeanor during the ceremony. His long-standing resolve to avoid serious involvement with a native woman was weakening.

On the next day began a series of mysterious happenings. In the morning Wiltshire discovered a group of natives who were sitting quietly and staring with sorrowful expressions at his house. The crowd increased during the day and did not disperse until evening. On his first day of business he had no customers more surprising than one curious spectator entered his store. On Sunday, attracted by the singing he stuck his head in the window of a church. The native pastor, staggering from amazement and fear, pointed his finger at the white man. After a second business day had passed without a single visitor to the store, Wiltshire concluded that he had been tabooed by the natives.

Ostensibly to help his fellow Englishman, Case accompanied Wiltshire to a meeting with five of the chiefs of Falesa. Because Wiltshire was ignorant of the language, Case acted as his spokesman. Afterward Case alleged that he had not succeeded in getting the chiefs to change their attitude toward Wiltshire. He said that because of some unknown superstition the natives feared Wiltshire much the same as they had feared Vigours and would not go near him.

That same day Wiltshire gained his first insight into the plot that Case was working against him. Uma disclosed that it was on her that the taboo had been placed originally and that it was now put on him because of his marriage. Case had told her that Wiltshire had married with full knowledge of the situation.

Wiltshire also learned that Case, when Uma and her widowed mother had come to Falesa a year before, had shown interest in the two women and given them assistance. A native chief had proposed marriage to Uma, but quite unaccountably he had deserted her. Just as unaccountably, the two women found themselves ostracized. Case, who continued to see the women in the evening, had proposed to Uma, but she had rejected his offer.

More information on the situation in

Falesa came from Tarleton, a missionary. The missionary, who was on his regular tour of the island, performed a proper marriage service for Uma and Wiltshire, at the latter's request. Then he acquainted the trader with some of Case's activities. One of Tarleton's native pastors had fallen under Case's influence and had encouraged the natives to use the sign of the cross to avoid the supposed evil eye of Vigours. To end this practice, Tarleton had hurried to Falesá. He had discovered that many of the villagers were under the subjugation of Case and that by working on their superstitions he had led them to perform diabolic acts, including the burying alive of a white trader. Tarleton had failed in his effort to nullify the influence of Case. Case, an expert at legerdemain, had by sleight of hand pretended to snatch a dollar bill from Tarleton's head and had claimed that the missionary was interested only in increasing native contributions.

For about a month after the missionary left, all was quiet in Falesa. Unable to trade with the natives, Wiltshire worked on the copra that Uma's mother owned. Often he went hunting, and he found that in the woods the natives were not reluctant to talk with him. He learned that the eastern end of the island which was uninhabited and seldom entered, was believed to be occupied by devils. Among many superstitions connected with this area was the belief that Case could travel freely in it because he was under the protection of a powerful devil.

One day Wiltshire explored this wilderness. Fighting his way through the jungle growth and up a steep hill, he became aware of a weird, moaning sound. Fearfully he advanced and discovered the source of the noise, an aeolian harp suspended from a tree. Finding a well beaten path, he followed it until he reached an old, tumble down wall, on the top of which was a line of queer, ugly figures, carved and painted, wearing hair and dressed in bright clothes.

Noticing that they were newly made, he recalled that Case was a good forger of island curiosities. Nearby he discovered a cellar. Entering it, he saw on the wall in luminous paint the face of a devil.

Returning from his expedition he met Case, and, unthinkingly, mentioned the luminous paint. His secret known, Case would now want Wiltshire promptly disposed of. When Wiltshire arrived home, Maea, the richest and most powerful chief of Falesa, was there. He and Case were rivals for a girl, and he had decided to hurt Case by turning over his business to Wiltshire. Although he had not believed the stories about Uma that had led to her ostracism, he had, up to this time, played along with Case to further his own ends. Wiltshire explained to Maea the hoax that Case had perpetrated on the natives and told him that if he went into the wilderness the next morning he would find the devils destroyed.

After dark, Wiltshire, equipped with dynamite fishing bombs, returned to the devils' den. He pulled down the idols, placed them on the cellar roof, and prepared his charge. As he was walking toward the harp, he was startled by Uma, who had come to warn him that Case was coming. Hurriedly he lit the fuse. The explosion scattered the woods with red coals, and one burning image fell close to the place where he and Uma sought to hide themselves. As he rushed to extinguish this light, two shots were fired, the second hitting the mark. His leg smashed and causing severe pain, he yelled out. As Uma ran to help him she too was hit.

Having lost his gun, Wiltshire grasped his knife and pretended to be dead. After an interval, Case moved toward him and fired another shot, which barely missed. When Case came within reach, Wiltshire grabbed his ankle, threw him down, and stabbed him. After fainting twice, Wiltshire managed to get to Uma, who was badly frightened but not seriously hurt. Shortly after dawn Tarleton and a group of natives led by Maea appeared on the

In this folk type comedy, the author of The Weavers—a starkly realistic proletarian drama—displays another side of his genius. In this play he follows in the tradition of Gogol and his famous Inspector General, except that here the theme of mistaken identity concerns a person universally praised, though cunningly depraved. Hauptmann's portrait of the stupid magistrate and the inefficient court he runs are satiric masterpieces.

The Story

To the suburban shack of the Wolff family, for which Julius and Frau Wolff were paying on the installment plan, their older daughter Leontine returned with complaints that the Krugers had sent her after wood late at night. Leontine had been hired out to the rich family in the neighborhood in order to gain enough money to start a stage career, so pretty did Frau Wolff consider her daughter. Although the husband wanted to send the girl back immediately, Frau Wolff seized the opportunity to plan the steal-

Julius had just returned with his shipwright's tools and ours for his manufactured boats and ran the local ferris as a kind of front for his real profession, the illegal snaring of game, from rabbits to deer. Frau Wolff had just completed the butchering of a stag preparatory to the arrival of a boatman Wulkow who dealt in plundered goods. If the older daughter had delusions of grandeur, the younger one, Udelheid, did not—she seemingly served as a verifier of invented facts. This happy family thrived by trickery, wit, and chance, right now they had a supply of firewood and a stag ready for market.

Wulkow seemed very reluctant to pay more than thirteen shillings for the meat, but Frau Wolff, the real ring-leader in all their dealings, wangled seventeen. The important thing, however, was the fact that Wulkow would be willing to pay sixty or seventy crowns for a good fur coat to relieve his rheumatism those cold days on the barge. Frau Kruger, coincidentally had just bought such a coat for her husband's Christmas present. Their discussion was interrupted by the appearance of Motes and his wife, who by bribery obtained eggs and bread from Frau Wolff in return for an uneasy truce over several snares they had found Motes, having lost an eye in a hunting accident and consequently his job as a ranger sometimes remedied his misfortunes by informing on poachers in the neighborhood.

After this brief stir Frau Wolff fortified her husband with whiskey for the midnight wood loading session. Their friend, the imbibing policeman on his nightly rounds wheedling drinks, innocently helped the Wolffs prepare for the task ahead. Also, he was several days late in delivering a message that the honest washerwoman was to appear at Justice von Wehrhahn's house on the following morning.

In the justice's court, the next day, Kruger lodged a complaint that his wood had been stolen, but the justice was not at all interested in the theft. Having heard that Kruger's friend and boarder, a notorious liberal democrat and free thinker had said slanderous things about a certain official newly arrived, von Wehrhahn was certain that the official referred to was himself, and he was occupied with rigging circumstantial evidence to press charges against young Doctor Fleischer, the free thinker and shrewd observer. When Kruger insisted, in spite of rebuffs, that his hired girl be sent back to him, Frau Wolff was brought dripping from the von Wehrhahn tubs to settle the dispute. She announced her refusal to send her daughter back to a house where she was forced to carry wood in the middle of the night. Half deaf Kruger, becoming angry, accused the justice of shouting and the court of incompetency and he was right in each case. As Frau Wolff returned with injured pride to her washing and Kruger stormed out, von Wehrhahn was left with Motes to give him reassurance.

Several days later a beaver coat was delivered to Wulkow for ninety nine crowns (the coat new had cost about a hundred). Frau Wolff counted her money carefully, claiming that the boatman had cheated her of one crown. In spite of Julius' wishes to pay the final installment on their house, his wife insisted on burying the money until things blew over. Udelheid, the younger daughter busily building a fire of stolen wood was sent to study confirmation verses for the glad season at hand. Doctor Fleischer and his little boy, great favorites of the family, stopped by for a boat ride, a whimsical midwinter wish of the delicate child. As Udelheid took them out, Kruger arrived with lamentations and apologies. His lamentations he emphasized by waving a stick of stolen wood, and denouncing the security system for the loss of both his wood and his beaver coat. His apology was for the way he had treated Frau Wolff, given with a plea for Leontine's return at higher pay. Frau Wolff assured him that jail was the place for scoundrelly thieves.

In an effort to deceive the authorities, Frau Wolff invented a fiction. A waistcoat, a note, and a key, she said had been found by her daughter near the railway station. Her theory was that the thief left them behind while taking the beaver coat to Berlin. But she seemed willing to believe that the thief was still in the vicinity, even more so when Wulkow appeared in the courtroom to register the birth of a daughter. So many petitioners showed up at once that Justice von Wehrhahn could not get on with his plans to indict Doctor Fleischer for slander on the false testimony of Motes' landlady—a new landlady quite gullible and ignorant of Motes' habit of avoiding any kind of payment whatsoever. Doctor Fleischer however had knowledge of a beaver coat. While out on the river he had seen a boatman—the unfortunate Wulkow, who could not get his boat free of the ice in time to get his wife to Berlin for the expected event—sitting on deck in a new fur coat This evidence made no impression on von Wehrhahn, anyone could own a fur coat, he insisted, even a boatman Wulkow assured him that boatmen could easily afford such a coat and that he himself had one Kruger, not hearing all that was said, criticized the justice severely for not allowing the good washerwoman to present her daughter's evidence He also rebuked the magistrate for consorting with Motes, a man who never paid his bills, who informed on others, and who was even now rigging false evidence Doctor Fleischer presented documentary proof that Motes had extracted evidence from his land lady against himself All this the justice waved aside

he would have to search every house around—Frau Wolff suggested that he start at hers—if such flimsy stories were to be believed Kruger stated that he would never rest until the coat was found, as well as his stolen wood Von Wehrhahn sent away Motes and his star witness Frau Wolff, true to her sense of honor, would say nothing good of Motes and nothing bad of Doctor Fleischer, even though the justice seemed more than willing to hear with favor such information He admired her feelings but begged to differ with the honest lady, one whom everyone admired and with whom no one found fault To his pronouncement that as sure as she was an honest woman, Doctor Fleischer was a thoroughly dangerous person, Frau Wolff said only that she did not know what to think

In its combination of the romantic and the rustic, The Beggars' Bush is very much like As You Like It, although greatly inferior to it in other respects Many of the staples of Elizabethan romance are present nobility in disguise, a villainous usurper, and a contrast between the falsehood and sterility of the court on the one hand and the truth and beauty of the country on the other The pastoral element is particularly noticeable, for it is in the forest that lovers are united, villains confounded, and men of true heart vindicated Although the romantic episodes are highly entertaining, the play draws its real strength from the characters of the beggars, whose broad humor counterbalances the more delicate and artificial atmosphere of romance

The Story

Claiming that his daughter had been stolen away by the Flemings, the Duke of Brabant launched against Flanders a bloody seven year campaign which eventually resulted in his defeat. Wolfort, the leader of the Flemish armies, inflamed by his military success and his popularity with the soldiery, usurped the earldom of Flanders, causing the flight of the child Florez, the true earl, his widower father Gerrard, a commoner, his sister Jaculin, who had been pledged to Lord Hubert, and several loyal noblemen. As time passed, Wolfort ruthlessly crushed resistance to his rule, and finally the entire earldom except the city of Bruges capitulated to him. Try as he might, however, Wolfort was unable to find Florez and the party of fugitives. As long as the rightful heir lived, Wolfort's title remained insecure.

Although Hubert remained in Wolfort's court, he could not forget Jaculin, and at last he resolved to go again in search of her. He was captured, however, and returned by the usurper's soldiers. Wolfort received him honorably and, pretending to be overcome with remorse for his crimes, asked Hubert to seek not only Jaculin but also Florez and Gerrard, to whom he would restore the earldom. Although he suspected Wolfort's sincerity, Hubert left for Bruges, where the loyalists had been reported. Hemschirke, one of Wolfort's tools, accompanied Hubert on his mission.

In Bruges the merchants were agog over the success of one of their company, the handsome and liberal young Goswin. Known throughout the city for his courtesy, honesty, and open handedness, Goswin's credit had no bounds, and in love he was as fortunate as he was in business, being engaged to the lovely Gertrude, daughter of Burgomaster Vandunke.

Among the most devoted of Goswin's followers was Clause, king of the beggars, who had been chosen for that eminence by Goswin. The beggar king's subjects included Minche, a pretty beggar maid, and Higgen, Ferret, Prigg, Snap, and Ginks—good fellows all. Hubert and Hemschirke, who were disguised, passed this group on the road near Bruges. Both Clause and Minche looked somehow familiar to Hubert, but when he attempted to inquire about them from the other beggars he was met by stutters and stammers only. Resolving to return later, he continued on to the city, where he and Hemschirke were to be entertained by Vandunke, even though the burgomaster had no love for Wolfort, their master.

Hemschirke, on his arrival, was outraged to learn that Gertrude, his niece and a gentlewoman, was being courted by Goswin, her social inferior. He insulted the young merchant, who replied nobly and returned Hemschirke's blow by striking the nobleman with his own sword. As a result, Hemschirke challenged Goswin to combat. Incapable of fair play, the nobleman hired several ruffians to be on hand when he met Goswin and to beat him. Fortunately, Clause and the beggars met the ruffians near Bruges and, while gulling them, learned of the plot, thus the beggar band seized Hemschirke and his henchmen when they betrayed Goswin.

Clause then learned that Goswin was despondent because he was in debt to the extent of one hundred thousand crowns the day of repayment was upon him and his merchant ships had not come in. Clause told the unbelieving Goswin that the beggars would furnish the money from their treasury by the next day. Only partly reassured, Goswin left the forest. After his departure the beggars turned their attention to their prisoner, Hemschirke, and tormented him until he revealed that Wolfort had instructed him to kill Florez and Gerrard if they could be found and then to dispose of Hubert. Deciding to keep Hemschirke a prisoner, Clause gave him into the care of Hubert.

In Bruges, Goswin grew so concerned over his impending ruin that he almost offended Gertrude, to whom he would not reveal the cause of his worry. When he pleaded with his fellow merchants for a further extension of credit, they, in strong contrast to their previous attitude of regard for him, mercilessly insisted upon the immediate repayment of his debts. He was thoroughly disillusioned and in despair when the faithful Clause entered with two beggars carrying bags of gold. Goswin paid his now fawning creditors and then gratefully promised Clause that he would grant freely one petition, which Clause reserved for the future.

Meanwhile, Hubert had been able to speak alone with Minche, the beggar maid. Their conversation grew tender and Hubert, kissing her, had his previous suspicions confirmed. She was in reality his lost Jaculin. She also recognized him, but would not abandon her disguise for fear of revealing the other members of the beggar band. Hubert then formulated a plan to trap Wolfort. Still pretending to be a simple huntsman, he allowed Hempeskirke to persuade him to set the prisoner free, and he agreed to lead Wolfort and his men to Florez and Gerrard.

During this time Goswin's ships had returned, heavily laden with profitable merchandise. Once more the most successful young merchant in Bruges, he decided to marry Gertrude immediately. When Clause heard this news, however, he unaccountably resolved that the wedding must not take place. Staying only long enough to allow Hubert to identify himself, to recognize him as Gerrard, and to reveal his reason for releasing Hempeskirke, Gerrard, still disguised as the king of the beggars, hurried to Bruges. There he appeared just before the wedding and demanded, for reasons that he would not explain, that Goswin forsake his bride-to-be and accompany him. The young merchant pleaded pitifully, but Gerrard was firm. Goswin had no recourse in honor but to grant the petition he had promised him.

Gertrude, thinking Goswin false to her, followed him into the forest and there fell into the hands of Hempeskirke, Wolfort, and their men. They were met by Hubert, still disguised, who convinced the usurper that the best way to capture the fugitives was to divide his force into five squadrons. Just as Gerrard was informing Goswin that the supposed beggar king was in reality his father and that Goswin was Florez, the rightful earl, Wolfort's forces seized them, Jaculin, and several noblemen disguised as beggars.

When Wolfort spoke to them in their true persons, Gertrude believed that her love for Goswin, who as Florez was high above her, was hopeless, but Wolfort revealing a hitherto unsuspected villainy, identified Gertrude as Bertha, the missing heir of Brabant, stolen from her father and given by Hempeskirke to the innocent Vandunke.

Hubert, in the meantime, had not betrayed his old loyalties; he had arranged for the true beggars, Vandunke, and the loyal merchants of Bruges to overcome Wolfort's scattered troops. As Wolfort was ordering the execution of his captives, Vandunke's band arrived. Florez was at once reunited with Bertha and Hubert with Jaculin. The only ones unhappy at the outcome were the beggars. Claiming that they could not stand the strain of making an honest living, they decided to go to England to practice their trade.

Superficially, Benito Cereno, a long short story, is a tale of mysterious adventure. The story deals with mutiny and slavery elements of excitement on the high seas. The climax is carefully built up, mysteriously guarded, so that, although hints are present, the reader senses a mystery he cannot explain throughout most of the story. Beneath this tale of mysterious adventure, however, Melville deals significantly with the horror and depravity of which man is capable, a depravity caused by the institution of slavery. In the story, Negro slaves mutiny on a Spanish vessel and commit all sorts of horrible atrocities in order to retain power. Captain Amasa Delano, a good hearted, naive, high principled New Englander, wanders into this depravity. He cannot fully perceive or understand it, if aware, he could not cope with it. Yet, almost miraculously, his very innocence allows him, at the crucial moment, to rescue the victimized Benito. It is almost as if his innocence, ironically, permits him to conquer evil, though he himself is hardly aware of what he is doing. The ironic aspects of the tale, in addition to the development of the characters and Melville's speculations on the incident, help to make this a magnificently contrived parable of limited, rational, well ordered man struggling against the forces of evil in the social and natural universe and achieving at least a partial victory.

Captain Amasa Delano, commander of an American sealer called Bachelor's Delight, was anchored in the harbor of St. Maria, on an island off the coast of southern Chile. While there, he saw a ship apparently in distress and, thinking it carried a party of monks, he set out in a whaleboat to board the vessel and supply it with food and water. When he came aboard, he found that the ship, the San Dominick, was a Spanish merchant ship carrying slaves. The crew was parched and moaning, the ship itself was filthy, the sails were rotten. Most deplorable of all, the captain, the young Don Benito Cereno, seemed barely able to stand or to talk coherently. Aloof, indifferent, the captain seemed ill both physically (he coughed constantly) and mentally. The captain was constantly attended by Babo, his devoted Negro slave.

Delano sent the whaleboat back to his ship to get additional water, food, and extra sails for the San Dominick, while he himself remained aboard the desolate ship. He tried to talk to Cereno, but the captain's fainting fits kept interrupting the conversation. The Spaniard seemed reserved and sour, in spite of Delano's attempts to assure the man that he was now out of danger. Delano finally assumed that Cereno was suffering from a severe mental disorder. The captain did, with great difficulty and after frequent private talks with Babo, manage to explain that the San Dominick had been at sea for 190 days. They had, Cereno explained, started out as a well manned and smart vessel sailing from Buenos Aires to Lima, but had encountered severe gales around Cape Horn, lost many officers and men, and then run into dreadful calms and the ravages of plagues and scurvy. Most of the Spanish officers and all of the passengers, including the slave owner, Don Alexandro Aranda, had died of fever. Delano, who knew that the weather in recent months had not been as extreme as Cereno described it simply concluded that the Spanish officers had been incompetent and had not taken the proper precautions against disease. Cereno kept repeating that only the devotion of his slave, Babo, had kept him alive.

Numerous other circumstances on the San Dominick began to make the innocent Delano more suspicious. Although everything was in disorder and Cereno was obviously ill, he was dressed perfectly in a clean uniform. Six Negroes were sitting in the rigging holding hatchets although Cereno said they were only cleaning them. Two Negroes were beating up a Spanish boy, but Cereno explained that this deed was simply a form of sport. The slaves were not in chains, Cereno claimed they were so docile they did not require chains. This notion pleased the humane Delano, although it also surprised him.

Every two hours, as they awaited the expected wind and the arrival of Delano's whaleboat, a large Negro in chains was brought before Cereno, who would ask the Negro if he, the captain, could be forgiven. The Negro would answer, "No," and be led away. At one point Delano began to fear that Cereno and Babo were plotting against him, for they moved away from him and whispered together. Cereno then asked Delano about his ship, requesting the number of men and the strength of arms aboard the Bachelor's Delight. Delano thought they might be pirates.

Nevertheless, Delano joined Cereno and Babo in Cereno's cabin for dinner. Throughout the meal Delano alternately gained and lost confidence in Cereno's story. He tried, while discussing means of getting Cereno new sails, to get Babo to leave the room, but the man and the master were apparently inseparable. After dinner Babo, while shaving his master, cut his cheek slightly despite the warning that had been given. Babo left the room for a second and returned with his own cheek cut in a curious imitation of his master's. Delano thought this episode curious and sinister, but he finally decided that the man was so devoted to Cereno that he had punished himself for inadvertently cutting his master.

At last Delano's whaleboat returned with more supplies. Delano about to leave the San Dominick, promised to return with new sails the next day. When he invited Cereno to his own boat, he was surprised at the captain's curt refusal and his failure to escort the visitor to the rail. Delano was offended at the Spaniard's apparent lack of gratitude. As the whaleboat was about to leave, Cereno appeared suddenly at the rail. He expressed his gratitude profusely and then hastily jumped into the whaleboat. At first Delano thought that Cereno was about to kill him, then he saw Babo at the rail brandishing a knife. In a flash he realized that Babo and the other slaves had been holding Cereno a captive. Delano took Cereno back to the Bachelor's Delight. Later they pursued the fleeing slaves. The slaves, having no guns, were easily captured by the American ship and brought back to shore.

Cereno later explained that the slaves having mutinied shortly after the ship set out, had committed horrible atrocities and killed most of the Spaniards. They had murdered the mate, Raneds, for a trifling offense and had committed atrocities on the dead body of Don Alexandro Aranda, whose skeleton they placed on the masthead.

On his arrival in Lima, Don Benito Cereno submitted a long testimony, recounting all the cruelties the slaves had committed. Babo was tried and hanged. Cereno felt enormously grateful to Delano, recalling the strange innocence that had somehow kept the slaves from harming him, when they had the chance, aboard the San Dominick.

Don Benito Cereno planned to enter a monastery, however, broken in body and spirit, he died three months after he completed his testimony.

Critique

The elements of interest in Berenice are three fold historical political, and sentimental Racine has taken liberties with history In reality, Titus and Berenice were drawn together by ambition, and Antiochus never king of Comagene, was neither a friend to Titus, who scorned his presumption, nor in love with Berenice Rather the historical element provides a brilliant background, masterfully suggested by Racine's poetry On the political level, Titus represents the ideal sovereign, according to Racine and most of his contemporaries Having the highest conception of his duty and his dignity and being both guardian and victim of Roman law, he sacrifices his love for it The interest supplied by Bérenice is mostly sentimental, but she is considered one of Racine's most convincing feminine characters Titus, a model for all sovereigns, is a tender lover who suffers from the wrong he must do to himself and to his love Antiochus, who receives confidences from both lovers, suffers to see Berenice unhappy over a man who is both his rival and his friend He drifts from the greatest hope to the utmost despair The play seems to have inaugurated a new dramatic approach corresponding to a new sensibility It contains some of Racine's most beautiful love verses

The period of official mourning for the Emperor Vespasian had ended His son Titus was to succeed to the throne, and the rumor was that he would marry Berenice, the Queen of Palestine, with whom he had long been in love Antiochus, the war companion of Titus and a close friend, was also Bérenice's faithful friend Although he had been in love with her for five years, she had never responded to his feeling

Antiochus, who had hoped that Titus would not marry Berenice, went to see her for the last time before he left Rome He gave orders to his confidant Arsace to prepare everything for his departure Arsace was surprised that Antiochus should be preparing to leave when Titus was rising to great honor and would, in all probability, want his friend close by

Berenice, confident that the rumor of her marriage with Titus was true, was expecting a confirmation at any moment When Antiochus appeared to bid her farewell, she cruelly reproached him for declaring his love at that time She declared that she had enjoyed his friendship and was depending on him to stay as a dear witness to her happiness

Titus, aware that his love for Bérenice was a cause of concern to the Roman Empire, asked Paulin, a faithful confidant, his opinion of the emperor's sur

Paulin said frankly that the court would approve anything Titus might do, but that the Roman people would never be willing to have Berenice as their empress. Although Titus realized this fact only too well, he tried desperately to cling to his hope that somehow he could make her his wife without arousing public indignation and protest. Meanwhile, he sent for Antiochus and asked him to take Berenice back to her own country.

When Berenice arrived full of love and joy and believing that she would soon marry Titus, the emperor, unable to tell her the truth, blamed his father's death for the restrictions imposed upon him. She misunderstood him, however, and with all her passion reaffirmed her love, saying that he could never miss his father as she would miss him if he did not love her. Overwhelmed, Titus found it impossible to tell her that he could not make her his empress.

Left alone with Phenice, Bérénice showed some concern over Titus' actions and speech. Then, remembering that Titus was to see Antiochus, she imagined that he was jealous of Antiochus and therefore really in love with her, and that soon everything would be all right.

When Antiochus arrived, Titus asked him to talk to Berenice in his place, as a friend, and to assure her that Titus was sacrificing their love only out of the demands of duty. Left alone with Arsace, Antiochus did not know whether to rejoice for himself or grieve for his friend. Although his heart was filled with renewed hope, he did not want to be the one to tell Bérénice of Titus' decision. But in spite of his reluctance Berenice persuaded him to reveal what Titus had told him. On hearing his story she refused to believe him and said that she herself would see Titus. In a painful interview she declared that she would kill herself. Paulin had a hard time to keep Titus from following her when she left. Antiochus, alarmed, came to beg Titus to save her life.

Titus met with the representatives of the Senate. Meanwhile, he asked Antiochus to reassure Berenice of his love. Arsace came looking for Antiochus with the news that Bérénice, about to leave Rome, had written a letter to Titus. Antiochus announced that he was going to commit suicide, and left Berenice coming out of her apartment, met Titus and told him she was leaving immediately. When Titus declared that he loved her now more than ever, she pleaded with him to show mercy and love her less when he ordered her to leave. He found the letter, which announced her decision to die since she could not stay with him. Saying that he could not let her go, he called for Antiochus. When Bérénice collapsed, Titus, in despair, assured her that he loved her to such a degree that he would be willing to give up the empire for her sake, even though he knew that she would be ashamed of him if he were to do so. If she would not promise to stay alive, he declared, he would kill himself. When Antiochus arrived, Titus told him to be a witness of how weak love had made his friend. Antiochus replied that he had always loved Berenice and that he had been preparing to commit suicide when Titus called him back.

Moved by so much grief on all sides, Bérénice accepted Titus' decision. Leaving, she asked Antiochus to pattern his decision on theirs. Thus the three went different ways.

Critique

Between the Acts, Virginia Woolf's last novel is a work filled with cryptic and portentous symbols. Written during the early years of World War II, it presents with poetic and fragmentary vision an outline of stark human drama against the vast backdrop of history. In Mrs Woolf's handling of background there is always an awareness of the primitive or historical past, conveyed in images of the flint arrowhead, the Roman road, the manor house which is the scene of the novel. England rather than time gives the novel its underlying theme. But the pageant which presents a picture of English history from the Middle Ages to the present is only an interlude between the acts. The true drama is found in the lives of the trivial, selfish, stupid, frustrated, idealistic people who watch the pageant and in the end are brought face to face with themselves, actors in an older drama than Miss La Trobe's pictures out of the past or the threat of the war to come in the planes droning overhead. The novel represents Mrs Woolf's final affirmation of the artist's vision, the ability to distinguish between the false and the true, and to catch a glimpse of truth in the mirror of reality.

Pointz Hall was not one of the great English houses mentioned in the guide books, but it was old and comfortable and pleasantly situated in a tree fringed meadow. The house was older than the name of its owners in the county. Although they had hung the portrait of an ancestress in brocade and pearls beside the staircase and kept under glass a watch that had stopped a bullet at Waterloo, the Olivers had lived only a little more than a century in a district where the names of the villagers went back to Domesday Book. The countryside still showed traces of the ancient Britons: the Roman road, the Elizabethan manor house, the marks of the plow on a hill sown in wheat during Napoleon's time.

The owner of the house was Bartholomew Oliver, retired from the Indian Civil Service. With him lived his son Giles, his daughter in law Isa, two small grandchildren, and his widowed sister, Mrs Lucy Swithin. Bartholomew, a disgruntled old man who lived more and more in the past, was constantly snubbing his sister as he had done when they were children. Mrs Swithin was a woman of careless dress, good manners, quiet faith, and great intelligence. Her favorite book was an Outline of History; she dreamed of a time when Piccadilly was a rhododendron forest in which the mastodon roamed. Giles Oliver was a London stock broker who had wanted to be a farmer until circumstances decided otherwise. A misunderstanding had lately developed between him and his wife Isa, who wrote poetry in secret, suspected that Giles had been unfaithful and fancied herself in love with Rupert Haines, a married gentleman farmer of the neighborhood. Isa thought that Mrs Haines had the eyes of a gobbling goose.

On a June morning in 1939, Pointz Hall awoke. Mrs Swithin, aroused by the birds, read again in the Outline of History until the maid brought her tea. She wondered if the afternoon would be rainy or fine, for this was the day of the pageant to raise funds for installing electric lights in the village church. Later she went to early service. Old Bartholomew walked with his Afghan hound on the terrace where his grandson George was bent over a cluster of flowers. When the old man folded his newspaper into a cone to cover his nose and jumped suddenly at the boy, George began to cry. Bartholomew grumbled that his grandson was a crybaby and went back to his paper. From her window Isa looked out at her son and the baby, Caro, in her perambulator that a nurse was pushing. Then she went off to order the fish for lunch. She read in Bartholomew's discarded newspaper the story of an attempted assault on a girl in the barracks at Whitehall. Returning from church, Mrs Swithin tacked another placard on the barn where the pageant would be given if the day turned out rainy, regardless of the weather, tea would also be served there during the intermission. Mocked again by her brother, she went off to make sandwiches for the young men and women who were decorating the barn.

Giles was expected back from London in time for the pageant. The family had just decided not to wait lunch for him when Mrs Manresa and a young man named William Dodge arrived unexpectedly and uninvited. They had intended, Mrs Manresa explained, to picnic in the country, but when she saw the Olivers' name on the signpost she had suddenly decided to visit her old friends. Mrs Manresa, loud, cheerful, vulgar, was a woman of uncertain background married to a wealthy Jew. William Dodge, she said, was an artist. He was, he declared, a clerk. Giles, arriving in the middle of lunch and finding Mrs Manresa's showy car at the door, was furious, he and Mrs Manresa had been carrying on an affair. After lunch, on the terrace, he sat hating William Dodge. Finally Mrs Swithin took pity on the young man's discomfort and took him off to see her brother's collection of pictures. William wanted to tell her that he was married but his child was not his child, that he was a pervert, that her kindness had healed his wretched day but he could not speak.

The guests, arriving for the pageant began to fill the chairs set on the lawn, for the afternoon was sunny and clear. Behind the thick bushes that served as a dressing room Miss La Trobe, the author and director of the pageant, was giving the last instructions to her cast. She was something of a mystery in the village, for no one knew where she came from. There were rumors that she had kept a tea shop, that she had been an actress. Abrupt, restless, she walked about the fields, used strong language, and drank too much at the local pub. She was a frustrated artist. Now she was wondering if her audience would realize that in her pageant she had tried to give unity to English history, to give something of herself as well.

The pageant began. The first scene showed the age of Chaucer, with pilgrims on their way to Canterbury. Eliza Clark, who sold tobacco in the village, appeared in another scene as Queen Elizabeth Albert, the village idiot, played her court fool. The audience hoped he would not do anything dreadful. In a play performed before Gloriana, Mrs Otter of the End House played the old crone who had saved the true prince, the supposed beggar who fell in love with the duke's daughter. Then Miss La Trobe's vision of the Elizabethan age ended and it was time for tea during the intermission.

Mrs Manresa applauded, she had seen herself as Queen Elizabeth and Giles as the hero. Giles glowered. Walking toward the barn, he came on a coiled snake swallowing a toad, and he stamped on them until his tennis shoes were splattered with blood. Isa tried to catch a glimpse of Rupert Haines Failing, she offered to show William Dodge the greenhouses. They discovered that they could talk frankly, like two strangers.

The pageant began again This time the scene showed the Age of Reason Once more Miss La Trobe had written a play within a play the characters had names like Lady Harpy Harraden, Sir Spaniel Lilyliver, Florinda, Valentine, and Sir Smirking Peace be with you all, a clergyman After another brief interval, the cast reassembled for a scene from the Victorian Age Mr Budge, the publican, was made up as a policeman Albert was in the headquarters of a donkey while the rest of the cast pretended to be on a picnic in 1860 Then Mr Budge announced that the time had come to pack and be gone When Isa asked Mrs Swithin what the Victorians were like, the old woman said that they had been like Isa William Dodge, and herself, only dressed differently

The terrace stage had been left bare Suddenly the cast came running from behind the bushes, each holding up a mirror of some kind in which the men and women in the audience saw themselves reflected in self-conscious poses The time was the present of June, 1939 Swallows were sweeping homeward in the late light Above them twelve airplanes flying in formation cut across the sky, drowning out all other sounds The pageant was over, the audience dispersed Mrs Manresa and William Dodge drove away in her car Miss La Trobe went on to the inn There she drank and saw a vision and tried to find words in which to express it—to make people see once more, as she had tried to do that afternoon

Darkness fell across the village and the fields At Pointz Hall the visitors had gone and the family was alone Bartholomew read the evening paper and drowsed in his chair Mrs Swithin took up her Outline of History and turned the pages while she thought of mastodons and prehistoric birds At last she and her brother went off to bed

Now the true drama of the day was about to begin, ancient as the hills, secret and primitive as the black night outside Giles and Isa would quarrel, embrace, and sleep The curtain rose on another scene in the long human drama of enmity, love, and peace

This Middle English romance, also sometimes spelled "Beves," comes to us in many versions, including several from France, Scandinavia, and Italy The manuscripts in English contain a wealth of incident, much of which parallels that found in the native romances of France and other areas, however, Bevis of Hamp ton is of special importance because it also contains typically English elements and thus serves as a fine example of the transition from the rude Anglo Saxon tales to the more refined French romances that prevailed after 1066. This quality of the poem may be seen by the later additions of much foreign material to a typically English celebration of a local hero. Although early romances are seldom found to have great unity of plot, Bevis of Hampton probably violates this principle as much as such a form could. As a metrical romance, Bevis of Hampton is not a success, but it is historically significant and contains that most common charm of early tales—the exuberant force of great events told in a fast moving, sometimes even humorous, fashion.

The bold spirit of Bevis was first displayed when he was only seven years old. His father had been treacherously murdered, and now his mother and the assassin were engaged in shameless revelry. Bursting into the castle hall, Bevis cudgelled his mother's paramour, Sir Murdour, into senselessness. The mother, fearing future outbursts, sold him into slavery.

But honor, not slavery, awaited the courageous youth. Taken by slave merchants from England to a Saracen court, Bevis so impressed the king, Ermyrn, that the monarch made the youth a chamberlain.

After holding this position for eight uneventful years, Bevis began a series of remarkable exploits. The first was his single-handed slaughter of sixty Saracen warriors who made the error of deriding his Christianity. Next, he attacked and killed a man-eating boar and, to retain his trophy, beat out the brains of twelve keepers of the forest. These successes of the fifteen-year-old boy led Ermyrn to place him in charge of a small troop that was to defend the kingdom against the aggression of Bradmond, a rival king. Bevis, astride his incomparable horse

Arundel and wielding his good sword Morglay, laid waste to the enemy forces. To his later misfortune, however, he spared Bradmond's life.

Bevis' valor had not escaped the attention of Josyan, the king's daughter. In fact, this fair young girl became so enamored of him that she agreed to renounce her religion and become a Christian if he would marry her. Hitherto reluctant, Bevis, under this condition, consented. But when news of his daughter's apostasy reached Ermyrn, the incensed king determined to get rid of her corrupter. To accomplish this task, he sent Bevis unarmed to the court of Bradmond with a sealed letter requesting the bearer's execution. Only after a considerable number of men were slain was Bevis subdued and thrown into a dungeon.

For seven long years Bevis remained in the dungeon, and during that time he grew in Christian virtue. At last divine intercession, as a reward for his piety, plus his own initiative (he killed two jailers and a dozen grooms) enabled him to end his imprisonment. Immediately, he headed for Jerusalem to confess his sins and give thanks to God. Killing a sturdy knight and a thirty-foot giant on the way, he reached the Holy City and there received absolution, accompanied by an injunction never to marry a woman who was not a virgin.

Then, in order to be reunited with Josyan, he started toward Ermony, but on the way he learned that the maid, during his imprisonment, had married King Inor of Mounbraunt. To have one last look at his beloved, he dressed himself as a palmer and went to Mounbraunt. There Josyan, discovering his true identity, implored him to take her away. He at first refused, but when she revealed that, though seven years married, she had by magic avoided deflowering, he relented.

After they had escaped from the city by trickery, Bevis turned his thoughts toward returning to England and avenging

ing his father's death Several years before he had learned that Saber, his uncle, was waging war against Sir Murdour and needed his nephew's help to gain the victory Imprisonment, however, had detained Bevis, and he was to encounter other obstacles before he again saw England

Killing two lions with one blow and subduing a thirty foot giant, Ascapard, who then became his page, the indomitable Bevis, accompanied by his mistress, made his way to the coast In a ship taken from the Saracens, they set sail for Germany In Cologne, Josyan was at last baptized And it was near this city that Bevis had the most perilous adventure of his life A burning dragon was his opponent on this occasion Only after suffering a broken rib, being knocked unconscious, and falling into a miraculous well was Bevis able to defeat his enemy

Leaving Ascapard to protect Josyan and taking with him a hundred men, Bevis finally sailed to England Posing as a French knight, he tricked Sir Murdour, who was now his stepfather, into providing him with arms and horses These supplies he then carried to his uncle and they prepared to make war on Sir Murdour

Back in Cologne, meanwhile, Josyan was in trouble, for a German earl had conceived a great lust for her After tricking the giant into leaving, he fancied that she was at his mercy But the resourceful Josyan insisted that he marry her, then on the wedding night she calmly made a slip knot in her girdle, strangled the unsuspecting German, and hung the corpse over a beam The next day, when the deed was exposed, the unrepenting widow was sentenced to be burned, but before the sentence could be carried out, Ascapard and Bevis arrived, rescued her from the stake, and killed all who opposed them

though Sir Murdour had a large army from Germany and another from Scotland, Bevis, assisted by Ascapard, Saber, and a moderate number of knights, won the battle Sir Murdour was thrown by the victors into a caldron filled with boiling pitch and molten lead, Bevis' mother, on hearing the news, threw herself from a lofty tower

Bevis now had avenged his father's death and regained his heritage To complete his happiness, he married Josyan But he was not destined to settle down in peace In London, where he had gone to receive investiture, an event occurred that led him into further adventures after the son of King Edgar tried to steal Bevis' horse and had his brains knocked out by the animal's sudden kick Because King Edgar was inconsolable over the loss of his son and intent on revenge, Bevis proposed, in expiation of the crime, to settle his land on Saber and to banish himself and his horse from England

Ascapard, after pondering this change in his master's fortunes, decided to betray him Hastening to Mounbraunt, he made an agreement with King Inor to bring back Josyan When the giant discovered her in a forest hut, she had just given birth to twin boys Leaving the babies, he seized Josyan and started for Mounbraunt Bevis, returning to the hut, took up the children and began searching for Josyan Arriving at a large town, he decided to stay there and await news of his wife While waiting, he entered a tournament and overcame all adversaries The prize was the hand in marriage of a young lady, daughter and heiress of a duke Bevis agreed to wed her after seven years, if Josyan had not by then appeared

Saber, meanwhile, had learned, through a dream, of Josyan's plight Accompanied by twelve knights, he overtook the giant on the road to Mounbraunt, killed him, and freed Josyan Then began a long search for Bevis

After nearly seven years of wandering, they came to the town where Bevis was residing, and Josyan was reunited with her husband and children Presently news arrived that Josyan's father was in trouble King Inor was attacking his kingdom Bevis went to his rescue, defeated King Inor, and reached a reconciliation with his father in law When Ermyn died a short time later, Bevis' son Guv became King of Ermony A second empire came to the family soon after in another fight with King Inor Bevis killed him and became the ruler of Mounbraunt To both these countries, Bevis by the method of rewarding converts and butchering recalcitrants, brought Christianity

Again he was not destined to rule in peace News came that his uncle's lands had been taken by King Edgar Hurrying to the assistance of Saber Bevis and his two sons led an attack on the city of London in which sixty thousand men were killed To end the slaughter, Edgar agreed that his only daughter should marry Mile son of Bevis

Guy, Bevis' other son resumed his rule of Ermony, and Bevis and Josyan returned to Mounbraunt There Josyan stricken by a mortal disease, died in her husband's arms A few minutes later the peace of death descended also on that incomparable night, Sir Bevis of Hampton

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

In Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883-1884) Friedrich Nietzsche proclaimed in parable and pseudo-prophetic cries the philosophy of the Superman the being who would transcend man in his will to power, going beyond conventional morality and making his own law Beyond Good and Evil carries forward, in a somewhat more temperate style, the same basic ideas, but with particular attention to values and morality The central thesis of the book is that the proud, creative individual goes beyond good and evil in action, thought, and creation

Ordinary men are fearful, obedient, and slave-like The true aristocrat of the spirit, the noble man, is neither slave nor citizen, he is the lawmaker, the one who determines by his acts and decisions what is right or wrong, good or bad He is what the novelist Dostoevski in Crime and Punishment calls the "extraordinary" man

To sharpen his image of the noble man Nietzsche describes two primary types of morality master morality and slave morality Moral values are determined either by the rulers or the ruled

The rulers naturally regard the terms "good" and "bad" as synonymous with "noble" and "despicable" They apply moral values to men, venerating the aristocrat but those who are ruled the subservient class, apply moral values primarily to acts, grounding the value of an act in its utility, its service to them For the noble man pride and strength are virtues, for the "slaves" patience, self-sacrifice, meekness, and humility are virtues The aristocrat scorns utility, cowardice, self-abasement, and the telling of lies, as a member of the ruling class he must seek the opposite moral qualities According to Nietzsche

The noble type of man regards himself as a determiner of values, he does not require to be approved of he passes the judgment "What is injurious to me is injurious in itself" he knows that it is he himself only who confers honour on things, he is a creator of values He honours whatever he recognizes in himself such morality is self-glorification

Those who are ruled, the slaves, construct a morality which will make their suffering bearable They are pessimistic in their morality and come to regard the "good" man as the "safe" man, one who is "good natured, easily deceived, perhaps a little stupid, un bonhomme"

Nietzsche concludes that in slave morality "language shows a tendency to approximate the significations of the words 'good' and 'stupid'" Perhaps because Nietzsche regarded love considered "as a passion" as of noble origin, he maintained in the chapter titled "Apothegms and Interludes" that "What is done out of love always takes place beyond good and evil"

A proper interpretation of Nietzsche's work is possible only if one remembers that Nietzsche is not talking about actual political rulers and the ruled, although even in this particular case something of his general thesis applies He is speaking instead of those who have the power and will to be a law to themselves, to pass their own moral judgments according to their inclinations, and of those who do not the former are the masters, the latter, the slaves A revealing statement of the philosophical perspective from which this view becomes possible is the apothegm, "There is no such thing as moral phenomena, but only a moral interpretation of phenomena"

Nietzsche must be given credit for having anticipated to a considerable extent many of the prevailing tendencies in twentieth century philosophy He is sophisticated about language, he understands the persuasive function of philosophy, and he is unrelenting in his naturalistic and relativistic interpretation of man's values and moralities If he errs at all in his philosophic objectivity, it is in endorsing the way of power as if, in some absolute sense, that is the way, the only right way This flaw in Nietzsche's disdain of dogmatism, this capitulation to dogmatism in his own case, is one cause of the ironic character of his book

fear of failure and rejection The fear is so strong that it comes to the surface of certain passages despite what must have been the author's desire to keep it hidden Certainly he would not have appreciated the irony of having others discover that he himself is the slave he so much despises! For example, in the last few pages of the book Nietzsche writes that "Every deep thinker is more afraid of being understood than of being misunderstood" A little later, in describing the philosopher, he writes "A philosopher alas, a being who often runs away from himself, is often afraid of himself" He ends the book with a passage which begins, "Alas! what are you, after all, my written and painted thoughts!" and ends, "but nobody will divine how ye looked in your morning, you sudden sparks and marvels of my solitude you, my old, beloved—evil thoughts!" Although in context such passages seem to be part of Nietzsche's pose of superiority, it is interesting that out of context they take on another, revealing meaning

Nietzsche begins his book with a chapter on the "Prejudices of Philosophers" He claims that philosophers pretend to doubt everything, but in the exposition of their views they reveal the prejudices they mean to communicate Philosophers of the past have tried to derive human values from some outside source, the result has been that what they reveal is nothing more than their own dogmatic "frog perspective" Nietzsche, on the other hand, prides himself on being one of the "new" philosophers, one who suggests that the traditional values may be intimately related to their evil opposites

Nietzsche chides traditional philosophers for scurrying after truth as if she were a woman He argues that false opinions are often better than true ones, that the only test of an opinion is not whether it is true or false but whether it is "life furthering, life preserving, species preserving, perhaps species rearing" This is the point at which his own dogmatism shows itself in making "species rearing" the criterion of a worthy idea he shows his own prejudice in favor of the man of power. He is unabashed in his preference and argues that the recognition of the value of untruth impugns the traditional ideas of value and places his philosophy beyond good and evil. Nietzsche, declaring himself one who wishes to bring about a transvaluation of all values, argues that there is no more effective way than to begin by supposing that conventional morality is a sign of slavery and weakness. The free man, the man strong enough to be independent, sees through the pretenses of philosophers and moralists, he laughs, and creates a new world.

According to Nietzsche himself, there is danger in his philosophy. In fact, he takes pride in that danger. He identifies himself with the "philosophers of the dangerous 'Perhaps'"—that is, with philosophers who insist that "perhaps" every one else is mistaken. He offers certain "tests" that one can use to determine whether he is ready for independence and command, and he says that one should not avoid these tests, "although they constitute perhaps the most dangerous game one can play." He chooses a dangerous name for the new philosophers: "tempters."

Speaking for the "philosophers of the future," the "opposite ones," Nietzsche writes: "we believe that severity, violence, slavery, danger in the street and in the heart, secrecy, stoicism, tempter's art and devilry of every kind,—that everything wicked, terrible, tyrannical, predatory, and serpentine in man, serves as well for the elevation of the human species as its opposite."

Considered coolly, what is this danger and devilry of which Nietzsche is so fond? It is nothing more than the possibility of new lines of development for the human spirit. The danger and the dev-

iltry are such only in relation to the rule-bound spirits of conventional men. Nietzsche is philosopher enough to know that the human being is too complex an organism ever to have been confined or exhausted by ways of life already tried and endorsed. He calls attention to the value of revolt by playing the devil or tempter. The "most dangerous game," or the "big hunt," is man's free search for new ways of being in so far as he has the power. The hunting domain is extensive; it is the entire range of man's experiences, both actual and possible. And there is no need or use in taking "hundreds of hunting assistants," Nietzsche tells us, for each man must search alone; each man must do everything himself in order to learn anything.

Nietzsche's objection to Christianity is that it has been a major force in limiting man by imposing on him a static morality. Since Nietzsche thinks of man's most important creative function as the creation of a new self, since he would urge each man, as artist, to use himself as material and fashion a new man, even a superman, he rejects as life-defeating any force that works against such a creative function. He argues that men with neither the strength nor the intelligence to recognize the differences among men, to distinguish the nobles from the slaves, have fashioned Christianity with the result that man has become nothing more than "a gregarious animal, something obliging, sickly, mediocre."

Whether one agrees with Nietzsche in his estimate of Christianity and philosophy, no one can justifiably deny his claim that to look beyond good and evil, to throw over conventional modes of thought, is to provide oneself with a challenging, even a liberating, experience. The old "tempter" tempts us into a critical consideration of our values, and that is all to the good.

THE BIGLOW PAPERS

Type of work Poetry, with editorial comment

Author James Russell Lowell (1819-1891)

First published 1848 (First Series), 1867 (Second Series)

HOSEA BIGLOW, the Yankee author of the poems in The Biglow Papers
BIRDOFREDUM SAWIN, his correspondent a Massachusetts militiaman
(First Series), an adopted Rebel (Second Series)

HOMER WILBUR, A.M., Parson of the First Church of Jaalam, author of the editorial comments in The Biglow Papers

The Biglow Papers are political satire, and as such, cannot be understood or appreciated until the reader is acquainted, first, with the policies and ideas being satirized and secondly, with the conditions of their publication. In short, like all satire, they must be seen in their historical perspective before they can be evaluated.

There are two series of the Papers. The first is an attack, from the Whig Abolitionist point of view, on the Mexican War and the policies of Polk and the pro-slavery forces that authorized it; the second—all but the last paper—is an attack, from the Northern Republican point of view, on the rebellious, slaveholding South, the Democrats, and the interventionist policies of England during the first years of the Civil War. The last paper is a condemnation of the "retrograde movement" of President Johnson.

The history of the papers is rather complex. In one sense, perhaps, it dates back to 1840 and the beginning of Lowell's relationship with Maria White, who became his wife in 1844, for it was this visionary and forceful young woman who first converted him to the abolitionist cause. In any case by the time of the outbreak of the Mexican War (1846), Lowell had identified himself with the movement by contributions to the National Anti-Slavery Standard, which he edited for a short time. Such a radical position was more in keeping with the spirit of the Emersonians than with that of the aloof Brahmins with whom Lowell was allied by birth, and the strong influence of his wife's personality and ideals may be inferred from the fact that Lowell grew more and more conservative in the years following her death. By the time of his own death he was once more a conservative, but in the 1840's his radical leanings brought him into the camp of those idealistic New Englanders who preached freedom vociferously (and at times effectively) and those shrewd and stubborn rural Yankees who supported them for more practical reasons. The First Series of The Biglow Papers arose from the interaction of these two elements: abolitionist idealism gave it motivation, Yankee shrewdness gave it form.

The first Biglow Paper appeared as a letter to the editor of the Boston Courier, a weekly Whig newspaper, in June of 1846. The letter was signed by one Ezekiel Biglow of Jaalam, Massachusetts, and its ostensible purpose was to introduce a poem by Mr. Biglow's son, Hosea. The important thing here was the poem, an attack, in the Yankee dialect, on the recruiting of the Massachusetts regiment for service in a war which the abolitionists and their sympathizers claimed was being fought only to extend the borders of slavery.

The response to this first letter prompted Lowell to continue the poetic exertions of young Mr. Biglow. "The success of my experiment," wrote Lowell later in the introduction to the Second Series, "soon began not only to astonish me, but to make me feel the responsibility of knowing I had in my hand a weapon instead of the mere fencing stick I had supposed." Lowell, clad in the rustic armor of Hosea Biglow, entered the jousts with this new found weapon eight more times in the following two years Five of these dialect poems were direct political attacks on the war party group and their sympathizers, the Democrats and the "Cotton" Whigs (those Whigs, as opposed to the "Conscience" Whigs, who favored the war and were more or less tolerant of slavery), particularly those to be found in Biglow's—and Lowell's—own Bay State The other three provided a more general satire of the progress of the war, the ignorance, inefficiency, and immorality of those in command, and the mistreatment of the Massachusetts enlisted man, both as soldier and disabled veteran

This general satire was presented through a new character, Birdofredum Sawin, whom Lowell introduced in his second letter to the Courier Sawin was a ne'er do-well Yankee from Jaalam who, succumbing to the blandishments of the recruiting officer, had enlisted as a private in the Massachusetts regiment From Mexico, he wrote back to Hosea who turned his letter into the Eastern Massachusetts equivalent of iambic heptameter couplets Birdofredum's complaints and caustic observations supplied the material for papers Two, Eight, and Nine In Two he is engaged in combat In Eight and Nine he has been released from service minus one eye and one arm, he still has two legs, though by this time one of them is wooden

The third "character" of these papers did not come upon the scene until the poems were published in book form late in 1848 This character is the pastor of the First Church of Jaalam, the Rev Homer Wilbur, A M, who is presented as the editor of the volume Admits Lowell eighteen years later

I needed on occasion to rise above the level of mere patois, and for this purpose conceived the Rev Mr Wilbur, who should express the more cautious element of the New England character and its pedantry, as Mr Biglow should serve for its homely common sense vivified and heated by conscience

The pedantry and the long winded self centeredness of Mr Wilbur add much to the book—literally, for the learned church man's remarks take up more space in the volume than do the nine original poems His verbose expatiations do, undoubtedly, allow Lowell to express, as he says "the more cautious element of the Yankee character," and they allow him, also, to extend his satire by poking fun at the excessive and distracting paraphernalia that encumber learned works Most amusing, perhaps, are the "Notices of an Independent Press" that Mr Biglow admittedly wrote himself and included the lengthy material at the beginning of the volume And besides offering amusing material, Mr Wilbur can become eloquent in his own right in defense of freedom For the most part however, Lowell's imitation of pedantry is too realistic Rather than acting as ballast, Mr Wilbur almost causes the book to sink In the end, his main contribution is that of making the poems, when they finally appear more delightful because of their contrast to his wordy prose

The addition of Parson Wilbur was a sign of the innate conservative caution in Lowell's character as artist, critic, and political figure This caution and conservatism betray themselves still more in the Second Series of The Biglow Papers By the time the slavery question reached its climax, Lowell was no longer the outspoken young abolitionist radical of the forties By then he had been for six years Professor of Belles Lettres at Harvard (having succeeded his friend Longfellow to that chair in 1855), had founded and was still editor of the Atlantic Monthly, and, perhaps most important of all, had lost his wife, Maria White Lowell (1853) and had remarried Occasionally he is effective in the Second Series, especially in the letters from Birdofredum Sawin (who, after having been falsely imprisoned in the South for two years, marries a slaveholding widow and becomes a sympathizer with the Southern cause) and in the last part of the second paper, an attack on England which ends with a piece bearing the title of "Jonathan to John"

The South says Poor folks down! John, an 'All men up! say we —
 White yeller black an brown, John
 Now which is your idee?
 Ole Uncle S sez he I guess, John preaches wal sez he
 'But sermon thru, an come to du
 Why there's the old J B
 A crowdin you an me!

In these he rises to the satirical heights of the original collection, but for the most part, as Lowell himself admitted, the papers of the Second Series are more studied, less spontaneous, more cautious and less biting than those of the first. Even the quaintness of the old Yankee diction was intentionally diminished, excused by the claim that Hosea was being tutored by Parson Wilbur and was learning proper spelling and academic phraseology.

Lowell kept the Yankee dialect to the last, but in the end his apparent need to defend its use is another indication of the dying out of his earlier satiric fire. The individual numbers of the Second Series were first printed in the Atlantic

Monthly, when, in 1867, they were collected in book form. Lowell wrote for them a lengthy introduction. A brilliant contribution to linguistic knowledge, the preface is made concrete by Lowell's sensitive ear for dialect, and it is documented by his voluminous reading in English and American literature. Valuable as it is in its own right, however, it is still an apology, and when satire is apologized for, it loses much of its force, much of its reason for being.

As a whole, however, despite this decreasing force, The Biglow Papers remain an important American literary monument. First, they are important historically as vivid expressions of public opinion in a particular section of the country during an especially critical stage in the health of the nation. Secondly, they are important in our literary history as one of the earliest examples of dialect writing and as the very earliest example of the Yankee dialect. Most of all, they are intrinsically important as outspoken examples of independent thought, of that Yankee independence, outspokenness, and ironic humor that are a part of national tradition, a part that is being leveled by the same forces which are reducing to general national usage the regional dialects that once expressed them.

Critique

Black Valley—in the original, Valle negro—is subtitled "A Romance of the Argentine." The romantic elements of the novel are readily apparent. A story of a primitive way of life and elemental emotions, the action has been staged against a background of wild natural beauty. Hugo West's settings are real, as are his people and the way of life he presents. Lacking certain of the didactic elements found in Stone Desert, this work reveals to excellent advantage the novelist of character and the painter of landscapes. The plot, although episodic in form, is well ordered, and the story moves forward with increasing emotional and dramatic interest as the writer unfolds the dual theme presented through the ill-fated love of Flavia and Don Pablo and the relationship of spoiled, weak Gracian and strong, devoted Mirra. The style is vigorous, precise, pure. For this novel West was awarded the gold medal of the Spanish Academy.

Gracian Palma was in his fourteenth year when his father died suddenly and the boy, already motherless, became the ward of Señor Palma's old and trusted friend, Don Jesus de Viscarra. Gracian had seen Don Jesus only once in his life; he remembered him as a tall, distinguished-looking man whom his father described as the owner of Black Valley—"where the wind roars," his father had added. To Gracian these words seemed to cast an air of mystery about Don Jesus and his home.

Shortly after Señor Palma's death Don Jesús visited Gracian at the convent school in Cordoba and promised to take him to Black Valley for the summer.

Don Jesus was as good as his word. On the last day of the term he appeared at the school and that afternoon they took a train for Cosquin. From there they traveled by horseback through a wild, hilly countryside that reminded Gracian of fairies and witches. Darkness had fallen long before they arrived at the ranch house, where Gracian met the other members of Don Jesus' family—his young daughter Mirra and his sister Flavia. While they were at supper a harsh scream sounded from the darkness outside. Flavia said that the cry had been made by old Pichana Lazarus, the creole overseer, spoke up to say that he had seen Pichana about a league away on the road to Cosquin. Gracian felt that there was some mystery here which he did not understand.

The next morning Don Jesus left to visit his brother, a rancher in the sierras, and Gracian was free to play with Mirra. While they were eating some roasted corn near a willow grove, the boy saw an old colored woman in ragged clothes crouched in the fork of one of the trees. Mirra said that the crone was Pichana, a beggar whom many people believed a witch but really a harmless old woman. Later the girl pointed out the house of the neighboring landowner. She said that Don Pablo Camargo claimed part of Don Jesus' land and that Flavia was unkind to her because she had once quarreled with Victoria, Don Pablo's daughter. When they returned home, Flavia drew Gracian aside and asked him if he had seen anyone on the Camargo estate.

Because of a boundary dispute the Camargos and the Viscarras had been enemies for several generations. Don Jesus had been prepared to forget the ancient grudge until Don Pablo met Flavia de Viscarra and fell in love with her. Because of the young man's reputation for wildness and violence Don Jesus refused to consent to his sister's engagement to his family's enemy, and he had sent her to live with some distant relatives. There she had stayed, nursing her resentment, until Don Jesus' wife died and Flavia came to live at Black Valley as his housekeeper. What Don Jesus did not know, however, was that Flavia had secretly given birth to Don Pablo's child, the little girl Victoria. For a time after her return to Black Valley Flavia had avoided her former lover, but at last her desire to see her daughter had drawn her to him. When he arrived at their meeting place, Don Pablo would imitate Pichana's wild screech and Flavia would steal out to join him. Although she was deeply disturbed in her own conscience by her deceit, she continued to meet him because she hoped that he would some time bring Victoria with him. Except for Amoroso, the only resident of Black Valley who knew Flavia's secret was Lazarus, the overseer. In love with Flavia, he spied on her movements and followed her when she left the house to meet Don Pablo.

So matters stood when Gracián came to Black Valley. A few days later Don Jesus announced that Don Pablo had begun a suit for possession of the disputed land. That night a heavy thunderstorm was brewing. Gracián, unable to sleep, saw Flavia walking in the courtyard. Toward midnight he was awakened by a clap of thunder. Mirra, frightened, came to his room and said that the sound had been a shot. The children discovered that Flavia was not in her room. The next morning the events of the night seemed like a dream until Gracián and Mirra found one of the watchdogs dead, a bullet through his throat.

One day Mirra took Gracián to the place of the winds, great caves at the bottom of a river gorge where Pichana's hut stood. A storm came up while they were exploring the caverns through which the wind roared, and they found it impossible to climb out of the canyon. Pichana found the children in the cave in which they had taken refuge and led them back to Don Jesus' house. On another day Gracián met Victoria, who became angry when she learned that he came from Black Valley.

Gracián returned to school in Córdoba. By the time he came to Black Valley in the spring, Flavia had conceived a plan. Gracián must fall in love with Victoria, marry her, and so restore the girl to her mother. That summer, with the aid of Lazarus, Flavia met Victoria and revealed herself as the child's mother. A short time later Lazarus began to approach Flavia with bold flattery and she was forced to reprove him. Consequently, when Don Jesus received a letter accusing her of secret meetings with Don Pablo, she was sure that Lazarus was the writer. To her dismay, she saw that the handwriting was Don Pablo's.

That winter Mirra learned Flavia's secret from Pichana. Also, Gracián's uncle, who had been living abroad, returned and wrote to Don Jesus saying that he wanted his nephew to spend the next vacation with him. Mirra grieved because Gracián would not be coming to Black Valley for the summer. The next three years brought more changes. Flavia no longer went to meet Don Pablo, and at times Don Pablo acted like a madman as his love and hatred grew more intense. Lazarus, still in love with Flavia, overstepped at last the bounds of a servant and Don Jesus discharged him. The creole swore to be revenged. While he waited to ambush Don Jesus on the road from Cosquin, Don Pablo suddenly appeared and shot the master of Black Valley, the lawsuit had been decided at last in Don Jesus' favor and Don Pablo was wild with fury. Don Jesus died after asking that the law not be put on the trail of his murderer.

Although the police suspected both Don Pablo and Lazarus, nothing could be proved against either man. Don Pablo moved with Victoria to Cosquin. One day he was seen whitewashing a wall—a peon's work—and people began to say that his mind was affected. Then, wishing to be near her daughter, Flavia also went to Cosquin and secured an appointment as a teacher in the government school. Left alone, Mirra decided to open a school of her own for the children of the district.

Some years passed before Gracián returned from his travels abroad. Bored with life in Córdoba, he went to see

Flavia in Cosquin, where she was taking care of Don Pablo, now a broken sad man. There Gracian met Victoria again and the two fell in love. Gracian, who had never forgotten Mirra, would have broken off the affair with Victoria if Flavia had not talked to him and shamed him. One day he saw Mirra at mass, and all his old affection for her was reborn. Months later, after Flavia had heard that Gracian was staying at Black Valley and that he and Mirra were soon to be married, she went to her niece and begged for her own daughter's happiness and good name. Mirra did not hesitate between duty and love. She sent Gracian back to Victoria, the mother of his unborn child.

THE BONDMAN

Author Philip Massinger (1583-1640)

Type of plot Tragic comedy

Time of plot Fourth century B.C.

Locale Syracuse

First presented c. 1623

PISANDER, a gentleman of Thebes

CLEORA, daughter of the Praetor of Syracuse

LEOSTHENES, Cleora's suitor

ARCHIDAMUS, Praetor of Syracuse

TIMOLEON, General of Corinth

CORISCA, a wanton woman

ASOTUS, her stepson

Critique

The Bondman is a fine expression of Massinger's philosophy of human liberty. Through the action and the declarations of his characters, he reveals that man may be as fully enslaved by his jealousy, lust, and greed as by physical bondage. A second merit of the play is its swift, gripping action. To attain these two excellences, however, Massinger makes sacrifices in his portrayal of character. Often poorly motivated, his characters' behavior at times approaches the absurd.

The people of Syracuse suffered from too much success. Years of wealth and easy living had made them soft, self-indulgent, and indifferent to the act of government. Now, under the threat of war with Carthage, they called upon Timoleon, the great Corinthian general.

When Timoleon arrived in Syracuse, he admonished the citizenry, especially the rich and the powerful, for slothful habits and lack of public spirit. Strict obedience to his commands, he made a condition for his help. The people enthusiastically approved of his leadership—until he gave his first command. When he ordered that private money be confiscated, there was great lamentation. But the complaints were silenced by Cleora, daughter of the Praetor of Syracuse, who made an impassioned appeal to their sense of honor and patriotism. Timoleon next turned his attention to the formation of an army. To his disgust, they suggested that slaves and laborers be used to fill the ranks. A second appeal by Cleora, however, inspired the men to volunteer their services. An army was formed to take immediate action against the Carthaginians.

Among the most eager to go to war was Leosthenes, who saw in martial glory a chance to win the hand of Cleora. She had encouraged his suit, but her father, Archidamus, had prevented their marriage At their parting Leosthenes expressed his love for her and also revealed his fear that during his absence she would not remain chaste With her father, her brother and her lover gone he doubted her ability to resist the enticements of a seducer Deeply wounded by his distrust, she had him bind her eyes with a scarf, and she pledged not to remove it nor to utter a word until he returned

After the army had gone, the city was populated by women, slaves, and men too old or too weak to fight Among the men who remained were miserly Cleon and his cowardly son Asotus The indignities that Asotus suffered because of his craven nature, he compensated for by his cruel treatment of slaves The slaves fared little better with his step mother, Corisca The war was hard on Corisca Married to an impotent old man, she was accustomed to entertaining young men But the war left her only with slaves, who did not appeal to her, and with Asotus, who was a bungler She decided one day to help Asotus overcome his awkwardness by enacting with him a love scene In this practice session, Corisca played the part of Cleora, whom Asotus for a long time had been wooing unsuccessfully So proficient was Corisca in her part that Asotus was inspired to perform his role effectively Soon he began to think of Corisca as herself rather than as an actress But they were prevented from playing the final act by the arrival of Cleon

Unknown to their masters the slaves were preparing to shake off their bonds The revolt was led by Pisander, a Theban gentleman disguised as a slave Having fallen in love with Cleora and having had his suit denied by her father, he, in order to be close to her, had himself sold as a slave to Archdamus His chief reason for stirring up the rebellion was to advance his suit of Cleora, although he also felt sympathy for the bondmen The ill treated slaves, easily moved to insurrection, encountered no difficulty in taking the city

With Pisander in Syracuse was his sister Statilha, also disguised as a slave At Pisander's request, Statilha rendered an exaggerated account to Cleora of the insolence, bloodshed, and rapes that had accompanied the bondmen's victory She also stated that Pisander had devised the plan so that he might rape her Cleora was terrified by this announcement, but her fears were promptly allayed by Pisander himself Treating her with great respect, he vowed his love but denied any intention of taking her by violence Although Cleora, because of her vow, did not speak to him, she appeared to be moved by his generosity

Adversity affected the citizens in various ways Cleon, Corisca, and Asotus were brought closer together by their misery While Cleon still displayed his selfishness and Asotus his cowardice, Corisca was radically changed Accepting her position as a just punishment for her lust and pride, she rejected her former life as a courtesan and turned to the solace of a stoic philosophy

In the meantime the army under Timoleon had been victorious over Carthage, and in the action Leosthenes' heroism had been outstanding He, however, was unable to take joy in his feats because of the remorse he felt for having wronged Cleora's innocence

On returning home, the soldiers expected a glorious welcome Instead, they were shocked to find the gates of the city closed and the walls armed by their slaves Pisander, who had inspired the bondmen to take a stand against their masters, demanded that they be given their liberty as a condition for surrendering the city Timoleon, regarding the terms unreasonable, gave orders to attack The slaves at first made a valiant stand against the army, but when, at the suggestion of the general, their masters exchanged their swords for whips, they immediately surrendered

Leosthenes was fully convinced that Cleora, if she had not submitted willingly, had at least been raped Only after the repeated protestations of Cleora and Statilia did he abandon his belief. When he asked Cleora who her preserver had been, she, having had her gratitude increased by Statilia's accounts of Pisander, gave a glowing report of her benefactor. The passion of her speech again filled Leosthenes with jealousy and doubt.

Pisander, after the defeat of the bondmen, hid himself in Cleora's chamber. Discovered, he was seized and taken to prison. Cleora, whose interest in Pisander continued to increase, asked her father to intercede for him. Told that he was being tortured, she rushed to the prison.

When Leosthenes and Timagoras, Cleora's brother, heard of her action, they too hurried to the prison. There they found her comforting Pisander and even offering some encouragement to his suit. Timagoras, infuriated that his sister could associate with a bondman, was preparing to kill her when Archidamus and the officers arrived and restrained him. In answer to Leosthenes' claim on Cleora, Archidamus said the matter must be decided in court.

At court, Leosthenes and Pisander were permitted to speak in their own behalf. Leosthenes, stressing the degradation of having to argue with a slave, accused Cleora of being ungrateful and of having loose desires. Pisander, in contrast, spoke of the pureness of his love for Cleora. Timagoras, indignant at the impertinence of a slave, suggested that he be whipped. Pulling off his disguise, Pisander revealed his reasons for coming to Syracuse. Leosthenes had once been plighted to Statilia. After he had deserted her, Pisander had come to Syracuse to kill the false suitor, but love for Cleora had stayed his intent. Now, having undergone danger and suffering, he felt that he had a just claim to her. With her father's blessing, Cleora readily consented to marry him. Leosthenes returned to Statilia. The slaves, ably defended by Pisander, were given full pardon.

BOOK OF SONGS

First published 1827

Although it is generally conceded that Heine's finest poetry was not written until his last years, the Book of Songs (Buch der Lieder), which assembled his entire lyrical output to the age of twenty-six, remains the core of his poetic work. The book gained an immediate popularity and appeared in a new edition every other year for decades. German critical opinion of the period cited Heine for writing in the spirit and with the simple accents of German folk song, but he was soon to become a controversial figure. His merits are still fiercely disputed in German territories, much of the controversy centering about his later prose writings, in which the unquenchably poetic nature of his approach to religion and political philosophy yielded, along with chilling prophetic insights, considerable rhetorical muddle.

His own feelings toward Germany were intensely ambiguous. He was later to become, through his Paris exile, "a link that spanned the Rhine", but the French influences which surrounded him in his first sixteen years (during which time the Rhineland was mostly under French military occupation or French civil rule) apparently had little effect. He said in his Memorien that early school experiences imbued him with a permanent prejudice against French literature, and he went through a phase of nationalistic fervor which ended only when he discovered that he breathed more freely under the French than the Prussian regime, ultimately he denounced Gallo-phobia and German national egotism "The Grenadiers," one of his earliest poems, expresses his boyish admiration for Napoleon—typically an admiration not for the deeds but only for the genius of the man. When Heine lived among the French, however, his admiration was chiefly directed toward their freedom from the idealism, prudery, and sentimentality which he deplored in the German "Philistine," at whose expense his satirical wit waxed especially brilliant. In the North Sea cycle which closes his Book of Songs, Heine describes his deep love of Germany, a love which flourished in spite of the fact that Germany's "pleasant soil" was "encumbered with madness, hussars, and wretched verses." There are passages, especially in the early poems, in which he expresses identification with the German character, either lamenting the passing of the nobility and virtue of the old Germany or praising the Oak which stands for the essential hardihood and "holiness" of the Fatherland, but there is something in his love for Germany that is similar to his commitment to the lost beloved, the false fair, the maiden with flowering beauty and decaying heart, that constitutes his poetic stock in trade and is, in fact, almost his whole Nibelungenhort. Nevertheless, he considered himself from first to last a German, and his poetry is deeply rooted in the German Romantic Movement. He liked to refer to himself as the last of the Romantics, marking the close of the old lyric school of the Germans, but he attacked the political, realist, engagé "Young Germany" group with much the same exuberance as he did the old "poesy" and regressive spiritualism.

Heine, experimenting in most of the modes of Romanticism but ultimately taking from the movement only what suited him, provided finally one of the paths by which the Romantic spirit was deflected toward Symbolism. Individual lyrics of the Book of Songs sometimes suffer from a facile outpouring of stock diction and sentiment, but here is poetry which avoids from the beginning either the heights or the depths of the abysmal absolute. Its dealings with the absolute are rather directed at maintaining a penurious equilibrium, buoyed by Heine's fresh, vigorous idiom, his delicate music with its constant play of assonance, and his frequent ironic twists. Reacting from the artifice of eighteenth century diction, Heine sympathized with the Romantic interests in a return to the German folk tradition and in a poetic approximation to the supposedly purer aesthetic impact of music. Nevertheless, in spite of the fact that some of his ballads ("The Lorelev," for example) were actually admitted into the canon of German folk song, Heine himself insisted of his poetry that it was only the form that was somewhat akin to the folk song; the subject matter was that of conventional society. Perhaps more important to Heine's poetry than the Romantic exaltation of the Volk was the concern, distinctive to the German Romantic school, with developing a rationale of the comic. This concern provided a sympathetic climate for Heine's particular form of mockery, itself partially a product of the satirical wit native to his Jewish cultural inheritance.

The Romantic Movement itself was later to provide one of the most obvious targets for Heine's irony, and the lyrical preface to the third edition of the Book of Songs is not without its implicit comment on that subject. It was Heine who once defined the German Romantic school as a return to the medieval poetry that sprang from Catholicism in which men derived voluptuous pleasure from pain. The prefacing verses satirically summarize that pleasure as it finds expression in his own lyrics. It is the "old enchanted wood" through which the poet wanders, listening to the nightingale singing "of love and the keen ache of love." He comes to a gloomy castle before which lies a marble sphinx, half lion, half woman, which the song of the nightingale prompts him to kiss. The kiss awakens the statue, who proceeds to embrace him rapturously in return, meanwhile sinking her claws into him, kissing and rending at the same time. As the poet submits to this "exquisite torture," the nightingale sings, "O wondrous sphinx, O love, / Why this always distressing / Mingling of death like agony / With every harm and blessing?" The whole effect involves the same burlesque by exaggeration that is operative at the end of the "Lyrical Intermezzo," in which he describes the enormity of the coffin that would be necessary to lower all his sorrows into the Rhine—a facetious note not entirely confined to his earliest poems. On the whole, the Book of Songs contains Heine's exploration of the Romantic Movement rather than his rejection of it, if only because it contains expressions of the sentimental attachments of various adolescent periods. The first section, titled "Junge Lieder (Sorrows of Youth)," represents roughly Heine's Sturm und Drang period. It contains such characteristic pieces as "The Minne singers" in which, with "word for sword," the singers engage in a tournament whose victor is the one who enters the fray with the deadliest wound. The section is subdivided into Dream Pictures, Songs, Romances, and Sonnets, the romantic decor of the poet's sensibility is rendered in its most studied garishness and most rollicking meter. We find the enchanted garden and the graveyard vision, the wedding festivities and the attendant corpse conjuring, the shining dream that turns to nightmare or to daylight delusion, and we find Poor Peter, alias the clumsy knight, alias "King Heinrich"—a primordial Prufrock. Not all of the skeleton rattling in this group is as delightful as that of "I came from my love's house." Here a minstrel sits on his crumbling tombstone and plays a delirious dance to arouse the graveyard's other inhabitants, and each tells how he came to be there—"How he fared, and was snared in love's mad and furious chase."

By the time of the "Lyrical Intermezzo" and the "Homecoming" sequence, which follow "Junge Lieder," Heine had largely abandoned his supernatural baggage in favor of a more natural imagery and a more personal, direct form of address

God knows where I'll find that silly
Madcap of a girl again,
I have searched this endless city
Wet and cursing in the rain

The imagery of sea, storm, seasonal change, and the like is never employed for its own richness, but for its directly evocative effect, as in the famous "Der Tod, Das Ist Die Kuhle Nacht." Heine also proves himself capable of a restraint and lightness of touch in the most ageless tradition

The golden flame of summer
Burns in your glowing cheek,
But in your heart lies winter,
Barren and cold and bleak

Soon it will change my darling, Far sooner than you seek,
Your heart will harbor summer,
While winter lines your cheek

In the "Lyrical Intermezzo," a subtle spring to autumn progression is threaded through the whole sequence

Max Brod has noted the remarkable cohesion which was revealed by assembling the whole of Heine's early poetry into a single book. The experiences of the hero of the poem sequences form a consistent whole in which the action develops with almost the progression of a verse novel. A biographical basis for these experiences is easy to establish, but it is only detracting to do so, and Heine was himself extremely opposed to any biographical reading.

A unity less restricted to the theme of the rejected lover is attempted in the two North Sea cycles. Short parallel sequences which exhibit a kind of symphonic development, they are often discounted as set pieces because they were written partly in order to escape the confines of a reputation for "lyrical, mordant, two-stanza" verse. They are not without rewarding moments, however, and their parallelism is curious and revealing. In the beginning the poet invokes the sea, the great symbol of inhuman immensity and constant change. In the poems that follow, the poet is actually at sea, witnessing and participating in various phenomena—storm, calm, seasickness, sunset, the progression of twilight and night. There are also apostrophes to the ancient gods. Finally the poet comes to port, in the first sequence to the Peace of Christ, and in the final sequence, in a poem which parodies Christian metaphor throughout, to the haven of the wine cellar of Bremen. In a final burst of exuberance he writes

Well I have always declared
That not among quite common people,
Nay but the best society going Lived for ever the King of Heaven!

Critique

This unfinished novel presents an example of Flaubert's passionate feelings against the middle class. It shows his persistent pessimism regarding their aspirations and abilities, and also his hatred of every aspect of their lives. Indeed, the novel becomes almost a caricature of the way in which a great mass of people lived in his time. Although it was unfinished at his death, Flaubert's notes showed that he planned to make the two men move in a full circle, eventually returning to the same point at which the novel began. In doing this he meant to show them incapable of ever overcoming their plight

Bouvard and Pécuchet met quite by accident one summer evening while each was out for a walk. They sat down to rest at the same moment on the same bench and soon noticed that they had both written their names on the inside of their hats. On this common ground they began talking and soon found out that they were alike in practically every thing except appearance. They held the same political views and the same kind of job as clerks, and both were bachelors living alone. Pécuchet, however, was fairly tall and thin while Bouvard was shorter and much heavier. After a lengthy conversation they decided it was time for them to return to their homes, and they then spent much more time walking each other to their respective doors. A friendship had already developed, from that time on they spent every available moment together.

Soon afterward Bouvard learned that he had inherited a considerable sum of money from a man who he thought was his uncle but who was really his natural father. Because the friends shared every thing by this time, Bouvard considered and consulted Pécuchet before making any plans for investing his fortune. It was decided between them that they should buy a house and farm far from the city and their desks and, after much deliberation about location, they finally obtained one. They thought that now they could forget their rather plebian tasks as clerks and give themselves up to more rewarding labors. They had long ago convinced themselves that they possessed great minds and that only circumstances prevented them from becoming great men.

One of the first things they undertook after settling on their farm was the care of the kitchen garden. They made elaborate plans, did a great deal of work, and subsequently had some success. Confident of their abilities they decided to undertake the care of the entire farm, work which had previously been done by a tenant. For this project they consulted the successful farmers of the neighborhood, read all the authorities to discover the best methods, and even subscribed to an agricultural journal. But there were far too many theories advanced and they were compelled to guess which were the best. At this they were unsuccessful. Soon all of the livestock had broken through the fences and run off, or had died from excessive bloodletting. The wheat caught fire and was completely destroyed because of their own ignorance and carelessness. Bouvard and Pécuchet realized that such farming would completely ruin them within two years.

These failures they decided were simply a result of their trying to do too much at once. It was then resolved to give up the major part of the farm and concentrate their efforts on making a beautiful formal garden. They planted the rarest flowers, trees, and shrubs, and they pruned and cut the trees and bushes into unusual shapes. They included sculpture in their design and they even made a pool for which they carried water by hand every day. When the garden was completed they invited all the important people of the neighborhood to dinner and planned to surprise them afterwards with a view of the garden. But the dinner was a failure, and when the blinds were pulled to show the garden they discovered that the evening light was a great disadvantage. The guests found fault everywhere and eventually laughed at the whole thing.

These failures, however, were easily attributed to the ignorance of the guests, and, thinking they had achieved some degree of success, Bouvard and Pécuchet went on to something else. The fruit trees in the garden had done fairly well, so they determined to use their produce from the farm and attempt to find better ways of preserving their food. In this experiment they almost succeeded in blowing themselves up, but in nothing else. This time the failures were attributed to a lack of knowledge about chemistry, they then began to study that science.

Chemistry quickly led them to an interest in medicine, which they took up in even greater detail. Here again they were merely confused by the great number of contradictory theories. They practiced this art on some of the local people, much to the anger of M. Vaucoille, the local doctor, but the experiment ended when they began imagining that they were themselves suffering from many different ailments. The study had, however, awakened an interest in the secret of life and the universe, and they soon took up geology in an attempt to find out the truth about the world. But this pursuit led only to controversy with the curé because their findings apparently contradicted the teachings of the Church.

Within six months geology had led them into a study of archaeology, and soon they had turned their home into a museum, filling it with all the great treasures which they had discovered in the neighborhood. Again their neighbors came to see what was being done but none appreciated their efforts to the extent that Bouvard and Pécuchet thought they should have, however, they were not to be daunted. Their interest in ancient objects led to an interest in the people, but they soon realized they could not understand people without knowing something of psychology. In an attempt to learn this science they began reading historical romances. From this point they proceeded through various types of literature, including the drama, and soon they began acting out certain plays for their own amusement. Again the villagers became interested in the doings of Bouvard and Pécuchet, and it was in this connection that Bouvard developed a romantic interest in Madame Borodin.

He began to see her frequently and was quickly overcome with a strong desire to marry her. She consented to marry him, but at the same time extracted the promise of a favor. When Bouvard learned that the favor was for him to fulfill her desire to own a certain piece of property in his possession, his hopes ended. He could not give her the property and she would not marry him otherwise. In the meantime Pécuchet had been carrying on his own affair with their servant girl. He was quite successful in his attempts but because of them he contracted a venereal disease which caused him an extreme amount of embarrassment. The two friends became more and more dejected.

For diversion they became interested in athletics, then spiritualism. Soon they were again practicing medicine and studying psychology. Logic and metaphysics also occupied them for a time, then they turned to religion. But in each case they became disgusted or frustrated in their attempts and soon gave them up. About this time they decided to adopt a boy and girl who were to be sent away to a reformatory and an orphanage, respectively. They wanted to devote all their time and energy to the education and training of these two children, but again they simply became confused by the divergent ideas on education and even by the subject matter they were supposed to be teaching. The worst part came when they discovered that the children would not respond to education and, in fact, were incorrigible delinquents. They had to be sent away.

[At this point Flaubert's manuscript broke off but a plan found among his papers after his death indicated the following conclusion to the story. Bouvard and Pécuchet were to proceed in the same manner for some time, lecturing to the people on such topics as morals, ethics, and government. In time they were to get to a consideration of the condition of mankind and the world and from there they were to proceed to speculation about the future. Finally they were to realize how foolish they had been ever since they had come to the country. The remedy, the thing that would really make them happy, would be to go back to their desks and continue the routine work of copying. Thus they ordered a desk and writing materials and prepared to go to work.]

Critique

Miles Gloriosus, or The Braggart Soldier, provided the prototype of the vain glorious, cowardly soldier for many characters in later drama, not the least of whom is Shakespeare's Falstaff. Pyrgopolinices' character, however, is not worked out with nearly the depth that Falstaff's is. Plautus tends to give a jerky movement to the play by his failure to integrate character development with plot development: the action is frequently brought to a full stop while discussions take place that have little function other than to give the audience a notion of what the characters are like. Nevertheless, the action is ingeniously contrived. Even though the trickery seems in excess of that required by the situation, the tone of the play is sufficiently light to prevent the audience from feeling any strong desire for verisimilitude.

Pleusicles, a young Athenian, was in love with and loved by Philocomasium, a young woman of Athens. But while he was away on public business in another city, a captain of Ephesus, Pyrgopolinices, came to Athens and, in order to get Philocomasium into his power, worked his way into the confidence of her mother. As soon as the opportunity presented itself, he abducted the daughter and carried her off to his home in Ephesus.

News of ravished Philocomasium soon reached Pleusicles' household, and Palaestrio, a faithful servant, immediately embarked for the city in which his master was staying, intending to tell him what had happened. Unfortunately, however, Palaestrio's ship was taken by pirates, he was made captive and was presented by chance to Pyrgopolinices as a gift. In the captain's house, Palaestrio

Perceiving that the girl bore a violent hatred for Pyrgopolinices, Palaestrio privately wrote to Pleusicles suggesting that he come to Ephesus. When the young man arrived, he was hospitably entertained by Periplectomenus, an old gentleman who was a friend of Pleusicles' father and who happened to live in a house adjoining that of Pyrgopolinices. Since Philocomasium had a private room in the captain's house, a hole was made through the partition wall enabling the two lovers to meet in the approving Periplectomenus' house.

One day Sceledrus, a dull-witted servant appointed to be the keeper of Philocomasium, was chasing a monkey along the roof of the captain's house when he happened to look through the slatting of the house next door and saw Pleusicles and Philocomasium at dalliance together. He was observed, however, and before he could report his discovery to the captain Periplectomenus told Palaestrio how matters stood. Palaestrio then evolved an elaborate hoax to convince Sceledrus that he had not seen what he thought he had. Philocomasium was to return immediately through the hole in the wall and pretend never to have left the captain's house. In addition, she was to make a reference at the proper time to a dream she had had regarding the sudden advent in Ephesus of a pretended twin sister. This ruse was carried out before the ever more confused Sceledrus. Philocomasium first playing herself and then changing clothes, going through the hole to the other house, and playing her nonexistent twin sister. The dull Sceledrus was slow in taking the bait, but at last he swallowed it and became as unshakably convinced that he had not seen Philocomasium as he had previously been to the contrary

The danger of discovery temporarily averted, Palaestrio, Periplectomenus, and Pleusicles conferred together on how they might trick Pyrgopolinices into giving up Philocomasium and Palaestrio. The servant again formulated an elaborate ruse. Since the captain was ridiculously vain regarding his attractiveness to women as well as his pretended prowess in battle, it was decided that the plotters would use an Ephesian courtesan to undo him. Periplectomenus, a bachelor, was to hire her to pretend to be his wife but so infatuated with Pyrgopolinices that she was willing to divorce her aging husband for the captain's favor.

This plan was executed. Acroteleutium, chosen as the courtesan and using her maid and Palaestrio as go-betweens, sent the ring of her "husband" to the captain with word of her infatuation. Pyrgopolinices was immediately aroused, but as he was discussing the situation with Palaestrio it occurred to him that he would be compelled to get rid of Philocomasium before he could take advantage of Acroteleutium's offer. When Palaestrio informed him that Philocomasium's mother and twin sister had just arrived in Ephesus looking for her and that the captain could easily put her out and let her return to Athens with them, Pyrgopolinices eagerly accepted this suggestion. Overwhelmed by Palaestrio's flattery, he even agreed to let Philocomasium keep the gold and jewels he had given her.

When Pyrgopolinices went in to tell her to leave, however, she feigned immense grief. Finally she agreed to leave quietly but only after he promised that she might take Palaestrio with her as well as the gold and jewelry. The captain, amazed at this sudden display of affection, attributed it to his irresistible masculine charm. When he returned to Palaestrio he was given to understand that Acroteleutium wanted him to come to her in Periplectomenus' house. Although he was at first reluctant to do so for fear of the old man's wrath, he was told that Acroteleutium had put her "husband" out and that the coast was clear.

At that moment Pleusicles, disguised as the master of a ship, appeared and said he had been sent to take Philocomasium and her effects to the ship where her mother and sister were waiting. Pyrgopolinices, overjoyed that the matter was being handled with such dispatch, sent the girl and Palaestrio off as soon as he could manage it.

After their departure he hurried into Periplectomenus' house in expectation that Acroteleutium would be waiting for him. Much to his dismay, however, Periplectomenus and his servants were waiting instead, armed with rods and whips and intent on giving Pyrgopolinices the beating that a real husband would have inflicted under such circumstances. This punishment they accomplished with great alacrity, extorting from the captain, under threat of even more dire punishment, the promise that he would never retaliate against any of the persons involved.

When they were finished, Sceledrus came up and crowned the captain's beating with the news that the ship's master was Philocomasium's lover and that he had seen them kissing and embracing each other as soon as they were safely outside of the city gate. Pyrgopolinices was overwhelmed with rage at the way he had been tricked, but as Sceledrus and he entered the house the servant observed that the captain had received only what he deserved.

Immensely popular when first published, Brand took the whole Scandinavian world by storm, and with it Ibsen's European fame began. Four editions appeared in the year of its publication, the eleventh, in 1889. Four translations were made in Germany between 1872 and 1882. Though not intended for the stage, Act IV has been played repeatedly, only in Sweden has the whole drama been performed. The play was written in Italy, where the author had exiled himself in protest against the national shame when Norway remained neutral and failed to support Denmark in its war against invading Prussia. From Italy, Ibsen was able to catch in clearer perspective the strength as well as weakness of his native land. The writing of Brand seemed to act as a personal catharsis, and he was able there after to return to his northern home and produce in regular succession, almost every two years for the rest of his life, his original and stirring dramas. Though Brand is addressed to the people of Norway, it is universal in its appeal, depicting the never ending struggle of the soul, relentless and tragic, in its search for uncompromising truth.

Brand, a young priest, met three types of people as he made his way down the mountainside to the tumble down church in his home valley. The first was a peasant whose daughter was dying, but for whom he would not give his own life. The second was Einar, a young painter returned from travel overseas, and Agnes his betrothed, who were guilty on their way to the town of Agnes' parents. The third was a half gipsy girl named Gerd who taunted him to climb up to her church of ice and snow. In the peasant, Einar and Agnes, and Gerd—the faint hearted, the light-hearted, and the uncontrolled—Brand saw exemplified the triple sickness of the world, and he vowed to heaven to bring about its cure.

In the village Brand gained the admiration of the crowd when he risked his life to aid a man. Later he saw Agnes sitting by the shore, disturbed and uplifted by new powers awakening in her, a vision of God urging her to choose between two paths. Then he saw his aged mother, who offered him all her savings on condition that he would preserve them for family use. Brand refused and urged her to give up all her earthly possessions. The mother left unrepentant, unwilling that her lifetime savings should be scattered By these encounters Brand was convinced that his mission lay close at hand in daily duties, even if he were unapplauded by the world As he started to return to the village, Einar suddenly appeared and demanded that Agnes return to him But Agnes, having seen the vision refused to go with Einar, even though Brand warned her it would be gray and sunless in his fissure between the mountains, he demanded all or nothing

Three years passed Although success had marked Brand's work, he realized that, married to Agnes and blessed with her love and that of their son Alf, he had yet made no real sacrifices The tests soon came First his mother died, unrepentant Then the child became ill, and the doctor advised them to leave their icy home or the child would die When Brand agreed, the doctor pointed out that in leaving, Brand would belie his own stern attitude towards others, his words would become mere preachments Agnes made ready to go, but Brand was haunted by the larger issues Should they go or stay? As mother of the child, Agnes—Brand thought—should make the decision When Agnes said that she would abide by her husband's choice, Brand chose the only way he could, though he knew his decision meant death for the child they loved

A year later, the mayor, with elections near, arrived to seek Brand's aid in building a house for the poor When Brand said he himself was going to build a new church which would cost the people nothing, the mayor left

Agnes felt that she must challenge her husband with what he demanded of others, all or nothing If she were to return to her old life, Agnes asked, would he choose her or his holy work? There could be only one answer Agnes rejoiced, knowing indeed that for the husband she loved it was all or nothing Soon afterward she died, leaving Brand alone

was complete and a great throng gathered for the consecration The mayor and the dean congratulated Brand on his great accomplishment Einar appeared emaciated, fanatic He had become a missionary He brushed aside as unimportant the news of the death of Agnes and her child, his only interest was the faith in which she died

Einar left, but the encounter had made things clear to Brand He exhorted the people to lead a new life It had been wrong, he said, to lure the spirit of God to their heart by simply building a larger church There should be no compromise It must be all or nothing He waved them away from the church and locked the door

When he called the people to the greater Church of Life where every day was dedicated to God, they lifted Brand on their shoulders Up toward the mountains he urged them As the rain began to fall, the sexton warned them they were on the way to the Ice church The older ones complained of feeling faint and thirsty Many cried out for a miracle They felt the gift of prophecy was on Brand and called on him to speak Uplifted, he told them they were waging a war that would last all their lives, they would lose the wealth of mammon but gain faith and a crown of thorns At this the crowd cried out that they had been misled, betrayed, and they were ready to stone and knife the priest

Brand toiled upward, followed far behind by a single figure, Gerd Now he heard an invisible choir which mocked him, saying his work on earth was doomed The apparition of Agnes appeared, saying he could be reunited with his wife and son if he would blot out from his soul three words which had characterized his old life nought or all When Brand spurned the tempter, the phantom vanished Gerd, with her rifle, caught up with him She saw that Brand's hands were pierced and torn, his brow marked with thorns To Gerd he was the Lord, the Redeemer Brand bade her go, but Gerd told him to look up Above him towered the Ice church Brand wept, feeling utterly forsaken With his tears came sudden release His fetters fell away, and he faced the future with renewed youth and radiant faith

In the forms of snow from the mountain heights Gerd saw a mocking sprite, and she raised her rifle and shot With a terrible, thunderous roar an avalanche swept down As it was about to crush him Brand called out to God Above the crashing thunder a voice answered with assurance of a God of love

The Bride of Lammermoor has many elements of good melodrama: murder, insanity, ghosts, a beautiful and good young heroine, a noble hero, and a diabolical villainess, Lady Ashton, a character as thoroughly unpleasant as Scott ever created. In spite of the lurid aspects, however, the author's fine portrayal of both nobility and village folk and his subtle use of historical events to lend authenticity to his action make this novel an enthralling one. It furnishes the plot for Donizetti's opera Lucia di Lammermoor.

Sir William Ashton, the new master of the Ravenswood estate, was delighted to hear of the disturbances at the late Lord Ravenswood's funeral. He hoped that the brave stand of Edgar, the young Master of Ravenswood, which made it possible for the Episcopal service, prohibited in Scotland, to take place, would put him in disfavor with the Privy Council and prevent his attempt to reclaim his family's property. However, when the Lord Keeper and his daughter Lucy visited old Alice, a tenant on the estate, they were warned about the fierce Ravenswood blood and the family motto, "I bide my time."

The Ashtons' first encounter with Edgar seemed fortunate; he shot a bull as it charged Sir William and Lucy, saving them from serious injury. The sheltered romantic girl was fascinated by her proud rescuer, who left abruptly after he identified himself. Her more practical father gratefully softened his report of the disturbances at Lord Ravenswood's funeral and asked several friends to help Edgar.

On the evening of the rescue Edgar joined Bucklaw, the heir to a large fortune, and the adventurer-soldier Captain Craigenfels at a tavern where he told them that he would not go with them to France. As he started home, Bucklaw, who thought himself insulted, challenged him to a duel Edgar won, then gave his opponent his life and invited him to Wolf's Crag, the lonely, sea beaten tower that was the only property left to the last of the once powerful Ravenswoods

Old Caleb Balderstone did his best to welcome his master and his companion to Wolf's Crag in the style befitting the Ravenswood family, making ingenious excuses for the absence of whatever he was not able to procure from one of his many sources The old man provided almost the only amusement for the two men, and Edgar thought often of the girl whom he had rescued Deciding not to leave Scotland immediately, he wrote to his kinsman, the Marquis of A——, for advice The marquis told him to remain at Wolf's Crag, hunted at political intrigue, but offered no material assistance to supplement Caleb's meager findings

One morning Bucklaw persuaded Edgar to join a hunting party which was passing by the castle An ardent sportsman, Bucklaw brought down the deer, while his friend watched from a hillside Edgar offered Wolf's Crag as shelter against an approaching storm for an elderly gentleman and a young girl who had come to talk to him

Poor Caleb's resourcefulness was taxed to its limit with guests to feed, and when Bucklaw thoughtlessly brought the hunting party to the castle he closed the gate, saying that he never admitted anyone while a Ravenswood dined The old gentleman's servant sent them to the village, where Bucklaw met Captain Craigenfelt again

At Wolf's Crag, Edgar soon realized that his guests were Sir William and Lucy, Sir William had planned the hunt with the hope of securing an interview with Edgar Lucy's fright at the storm and Caleb's comical excuses for the lack of food and elegant furnishings made relations between the two men less tense When Edgar accompanied Sir William to his room, after a feast of capon cleverly stolen by Caleb, the older man offered his friendship and promised to try to settle in

Edgar's favor certain unresolved questions about the estate

An astute politician, Sir William had heeded a warning that the Marquis of A—— was likely to rise in power, raising his young kinsman with him, and he feared the loss of his newly acquired estate He felt that Edgar's good will might be valuable, and his ambitious wife's absence allowed him to follow his inclination to be friendly Lady Ashton, a staunch Whig, was in London, where she was trying to give support to the falling fortunes of her party

Although Edgar's pride and bitterness against the enemy of his father kept him from trusting Sir William completely, the Lord Keeper had an unexpected advantage in the growing love between Edgar and Lucy Anxious to assist the romance, he invited Edgar to accompany them to the castle where the young man had grown up

Edgar and Lucy went together to see old Alice, who prophesied that tragedy would be the result of this unnatural alliance of Ravenswood and Ashton Edgar resolved to tell Lucy goodbye, but at the Mermaid Fountain he asked her to marry him They broke a gold coin in token of their engagement, but decided to keep their love secret until Lucy's much feared mother arrived home

Sir William correctly interpreted the confusion of the pair when they returned, but he overlooked it to tell them of the approaching visit of the Marquis of A—— to Ravenswood He urged Edgar to stay to meet his kinsman

Sir William's elaborate preparations for his distinguished guest left Edgar and Lucy alone together much of the time, to the great disgust of Bucklaw, who had inherited the adjoining property He unfairly resented Edgar, thinking that he had ordered Caleb to dismiss him summarily from Wolf's Crag Bucklaw confided to his companion, Captain Craigenfelt, that a cousin of his had become intimate with Lady Ashton and had made a match between himself and Lucy He sent the captain to tell Lady Ashton of Edgar's presence and of the Marquis of A——'s impending visit. Bucklaw hoped that she would return and intervene on his behalf.

Lady Ashton was so much upset by the news that she left for home immediately, arriving simultaneously with the marquis and striking fear into the hearts of her husband and daughter. She immediately sent Edgar a note ordering him to leave, thereby incurring the displeasure of his kinsman. She became still more furious when Lucy told her of her engagement.

As Edgar passed the Mermaid Fountain, traditionally a fateful spot for his family, he saw a white figure which he recognized as old Alice or her ghost. When he went to her cottage and found her dead, he realized that her appearance had been her final warning to him.

The marquis joined his young cousin who had been helping with the funeral preparations, and reported that all his entreaties had failed to make Lady Ashton tolerate the engagement. He asked Edgar to let him spend the night at Wolf's Crag, insisting over the young man's protests about the lack of comfort there. However, when the two approached the old castle they saw the tower windows aglow with flames. Later, after the people of Wolf's Hope had provided a bountiful feast for the marquis and his retinue, Caleb confessed to Edgar that he had set a few fires around the tower to preserve the honor of the family. Henceforth he could explain the absence of any number of luxuries by saying that they had been lost in the great conflagration.

Edgar went to Edinburgh with his kinsman, who very shortly acquired the expected power when the Tories took over Queen Anne's government for a short time. In prospect of better fortunes Edgar wrote to Sir William and Lady Ashton asking permission to marry Lucy. Both answered negatively, the lady with insults, the gentleman in careful phrases hopefully designed to win favor with the marquis. A brief note from Lucy warned her lover not to try to correspond with her, however, she promised fidelity. Edgar, unable to do anything else, went to France for a year on a secret mission for the government.

Bucklaw, whose suit was approved by the Ashtons, requested an interview with Lucy and learned from Lady Ashton, who insisted upon being present, that the girl had agreed to marry him only on the condition that Edgar would release her from her engagement. Lucy had written to ask him to do so in a letter dictated by her mother, but Lady Ashton had intercepted it, hoping that her daughter would give in if she received no answer. Lucy confessed, however, that she had sent a duplicate letter with the help of the minister and that she expected an answer before long.

She was little like the girl with whom Edgar had fallen in love, for she had been held almost a prisoner by her mother for weeks. Unable to stand the constant persecution, she had grown gloomy and ill. Lady Ashton hired as nurse for her an old woman who, at the mother's instigation, filled the girl's wavering mind with mysterious tales and frightening legends about the Ravenswood family. Sir William, suspecting the reason for his daughter's increasing melancholy, dismissed the crone, but the damage had already been done.

Edgar, who had finally received Lucy's request that their engagement be ended, came to Ravenswood Castle to determine whether she had written the letter of her own free will. He arrived just as she was signing her betrothal agreement with Bucklaw. Unable to speak, the girl indicated that she could not stand against her parents' wishes, and she returned Edgar's half of the gold coin.

Lucy remained in a stupor after this encounter. Meanwhile, her mother continued making plans for the wedding. Old women outside the church on the marriage day prophesied that a funeral would soon follow this ceremony. Lucy's younger brother was horrified at the cold clamminess of the girl's hand. Later, she disappeared during the bridal ball, and Lady Ashton sent the bridegroom after her. Horrible cries brought the whole party to the girl's apartment where they found Bucklaw lying stabbed on the floor. After a search Lucy was discovered sitting in the chimney, gibbering insanely. She died the next evening, reaching

Bucklaw recovered, but Edgar, who appeared silently at Lucy's funeral, perished in quicksand near Wolf's Crag as he went to fight a duel with Lucy's brother, who blamed him for her death. Lady Ashton lived on, apparently without remorse for the horrors her pride had caused.

THE BRIDGE

Hart Crane was considered the most promising young poet of the early 1930's. His motivation and central symbol, the sea, he realized brilliantly in his first volume, White Buildings, published in 1926. From this source of inspiration and from his vantage point in Brooklyn, in a house once owned by the engineer who designed the famous bridge, Crane conceived a great plan for a poem expressive of his own urban America. A wealthy patron subsidized the volume which, ironically, was written in Cuba and France and first published in Paris. As a result of the reception given The Bridge, Crane was awarded the Levinson Prize by Poetry and granted a Guggenheim Fellowship, but while returning from Mexico, where he had chosen to write, he jumped overboard and drowned in the Gulf of Mexico. His short, disordered life has become one of the legends of the "lost generation." The Bridge, inspired by the Brooklyn Bridge, has created a view of life which extends its span beyond the present.

Taking his cue from Whitman, the poet he most loved and imitated, Crane wished to establish a mythology for America, a country created too late for such a cultural tradition. In "Proem To Brooklyn Bridge," the poet invokes the genius of this utilitarian work of art to synthesize the chaos of the modern world, for this span joins city, earth, machine, river, sea, and man.

O Sleepless as the river under thee, Vaulting the sea, the prairies dreaming sod,
Unto us lowliest sometime sweep, descend
And of the curveship lend a myth to God

The successive sections of the poem, while unequal in poetic merit and historical significance, extend this symbol from America's discovery to the present. Ave Maria, Part I, is a dedication to Columbus, the source of the original myth and legend, who seeks to unite his divided world, to sustain his vision of cosmography.

Part II, Powhatan's Daughter, containing several hundred years of American history and legend intermingled, opens on "The Harbor Dawn," in which two lovers awaken to bridge noises and city sights. As an above-ground Dante led by a Beatrice-Pocahontas vision, the poet walks abroad with the fabled past and the strenuous present. In "Van Winkle," the poet's school-day recollections of Pizarro, Cortez, Priscilla, and John Smith

"The River," perhaps the best single poem in this spiritual odyssey and anthology, holds the star-spangled jazz beat of Vachel Lindsay coupled with John Dos Passos' itinerary, expanded from coast to coast but centered on the Mississippi River

Having started from Brooklyn, as did Whitman, and passing by subway to the outer rails and the river with the ghosts of America's past the poet gives his reason for his Pocahontas theme in "The Dance" the Indian heroine's marriage with a white man gave us all a different flesh and blood, a distinct lineage This unison makes a life dance celebrated vividly in America's childhood and expanded to an idyl, the myth of our Eden "Indiana," the final poem in this section, envisions another myth, Eldorado, seen through the eyes of a pioneer mother

bereft of a son who goes off to sea Here is suggested the last frontier, possibly symbolizing modern man's rootlessness

In Part III Cutty Sark the image is jumbled the vision fades as the poet traverses Manhattan's dark night with a drunken sailor The loss of Eden the frontier makes drink a necessity and distortion a result

Part IV, Cape Hatteras takes up a different history the orogeny which lifted the Appalachians above the sea as well as the cosmic eruptions which gave us the machine and genius, an airplane and a Whitman

Part V, Three Songs, is an interlude in praise of three women, Eve Magdalene and Mary but with satiric overtones Part VI, Quaker Hill becomes a personal, lyrical celebration of humble pursuits, rural scenes and scrapes intermingling with the cacophony of the disparate, the distraction of modern life, and death

In Part VII, climactically the poet returns to the city by air, to The Tunnel, the subway, which is the chute to hell Here Dante Crane meets Vergil Poe in what must have been intended as a modern Inferno, however fragmented

Racine's third play, Andromache, had established his mastery of the "sentimental" drama. In his fifth, Britannicus, he intended to prove his ability to write a Roman "political" tragedy to rival, and if possible surpass, Corneille. The first performance was only moderately successful. Later its reputation improved after Louis XIV spoke highly of it. The play is constructed in keeping with Aristotle's unities, as was obligatory in seventeenth-century French drama after the success of Corneille's neo-classic plays. The theme is Neron's first crime, which sets the pattern for the rest of his reign. Burrhus attempted to keep uppermost the good elements of Neron's character, while Narcisse, a supreme opportunist, worked on the emperor's baser instincts. His attitude toward Britannicus was the proving ground of that conflict. Agrippine was a woman dominated by lust for power. It was Néron's reaction against her that crystallized his evil destiny. Although other plays by Racine have greater emotional insight and poetic beauty, Britannicus is a fine example of his command of verse and language and of his dramatic perception of the motivation of his characters.

In the anteroom of the imperial palace Agrippine waited to speak with Neron, her son. The impatient nature of his character had at last revealed itself in antagonistic behavior toward Britannicus, and Agrippine feared that she would next incur his disfavor. Albina was convinced of the emperor's continued loyalty to his mother. Agrippine felt that if Neron were indeed noble, the fact that she had won the throne for him would insure his devotion, but if he were ignoble, the fact of his obligation would turn him against her.

On the previous night Neron had abducted Junie, to whom Britannicus was betrothed, a deed possibly motivated by resentment against Agrippine, who had begun to support Britannicus in an attempt to preserve her position in the future if Neron were to turn against her. Albina assured her that her public power and honor, at least, had not decreased. However, Agrippine needed the assurance of a more personal trust. She confided that once Neron had turned her aside from the throne on which she customarily sat in the Senate. Also, she was now denied all private audience with him.

Agrippine, reproaching Burrhus for disloyalty to her, accused him of attempting to gain power over Neron. Burrhus was convinced that his prime loyalty was to the emperor who ruled well by his own authority. Neron feared that Britannicus' children would inherit the throne if he married Junie.

Britannicus, distracted by his loss of Junie, complained of Neron's harshness. Agrippine sent him to the house of Pallas, the freedman, where she would meet him later. Britannicus told Narcisse, who encouraged him to join Agrippine, that he still wished to claim the throne.

Neron decided to disregard his mother's reproaches, which he called unjust, and to banish Pallas, the friend and adviser of Agrippine, who, he thought, had corrupted Britannicus. Narcisse assured him that Rome approved of his abduction of Junie, and Neron confessed that now that he had seen her he had fallen in love with her himself. He was convinced by Narcisse that Britannicus was devoted to Junie and that she probably loved him in return. Narcisse insisted that the love of Junie would be won by a sign of favor from the emperor. He advised Néron to divorce Octavia, Britannicus' sister, and marry Junie. Néron feared Agrippine's wrath if he did so, only when he avoided her completely did he dare defy her wishes, for in her presence he was powerless. Narcisse informed Néron that Britan-

Junie asked Neron what her crime had been and insisted that Britannicus was the most suitable person for her to marry as he was the only other descendant of Augustus Caesar at court. When Neron said that he himself would marry her, Junie, appalled, begged him thus to not disgrace Octavia. Finally she realized that she could save Britannicus' life only by telling him, when they met, that he was to leave Rome. Neron intended to listen to their conversation.

At their interview, Britannicus was bewildered by Junie's coldness toward him and by her praise of the emperor. When he left, Neron reappeared but Junie fled, weeping. Neron sent Narcisse to comfort Britannicus.

Burrhus reported that Agrippine was angry at Neron, and he feared that she might plot against the emperor. When Neron refused to listen to Burrhus as he begged him not to divorce Octavia, the tutor realized that the emperor's true character was at last appearing.

Meanwhile, Agrippine planned to take Britannicus before the Roman army and to declare that she had wronged him by exalting Néron to the throne. By this action she hoped to win their allegiance to Britannicus. Burrhus told her that her scheme was impossible. Agrippine told Albina that if Neron married Junie and banished Britannicus, her own power would be ended. That condition she would never accept. Although Britannicus did not trust her, she planned with his cooperation to prevent Néron's marriage to Junie.

Although Narcisse had persuaded Britannicus that Junie was faithless, she nevertheless managed to see him and insisted that he flee to save his life. Accused of unfaithfulness, she explained that Néron had been listening during their previous meeting. Britannicus fell at her feet in gratitude for her continued love. In this situation Néron came upon them and demanded from Britannicus the obedience that through fear he intended to extort from all Rome. Later Néron ordered Britannicus arrested and Agrippine detained in the palace.

Burrhus advised Agrippine, before her audience with Néron, to be affectionate and even apologetic, and to make no demands on him. Instead she explained to him exactly how she had procured the throne for him and reproached him for his present behavior. Néron, infuriated by her continued claims on him, realized that she had made him emperor only for her own glory. Accused, Agrippine denied that she had attempted to replace Néron with Britannicus, all she wanted was that Junie should be allowed to choose her own husband and that she herself should be able to see Néron when she wished. When Néron appeared to yield, Burrhus congratulated him. But Néron had merely deceived Agrippine; he still intended to punish Britannicus. Burrhus then implored him to continue his just reign and be reconciled with Britannicus. Néron, again wavering, decided to meet Britannicus.

Narcisse had already prepared poison for Britannicus, but Néron declared he would not now use it. Narcisse, counseling him against clemency, said that Agrippine already publicly boasted of her regained control. He also insinuated that Burrhus was not to be trusted.

Britannicus informed Junie that he was to be reconciled with Néron and voiced his conviction that she would be returned to him, but Junie, doubting Néron's sincerity, feared that Narcisse had deceived them. Agrippine, on the other hand, believed that her words had changed Néron completely and that her plans would be executed.

Sometime after Britannicus had left for his audience with Néron, Burrhus returned and informed the women that Narcisse had poisoned Britannicus and that Néron, unmoved, had watched him die. Appalled by Néron's callousness, Burrhus determined to leave Rome.

Although Néron declared that the death of Britannicus had been inevitable, Junie fled from the palace. When Agrippine accused Néron of murder, Narcisse attempted to explain that Britannicus had been a traitor. Agrippine foretold that Néron had now set the pattern for his reign.

After a public disturbance, Albina informed the court that at the statue of Augustus Junie had pledged herself to become a priestess of Vesta and that the crowd, to protect her, had killed Narcisse. Agrippine and Burrhus went to Néron to try to console him in his despair.

Critique

Heinrich von Kleist's The Broken Jug was written as the result of a jest which von Kleist and two of his friends arranged. They had seen a painting called "La Cruche Cassee," which showed a village judge involved in controversy with a group of villagers over a broken pitcher. Each of the three friends decided to write a play about the possible events leading up to the disagreement about the pitcher, and though the other two plays did not survive, von Kleist's was a great success. A robust farce, strongly reminiscent of Molière, though it lacks the physical action typical of the earlier French farces, the play is, in actuality, a highly humorous attack upon the somewhat questionable methods of the courts of the period in bringing about justice. It has become a classic in German literature and is performed in Germany to this day.

Licht, clerk of the court of Huisum, a village near Utrecht in the Netherlands, appeared at the courtroom one morning to prepare for the day's proceedings. He discovered Adam, the village judge, in a generally disreputable state, nursing a badly lacerated face and an injured leg. When he asked the judge how he had come to be in such a condition, he received a highly questionable story about an altercation with a clothesline and a goat. Licht, sensing that there had been some philandering afoot, hinted as much to Adam, but the judge quite naturally denied the clerk's suggestions.

Early when Adam learned that in Holla both the clerk of the court and the judge had been suspended because their affairs were not in order and that the judge had narrowly missed death when he tried to hang himself in his own barn. Needless to say, Adam's affairs were in no better shape than those of his unfortunate neighbors. Before he could get his clothes on and make an attempt at restoring order, however, Counselor Walter's servant came to announce that Walter had arrived. Adam tried to defer immediate action by telling an even more unlikely story about his accident and begging that the inspection be delayed. Licht was calmer, however, and insisted that Adam receive the counselor.

At the height of the chaos in preparations for Walter, Adam, discovering that he could not find his wig, was informed by a spying servant girl that he had come home without it after eleven o'clock the night before. He naturally denied this claim also and told the servant girl that she had lost her mind; he suddenly remembered that the cat had kittened in his wig and therefore he could not use it. So the girl was sent to borrow a wig from the vergers' wife, after being reminded not to mention the matter to the vergers himself. Before the girl could return, Counselor Walter appeared, expressing regrets that he had not been able to announce himself in advance and assuring Adam and Licht that he knew matters would be only tolerably in order but that he expected little more. He then de-

Rull and her daughter Eve, and Veit Tumpel and his son Ruprecht charged in, obviously in a high state of agitation over a broken pitcher. Marthe accused Ruprecht, who was engaged to marry Eve, of breaking the pitcher, but Ruprecht denied doing so. Eve was in a mild case of hysterics because she was about to lose Ruprecht, who swore that he never wished to see her again and kept calling her a strumpet. Marthe, wanting to see justice done, demanded it vociferously because she felt that Eve's good name had been destroyed along with the pitcher.

In the middle of this confusion Judge Adam appeared in his robes, but wigless, to open his court; he was visibly shaken at the scene which greeted him. Eve continued to plead with her mother to leave well enough alone and Adam tried unsuccessfully to talk with Eve about a piece of paper, but she would have none of it. Counselor Walter insisted that court begin.

Marthe, brought at last to the stand, accused Ruprecht of breaking the pitcher. He denied the charge and demanded that she prove her accusation. Adam agreed completely with Marthe and tried to dismiss the case, but the counselor would not let him. So the trial proceeded.

As the evidence was presented, it came out that the pitcher had been broken at eleven o'clock the night before when Marthe had heard voices coming from Eve's room and had rushed in to find the pitcher smashed, Eve in tears, and Ruprecht standing in the middle of the room. Naturally Ruprecht was suspect, but according to Ruprecht there had been a third party present whom he could not identify. According to Marthe, Eve had also admitted that there was a third party in the room but the girl had refused to identify him. When Ruprecht finally took the stand, he testified that he had come to make a late call on Eve and had found her near the gate to her house with another man. He had watched until they went to Eve's room, then, moved by passion, he had rushed after them and broken down the door, smashing the pitcher just as someone jumped out of the window and got caught in the grape vine. He had seized the door latch and beaten the culprit over the head with it, receiving in return a handful of sand in the face. He thought the man was the village cobbler, but he could not be sure.

Adam was quite anxious to assign the blame to the cobbler and thereby prevent Eve from giving testimony, but his attempts were unsuccessful. Eve, taking the stand, cleared Ruprecht of smashing the pitcher but refused to identify the third party.

However, there had been another participant in the affairs of the preceding evening—one Brigitte, the aunt of Ruprecht. She appeared in court with a wig which was identified as Adam's and a story of having seen the devil leave Eve's house around eleven o'clock the night before. She had followed the tracks in the snow the next morning in order to find the devil's abode and the tracks had led to the judge's very door. Adam, declaring that this account had nothing to do with the case, proceeded to sentence Ruprecht.

The judge's decision prompted Eve to confess the whole story. It seemed that Adam had told Eve that Ruprecht would be drafted and sent to India but that he had the power to save Ruprecht from this fate and he had forged a certificate which he made Eve go to her room to sign. There he tried to seduce her, at which time Ruprecht burst in, smashed the pitcher, and beat Adam, who had jumped out of the window. Before the whole story was out, however, Adam had already run off to escape a beating, and the only person who was not satisfied was Marthe, who planned to take her pitcher to the High Court in Utrecht and demand justice.

Critique

Revolving around the question of whether discipline or understanding tolerance is best for rearing children, The Brothers (Adelphi) is one of the first "problem plays" in European literature. Although the action does not lead to an unambiguous conclusion on one side or the other, Terence clearly leans toward tolerance. The plot is built around traditional romantic attachments and misunderstandings, but its action is resolved by elements inherent in the characters as Terence depicts them and not by the usual farcical tricks and coincidences. Terence keeps comic irony alive by maintaining his audience's awareness of the true state of affairs out of which the characters' misunderstandings arise.

Micio was an aging, easygoing Athenian bachelor whose strict and hard working brother Demea had permitted him to adopt and rear Aeschinus, one of Demea's two sons. Unlike his brother, Micio had been a permissive parent, choosing to let pass many of Aeschinus' small extravagances on the assumption that children are more likely to remain bound to their duty by ties of kindness than by those of fear.

Micio came to wonder if his policy had been the best. One day, shortly after Aeschinus had told him he was tired of the Athenian courtesans and wanted to marry, Demea came to Micio and informed him angrily that Aeschinus had broken into a strange house, beaten its master, and carried off a woman with whom he was infatuated. It was a shameful thing, Demea said, especially since Aeschinus had such a fine example of continence and industry in his brother Ctesipho, who dutifully spent his time working for Demea in the country. It was also shameful that Aeschinus had been reared the way he had, Demea suggested, Micio was letting the youth go to the bad by failing to restrain his excesses.

After quarreling about their methods for rearing children, the two men parted. Demea agreed not to interfere and Micio, although confused and grieved by Aeschinus' apparent change of heart and failure to inform him of the escapade, determined to stand by his adopted son.

As it turned out, however, Demea's report of Aeschinus was correct only in outline. The house into which the young man had broken belonged to Sannio, a pimp and slave dealer, and the woman carried off was a slave girl with whom, ironically, the model son Ctesipho had fallen in love, but whom he could not afford to buy. Demea's restraint had been more than Ctesipho could bear, and because he was afraid to indulge himself before his father he had chosen to do so behind his back Aeschinus had agreed to procure the girl for his brother but had kept his motives secret in order to protect his brother from Demea's wrath

Sannio, furious at the treatment he had received, hounded Aeschinus for the return of the girl But because he was soon to leave on a slave trading expedition, he had no time to prosecute the case in court moreover, an obscure point of law created the possibility that the girl might be declared free and that Sannio could lose his entire investment In consequence, he finally consented to sell her for the price he had paid for her

Meanwhile, other complications arose Long before the slave girl episode, Aeschinus had fallen in love with Pamphila, the daughter of Sostrata, a poor Athenian widow Aeschinus had promised to marry Pamphila and they had anticipated this union with the result that she was about to be delivered of his child Then, while she was in labor, it was reported that he had abducted the slave girl and was having an affair with her The mother and daughter were of course extremely upset at Aeschinus' apparent faithlessness, and in despair Sostrata related her dilemma to her only friend, Hegio, an impoverished old man who had been her husband's friend and who was also a friend of Demea Hegio, indignant, went to Demea to demand that justice be done Demea, having just heard that Ctesiphon had played some part in the abduction and assuming that Aeschinus had seduced the model son into evil ways, was doubly furious at Hegio's news Immediately he went off hunting for Micio, only to be misdirected by one of Aeschinus' slaves, who was attempting to prevent the old man from discovering that Ctesiphon and his mistress were both in Micio's house

A short time later Hegio encountered Micio, who, having learned the truth regarding the abduction, promised to explain everything to Sostrata and Pamphila As he was leaving the widow's house, he met Aeschinus, who was himself coming to try to explain to the women the muddle he was in Pretending ignorance of Aeschinus' situation Micio mildly punished the young man for his furtiveness by pretending to be at Sostrata's house as the representative of another suitor for Pamphila's hand but when he saw the agony which the prospect of losing Pamphila produced in Aeschinus, Micio put an end to his pretense and promised the grateful and repentant youth that he could marry Pamphila at once

Demea, finally returning from the wild goose chase that the servant had sent him on, accosted Micio in front of his house Although Micio calmed his brother somewhat by telling him how matters really stood, Demea still retained his disapproval of Micio's parental leniency The crisis occurred shortly afterward when Demea learned the full truth about Ctesiphon—that the model son had not only been a party to the abduction, but that the whole affair had been conceived and executed for his gratification At first the knowledge nearly put him out of his wits, but Micio gradually brought him to a perception of the fact that no irreparable harm had been done Also, since Demea's strictness and severity had ultimately not succeeded, perhaps leniency and generosity were most effective after all in dealing with children Demea, realizing that his harshness had made Ctesiphon fearful and suspicious of his father, decided to try Micio's mode of conduct, and he surprised all who knew him by his cheerful resignation Indeed, he even went so far as to have the wall between Micio's and Sostrata's houses torn down and to suggest, not without a certain malice, that the only truly generous thing Micio could do for Sostrata would be to marry her At first Micio hesitated, but when the suggestion was vehemently seconded by Aeschinus, Micio at last gave in

Demea also persuaded Micio to free Syrus and his wife Phrygia, his slaves and to give Hegio some property to support him in his old age Then he turned to his sons and gave his consent to their amorous projects, asking only to be allowed in the future to check them when their youthful passions threatened to lead them astray. The young men submitted willingly to his request.

Layamon's Brut is the work of an English priest of Worcestershire who took Wace's Roman de Brut (c. 1155) and following its outline, nearly doubled its length with the addition of imaginative passages and selections from Welsh tradition. Wace's verse chronicle was a Norman version of the prose history composed by Geoffrey of Monmouth (c. 1100-1152 or 1154), who first drew the elements of the Arthurian legend together in his Historia Regum Britanniae. By emphasizing the Saxon character of the Arthurian period and by incorporating fanciful Celtic additions to the narrative, Layamon added considerably to the dimensions of the Arthurian story inherited from Geoffrey and Wace. From his Brut later writers such as Chretien de Troyes and Sir Thomas Malory borrowed the essential elements of their own masterpieces.

The language of the Brut, closer to Middle English than to the Anglo-Saxon, is a product of the transition. The verse retains the Anglo-Saxon features of alliterative lines and rhymed couplets. Layamon's work contains 32,241 verses as compared to the 15,300 verses in Wace's Brut. The translation available to modern readers is that of Sir Frederic Madden in a three-volume edition published in 1847.

Although the Brut is a literary version of the history of Britain from the fall of Troy and the arrival of Brutus in Britain to the death of Cadwalader, the seventh-century British king, the heart of the poem and the part most favored by the author and readers alike is the story of Arthur, the central figure in this chronicle of early, legendary kings.

The Layamon version, following Wace, chronicles the rise and fall of Arthur's predecessors, telling, among others, of Constantine, the Roman king allegedly murdered by Vortiger (Vortigern) of Wales, a schemer who managed to secure the election of Constance (Constantius), Constantine's oldest son, as his father's successor. Constantine is important because he was the father not only of Constance, but of Aurelius Ambrosius (Aurelius Ambrosius) and of Uther (later, Uther Pendragon), Arthur's father.

According to the Brut, Vortiger arranged the murder of Constance by the Picts and became king. He formed an alliance with Hengest from Alamein, introducing the Saxons to political power in Britain. Vortiger's romantic interest in Hengest's daughter Rowenne provoked a revolt against him—for consorting with the heathen Saxons—and Vortimer, Vortiger's son by his first wife, became king. Vortiger plotted to have Vortimer poisoned by Rowenne, and thus he regained his throne.

It is at this point that Merlin, the magician and prophet, is introduced. According to the legend, a sage named Joram had declared that if anyone were to discover a male child that had never had a father and were to open his breast, take his blood, and mix it with lime, any castle wall made with the mixture would stand forever. Some knights subsequently overheard a quarrel between two boys, the one charging the other with having no father, since his father was unknown. The knights, remembering Joram's prophecy, took the latter boy, whose name was Merlin, to the king, together with Merlin's mother, a nun. She told of a golden knight who had come to her in a dream and got her with child. Vortiger was interested in using Merlin's blood to repair his castle's walls for the walls fell down every night, but Merlin proved that Joram was a false prophet by showing that the walls fell because of a nightly battle between two dragons far down in the earth. Merlin then told Vortiger that the dragons were signs of kings yet to come, of Aurelie and Uther, who would, in that order, follow Vortiger as kings. And then Merlin made mention of Arthur, describing him in the most glowing terms and predicting great deeds for him. He revealed that Arthur would come out of Cornwall and that he would be indomitable, like a wild boar in ferocity as he destroyed all traitors. In addition to his bravery, Arthur would also be noble in thought and would one day rule in Rome. He would fell all his foes, none would be able to stand against him, such would be his might and his valor.

It is just such a mixture of historical legend and fanciful folklore that gives the early chronicles their charm, inviting other writers to extend the material with inventions of their own. Layamon, an imaginative monk, must have entertained himself by embellishing Wace's poem with colorful details or new features altogether.

As prophesied, Aurelie and Uther, like two fire-breathing dragons, came upon Vortiger in his castle and set fire to it, so that it collapsed and Vortiger was killed. Aurelie became king and fought Vortiger's son Pascent. After Aurelie's death by poisoning, Uther came to the throne.

Uther was in Wales when Aurelie died. He saw a comet and at the end of the comet's tail a dragon. Merlin interpreted the comet's tail as a sign of Aurelie's death and the dragon as a sign of Uther's reign. A gleam from the dragon's mouth was another sign of Arthur's coming.

References such as these prepare the reader for Arthur, the greatest king of ancient British legend. By surrounding Arthur's birth with the mystery of other worlds, the chroniclers give him something of the eminence of a god, and when Layamon, in the tale of Arthur's death, finally speaks of his being borne away to Avalun (Avalon) where Argante (probably Morgan le Fay), queen of the elves, will heal his wounds so that afterwards he will return to his kingdom and live among the Britons with great joy, he is merely joining the enduring faith of the Britons with the Celtic imagery he inherited.

A similar magical aura surrounds the account of Arthur's birth. Arthur was Uther's son by Ygærne, the wife of Garlois, Earl of Cornwall (hence, "out of Cornwall" as Merlin prophesied). The fact that Uther had access to the earl's wife was in itself the result of Merlin's magic, for Merlin disguised Uther as the earl so that the king could enter the castle and make love to Ygærne. Uther married her after Cornwall's death, but Arthur had already been conceived. Arthur was born after Ygærne had become queen.

Immediately upon his birth the elves endowed him with magical qualities. They gave him three things: the strength to be the best of all knights, the assurance that he would become a rich king, and the promise of a long life. The elves also decreed that the child be endowed with the virtue of generosity so that Arthur became the most generous man in all the world. Such were the princely attributes bestowed upon the legendary Arthur at birth.

Perhaps no part of Arthur's legend has done more to fix him in the minds of those who know the story than the account of the Round Table. According to Layamon, who developed earlier references, the Round Table was suggested to King Arthur by a clever carpenter after a battle about precedence at the board resulted in the death of several knights. The table was designed to seat sixteen hundred knights in one large circle, so that none need ever feel that he has been slighted.

The carpenter made the table portable so that Arthur could take it with him and avoid future squabbles. In this way Arthur need never fear that any sensitive knight, feeling that he deserved a place nearer the "head" of the table, might cause trouble.

The Brut tells of Arthur's wars to win Scotland, Ireland, Iceland, Norway, Denmark, and France—all of which became parts of his kingdom. He won France in single combat with King Froile.

Arthur's chivalric spirit is made evident by the tale of his combat with a giant capable of eating six swine at a sitting. Arthur found the giant sleeping, but the king refused to kill the ogre while he lay defenseless. He awoke the giant, downed him after a great struggle, and beheaded him.

After fighting Luces (Lucius), the Roman and gaining control of Rome, Arthur had a dream that Modred, his nephew (in some versions, also his son) and Wenhaver (Guinevere), his queen, were destroying his castle. The dream was prophetic. In a battle with Modred at Camelford, Modred was slain. Arthur had already lost his favorite knights, Kay and Bedwyr, while fighting the Romans, and he had lost Walwein in an earlier battle against Modred.

The descriptions are detailed and vivid. According to Layamon, after the last battle with Modred, of more than two hundred thousand men who were engaged in the battle, only Arthur and two of his knights remained alive after the struggle ended. Arthur's wounds were fatal; he is described as having fifteen dreadful wounds from a broad slaughter spear, wounds so large that two gloves could be thrust in even the smallest of them.

Layamon's final words about Arthur are encouraging: he recalls that Merlin, the sage soothsayer, has promised that an Arthur would yet come to aid the English in time of need.

Critique

The Bulwark deals with three generations of the Barnes family, and the impact of social change in America on themselves and their Quaker faith. Once again, as is frequently the case in Dreiser's novels, the control advocated by Quaker belief is unable to stem the impact of the modern and commercial world. Children desert the faith for worldly pleasures, following the call of their inevitable natures, even Solon, the most dedicated of adherents, finds his own faith warped and made rigid by his increasing attention to business. The Bulwark is less crowded and repetitious than are some of Dreiser's earlier novels. Less of the social background and fewer economic details are given. The novel, characteristically and powerfully, although at times somewhat clumsily, pits man's best efforts to channel his experience into a meaningful and worthy pattern against the inevitable forces working in his own nature and in the life about him.

Rufus Barnes was a farmer and tradesman living near Segookit, Maine. He and his wife Hannah were good Quakers. When Hannah's sister, Phoebe Kimber, living in Trenton, New Jersey, lost her husband, she asked Rufus to come to New Jersey to help settle her husband's affairs. Rufus, finding himself the executor of a rather large estate, did a thorough and competent job. In gratitude for his help and in hopes that he would move his family close to her, Phoebe offered Rufus one of her properties, an old, run-down, but elegant house in Dukla, Pennsylvania, just across the Delaware from Trenton. Rufus was willing to restore the house and try to sell it, but Phoebe was eager to give the house to him. At last Rufus agreed to take the house and move his family to Dukla. He and his wife had the house restored to great taste and beauty.

Rufus and Hannah became somewhat more worldly in Dukla. Rufus went into business, dealing in real estate, but he applied his Quaker principles to his business and helped the poor farmers make their land yield more profit so that he would not have to foreclose. Respected and prosperous, he and his wife still followed their faith and taught it carefully to their two children, Cynthia and Solon.

Solon Barnes cut his leg with an ax. An incompetent doctor bungled the treatment and for a time they all feared that the boy might die. But his mother prayed devoutly and Solon recovered, an event that kept the family strictly loyal to their faith.

Sent to school with their cousins, Laura and Rhoda, Phoebe's children, Cynthia and Solon began to acquire more polish and knowledge of the world. At school, Solon also met Benecia Wallin, the daughter of a wealthy Quaker. The other children, Cynthia, Laura, Rhoda and Benecia, were all sent to a Quaker finishing school at Oakwold but Solon chose to remain at home and help his father in the real estate business.

Justus Wallin, Benecia's father, was impressed by the Barnes family. He admired the way Rufus and Solon conducted their business; he was impressed with Hannah's faith and her behavior at Quaker meetings. The families became friendly, and Justus asked Rufus and Solon to become the agents for his extensive holdings. Solon and Benecia fell in love. Justus found for Solon a job in his Philadelphia bank and, although Solon had to start at the bottom, it was clear that he had both the talent and the influence to rise quickly to the top. Solon and Benecia were married, to the delight of both families, in a Quaker ceremony.

The years passed. Solon and Benecia were happy and successful. Solon did well at the bank in Philadelphia. Benecia was a quiet, principled, and religious woman. After the death of Solon's parents, Solon and Benecia moved into the house in Dukla. Although Solon occasionally experienced metaphysical doubts, he lived in complete adherence to the moral principles of the Quakers. He became a bulwark of the community, an honest forthright man who did not approve of smoking, drinking, art, music, literature, or dancing. He and Benecia brought up their five children in accordance with these strict Quaker principles.

Each of the children reacted differently to this upbringing. The oldest, Isobel, was an unattractive girl, not popular in school, who found it difficult to make friends. She began to read books and decided, against the ideas implanted by her parents, that she wanted to avoid the Quaker finishing school and go to college. Solon managed to compromise and send her to Llewellyn College for Women, a Quaker institution, where she remained to do postgraduate work. Orville, the oldest son, inherited Solon's severity, although not his kindness. Orville became interested in business at an early age, although his materialism was not tempered by any principle deeper than respectability. He married a wealthy socialite and went into her father's pottery business in Trenton. The third child, Dorothea, was the beauty of the family. She had been taken up by her father's cousin Rhoda, who had married a wealthy doctor, one of Benecia's cousins in the Wallin family. More worldly than the Barnes family, Rhoda gave elegant parties, approved of dancing and soon had Dorothea married to a wealthy and socially acceptable young man. None of these three children, however, overtly abandoned the Quaker faith or caused their parents serious concern.

The fourth child, Etta, was more interesting. Sensitive, pretty, highly intelligent, she soon began to read forbidden books. She became friendly with a young girl named Volida La Porte, who introduced her to French novels and gave her the idea of studying literature at the University of Wisconsin. When Solon insisted his daughter attend the Llewellyn College for Women, Etta ran away to a Wisconsin summer session after pawning her mother's jewels to provide the fare. Solon went after her, and the two were reconciled. Etta acknowledged the theft and returned the jewels. In the meantime, old Hester Wallin had died and left Etta, as well as each of her sisters, a small income.

Solon allowed Etta to remain at Wisconsin for the summer session. After she left the university, Etta moved to Greenwich Village to continue her studies. There she met Willard Kane, an artist, and eventually had an affair with him even though she realized that he had no intention of jeopardizing his artistic career by marriage. The Barnes family knew of the affair—Orville had discovered it—and they disapproved highly.

The youngest child, Stewart, was the wildest of all. He lacked the essential honesty of his brothers and sisters. Spoiled by his cousin Rhoda, who took him up as she had taken up Dorothea, and sent to a snobbish private school, Stewart was interested only in his conquests of lower class girls on riotous trips to Atlantic City. With his friends, Bruge and Jennings, Stewart would pick up girls and take them off for the weekend. He often had to steal money from his parents or his brother to finance his escapades. His reckless life was paralleled by wild financial speculations, in the business world, that increasingly worried Solon. Solon's bank was involved in some questionable activities, but Solon, true to his religious principles, felt he could not pull out of the situation without hurting others who depended on him. Similarly, he could not abandon Stewart.

One weekend Stewart's friend Bruge gave a young girl, Psyche, some of his mother's "drops" because Psyche had not yielded to Bruge and he felt the "drops" might make her comply. They did, but they also killed Psyche. The boys, frightened, left her body on the road. The police soon apprehended them and charged all three with rape and murder. Unable to face his family and feeling some vestiges of religious guilt, Stewart killed himself in jail.

The shock of Stewart's suicide caused Benecia to suffer a stroke. Etta left her lover and returned home shortly before her mother's death. She found Solon greatly changed. In his despair, he had lost his severity and no longer felt he had the right to judge others. Realizing that his concern with business and with strict standards had cut him off from the kindness and light at the center of his faith, he had learned to love all things, all creatures of nature. Etta, who often read to him, found herself more and more attracted to the central "Inner Light" of the Quaker belief. Always the most understanding child, she and her father developed a genuine closeness and affection for each other before Solon died of cancer six months later. Etta, left alone and removed from the commercial contemporary world, became the embodiment of essential Quaker principles.

CAESAR AND CLEOPATRA

CLEOPATRA, Queen of Egypt

PTOLEMY DIONYSUS, her brother and husband, King of Egypt

BRITANNUS, a Briton, Caesar's secretary

RUFIO, a Roman officer

POTHINUS, the king's guardian

APOLLONORUS, a Sicilian

Ever since the publication, in 1579, of North's translation of Plutarch's Parallel Lives, Cleopatra has been one of the great romantic figures of English literature. To be sure, Dante had briefly glimpsed her,

"tossed on the blast," in the Circle of the Lustful, but he had hurried on to give the famous story of Paolo and Francesca. It remained for Shakespeare, in Antony and Cleopatra, to make her immortal as

"the serpent of old Nile," the epitome of the eternal and irresistible feminine, who, even in death, seemed

As she would catch another Antony
In her strong toil of grace and to lavish on her some of his greatest descriptive poetry

The barge she sat in like a burnish'd throne,
Burn'd on the water

so that Shakespearean critics have exhausted themselves in their efforts to do justice to the poet's creation. As Marc Parrot said, "Of Shakespeare's Cleopatra it is hard to speak without breaking into rhapsody of praise." Even the neo-classic Dryden, in 1678, still found her the archetype of an all-consuming passion, for whose sake Antony held "the world well lost."

As for Caesar, his imprint has been upon the European mind since 44 B.C. To Dante—who saw him in Limbo as "Caesar armed, with the falcon eyes"—he was the founder of the Empire, and his murder was so terrible an example of treachery to lords and benefactors that Cassius and Brutus were placed with Judas in the jaws of Satan in the lowest pit of Hell. To Shakespeare, he was a man who in spite of arrogance and a thinly disguised ambition for absolute power actually bestrode "the narrow world like a Colossus." These are the figures of world history and world legend whom Shaw chose to bring together in a modern comedy.

So strongly has Shakespeare stamped his interpretation of Cleopatra upon our literary consciousness that it is with a distinct shock that we meet Shaw's heroine—a girl of sixteen, crouched, on a moonlit October night, between the paws of a sphinx in the desert where she has fled to escape the invading Romans. She is the typical schoolgirl—high strung, giggly, impulsive, terrified of her nurse, ready to believe that Romans have trunks, tusks, tails, and seven arms, each of which carries a hundred arrows. She has the child's instinctive cruelty, after she has encountered Caesar—whom she does not recognize—and he has forced her nurse to cringe at her feet, she is eager to beat the nurse and can talk gleefully of poisoning slaves and of cutting off her brother's head. For Shaw has set his plot at the moment in history when Egypt is divided. Ptolemy Dionysus has driven Cleopatra from Alexandria, and the opposing children—Ptolemy represented by Pothinus and Cleopatra by Flautista—are at swords' points, while Egypt is ready to fall into the conqueror's hand. It is the familiar situation of an immensely old and decadent civilization at the mercy of a rising world power, represented by Caesar.

Again, the reader, with memories of Caesar's commentaries on the Gallic War and of Mark Antony's funeral oration, receives a shock when Caesar comes upon the scene and finds Cleopatra hiding between the paws of the sphinx. The conqueror of the world is presented as a middle-aged man, painfully conscious of his years, somewhat prosaic, very far indeed from "Caesar armed, with the falcon eyes." He is past fifty, and the fateful Ides of March are less than four years away. As most men of his age in any period of history would be, he is somewhat amused and yet wholly fascinated by the lovely child he has met under such strange circumstances. He is quite aware of his weakness for women, so that the reader begins to foresee a romantic turn to the plot. But Shaw was not a romantic dramatist. When Caesar returns Cleopatra to her palace, reveals his identity, and forces her to abandon her childishness and to assume her position as queen, we recognize him as a man who is eminently practical, imperturbable in moments of danger, endowed with the slightly cynical detachment of the superior mind surrounded by inferiors.

The basic story that Shaw used for his somewhat rambling plot is to be found in Plutarch's Life of Caesar and in Caesars Civil War As Plutarch tells it, Caesar arrived in Egypt to find that his great rival Pompey had been killed at the instigation of Pothinus, a eunuch and the favorite of Ptolemy Caesar, overcome with grief at Pompey's murder, took into his service the latter's friends who had been left wandering in Egypt Meanwhile, Pothinus, having banished Cleopatra, had begun to plot against Caesar in the interest of the king, thus compelling Caesar, in self defense, to take Cleopatra's side Plutarch gives the famous story of her ruse to get to Caesar with the assistance of Apollodorus she hid her self in a roll of bedding and was carried into Caesar's apartments Then, at a feast in the palace, Caesar learned that Pothinus was plotting his murder, and so he killed the eunuch Achilles, Ptolemy's general raised the city against Caesar and cut off Roman communications by sea, forcing Caesar to burn his own ships and, by accident, the Alexandrine library It was while he was besieged on the Island of Pharos that Caesar performed his famous exploit of leaping into the sea and swimming to his own men who were defending the mole Later he defeated Achilles in a battle in which young Ptolemy was killed, thus leaving Cleopatra sole ruler of Egypt

This is the story that Shaw followed quite closely, except for his invention of the meeting of Caesar and Cleopatra in the desert and the added device of having Pothinus killed by Ftateeta at Cleopatra's instigation after Caesar had given him a safe-conduct from the palace There is also a possible debt to the almost forgotten drama, The False One, written by John Fletcher and Philip Massinger about 1620, which deals with exactly the same story Certainly Shaw's blunt spoken Rufio appears to be a reworking of the Scava of the old play

Shaw has also added two characters of his own to the story the savage Ftateeta, who is eventually killed by Rufio, and Britannus, Caesar's secretary The latter is Shaw's picture of the eternal Englishman—conventional, easily shocked, unable to understand any customs but those of his own island It is in characterization, rather than in plot, that the play excels, and it excels through the element of surprise The surprise is, of course, created by the device of presenting familiar literary figures from new angles, for it is obvious that Shaw intended to rub some of the romantic gilding from them Cleopatra, although she has become, at the end of the play, a precocious adult under Caesar's influence, has lost her girlish charm without becoming a particularly attractive woman She has never really loved Caesar—nor he her, for Shaw rearranged history in this aspect of their relationship—and her one thought is of the arrival of Antony, whom she has met before and never forgotten She has a presentiment of her coming tragedy, yet, eternally childish, is poised to run to meet it Perhaps Leigh Hunt's phrase best describes her "The laughing queen that caught the world's great hands"

James Huneker maintained that this drama "entitled [Shaw] to a free pass to that pantheon wherein our beloved Mark Twain sits enthroned" But this play is no Connecticut Yankee with its smug conviction of the vast progress achieved since the Middle Ages It is Shaw's conviction that there has been no perceptible progress since Caesar's day Caesar himself knew that history would continue to unroll an endless series of murders and wars, always disguised under the most high sounding and noble names He was a great man, not because he was "ahead of his age," but because he stood outside it and could rule with mercy and without revenge Such a man would be great in any period of history

Lyly's primary effort in his writings was to refine the rude speech of the Elizabethan age. In Campaspe (also titled Alexander and Campaspe) this effort is clearly evident. The play lacks many of the qualities of great drama—character development, careful plotting, and a dramatic climax, for example—but its diction is elevated and graceful, of a piece with the nobility of the characters and their sentiments. Another noteworthy feature is the inclusion of several charming lyrics, including the famous "Cupid and my Campaspe played/ At cards for kisses." Despite the lack of dramatic unity, as exemplified by the absence of interaction between the main plot and the subplot, this play, along with Lyly's other dramas, helped to supply the greater playwrights to follow with a delicacy of language and sentiment that greatly enriched English drama.

The great King Alexander had conquered the city of Thebes and taken prisoner the beautiful and virtuous Campaspe, whom he promised to treat gently.

In Athens, at that time, was Diogenes, the ill tempered philosopher. His servant Manes complained to the servants of Plato and Apelles, the painter, that Diogenes was a man of exceedingly frugal habits and that his servant, in consequence, often went hungry.

Also in Athens were Plato, Aristotle, and several other great philosophers whom Alexander had called to his headquarters. The great thinkers disputed the difference between divine and natural causes until Alexander came to them and asked each a difficult question about such things as animals, gods and men, life and death, and the composition of the world. After each philosopher had answered wisely, Alexander departed, satisfied with their sagacity. Then Diogenes entered and berated them for toadying to the king. Upon the entrance of Manes and his fellow servants, after the departure of the philosophers, there ensued a witty exchange between Diogenes and the servants, in which Diogenes abused them all.

During a long dialogue in the market place, Alexander admitted his love for Campaspe, at which Hephestion was horrified. While his loyal general decried love as a weakener of men, Alexander defended the passion and told Hephestion to allow him to love in peace.

Alexander, seeing Diogenes in his tub, went to him and asked if he had no reverence for kings, to which Diogenes replied that he had none and wished nothing from anyone. Apelles entered and said that the portrait he was painting of Campaspe was not quite finished.

Campaspe, saying that she did not believe men's flattery, cut short the painter's questions about her feelings toward love with a request that he get on with the painting

Although several of Alexander's liege tenants declared their concern for the king's martial inactivity, Alexander was planning a campaign against Persia. After telling Hephestion that he wished only a brief respite from war, the conqueror went to talk with Apelles and Campaspe about the painting. Apelles excused his delay by saying that Campaspe was so beautiful that it was difficult to paint her as she really was. Alexander was pleased with the work, and his love for Campaspe grew even greater, despite Hephestion's warnings against love.

Returning to his house, Apelles, in a long soliloquy, revealed his despair over his hopeless love for Campaspe, whom he knew he could never obtain because she was loved by a king. In a melancholy song he praised her beauty and bemoaned his helpless condition.

Several of the servants met in the market place to witness a strange event. Diogenes had said that he would fly. Manes entered, followed by a crowd of citizens, and they all approached Diogenes' tub. It soon became apparent that Diogenes had made the promise so that he could gather a group of Athenians about him and berate them for their lack of virtue and wisdom. After a heated debate, the citizens left in disgust. The servants, however, were amused by the philosopher's biting criticisms.

Alone in the palace, Campaspe debated with herself whether she preferred Apelles to the great Alexander. Apelles entered, and in a veiled dialogue revealed his love for her. Later, at Apelles' studio, he and Campaspe vowed their love for each other, but their feeling of mutual devotion was mixed with fear of Alexander's displeasure. A page entered and told Apelles that Alexander wished him to take the painting immediately to the palace, the conqueror suspected, rightly, that the painter had finished the portrait but did not wish to part with it.

When Sylvius, a citizen, brought his sons to Diogenes to be educated, the father made his three sons dance, do acrobatics, and sing. Diogenes, unimpressed, criticized the boys' performances and called them trivial. Neither the boys nor Diogenes wanted anything to do with the other, and Sylvius departed in anger.

A short time later two of Alexander's soldiers, accompanied by a courtesan, passed by Diogenes' tub. Bent on pleasure, they paused to ask him what he thought of their intention, and he insulted them harshly. One offered to strike him, but, afraid of being found by Alexander, they left after singing a short song.

Soon Alexander and Hephestion approached the tub. Alexander, believing that Apelles was in love with Campaspe, told his page to summon Apelles and then to cry out that his studio was on fire. The page left, and the two great warriors talked with Diogenes about love, which the philosopher scorned.

Soon Apelles appeared. While he was talking with Alexander about a new painting, the page entered and shouted that Apelles' studio was afire. The painter revealed his love for Campaspe by being concerned only about her portrait. Alexander then told him of the ruse and had the page call Campaspe. After he had forced the two lovers to admit their true feeling for each other, Alexander, in a sudden burst of generosity, ordered them to marry.

Alexander then commanded the page to summon his generals so that they could prepare to invade Persia. When Hephestion praised the king's conquest of his feelings, Alexander replied that a man should not wish to command the world if he could not command himself, and that he would fall in love when there were no more countries to conquer.

CANDIDA

Locale London

First presented 1897

Principal characters

THE REVEREND JAMES MORELL a Christian Socialist clergyman

CANDIDA MORELL his intelligent, vivacious wife

EUGENE MARCHBANKS, a poet in love with Candida

MR BURGESS, Candida's father

THE REVEREND ALEXANDER MILL, Morell's idealistic admiring young curate

PROSERPINE GARNETT, Morell's secretary

George Bernard Shaw's critics often bring a two fold charge against his plays (1) his characters are too academic and lifeless, (2) his plays are merely tracts for expressing Shavian ideas on love, war, property, morals, and revolution. This charge, however, is not usually leveled at Candida. Usually the most completely anti Shaw critic concedes that here is one play free, for the most part, from any really revolutionary ideas, aside from a few comments on socialism and corruption in government. In fact, in the lively Candida, Shaw is saluting an old, established institution marriage. But as he salutes, the author is, as usual, winking.

Candida belongs to the group of his Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant published in 1898. It was given its first public London production in 1904, after a private presentation in 1897, and has gone on to become one of the most popular plays in the Shaw repertory, probably ranking second only to Saint Joan. It was an early favorite with Shaw himself. He held on to it for some time before allowing its production, preferring to read it privately to his friends, who, it is said, would weep loudly at the more touching scenes.

Shaw and the English and American theaters are correct in their veneration for Candida, for the play is put together in masterly form, with respect for a uniformity that is often lacking in some of his other works. Here is a play that gives an audience highly comic scenes on the one hand, and yet moments of highly serious insights on the other. Finally, here is an extremelyactable play. Candida herself is one of the great roles in the modern theater, that of the self possessed woman who, as in many homes, subtly runs the household while appearing subservient to her husband. The Reverend James Mavor Morell, the husband in question, is another excellent role: the hearty Christian Socialist clergyman, the popular speaker always in demand, the unintimidated man who is happy and secure in his important position until untoward events began to occur, brought about by a young, wild, seemingly effeminate friend of the family, the poet Eugene Marchbanks. The role of Marchbanks, the eighteen year old worshiper of Candida, has also been a favorite of many stage juveniles though others have seen it as a highly distasteful, unrealistic part to play. As the boy who grows faint at the thought of Candida's peeling onions, who rants, raves, and whines over the thought of the earthly, boonsish Morell being married to such a poetic delight and inspiration as Candida, Marchbanks often reminds us of the young and ethereal Shelley, and is possibly a younger Bernard Shaw.

Most readers and viewers are quick to note that Candida bears a great resemblance to Ibsen's A Doll's House. Shaw, however, has reversed Ibsen. In the lat ter's play, Nora is the doll, the puppet, but in Candida the tables are turned. Morell, though a likable, high principled fellow, is actually the doll. It is his wife, as he eventually learns, who is responsible for his success. Thus when Candida is "forced" to choose between Marchbanks and Morell, she chooses Morell, the weaker of the two. This is, supposedly, Shaw's Virgin Mother play, certainly Candida plays the role of Morell's wife, mother, and sisters rolled into one. She is the one who arranges his affairs, who keeps him happy and content, who peels his onions for him. Her true status Morell finally comes to realize, though later he will probably rationalize his way out of his paradoxical victory. Here, then, is one aspect of the play, and to many the main idea behind it: the coming of a husband and wife to a fuller understanding of each other.

All of this bears a certain resemblance to romantic drama, and perhaps that is the secret of the play's success among non-Shaw theatergoers. Shaw traded against romanticism, but Candida is often romantic. Although Candida discovers a typical Shavian thought—that service and not necessarily contentment is the greatest triumph in life—the play and its celebration of the wife-mother role seems greatly romantic in comparison with other Shavian drama.

If one takes the view that the play concerns growing awareness between a husband and wife, Marchbanks serves as the catalyst bringing about the final result. Through the poetic railings of the young poetaster, Morell begins to wonder if he is actually too commonplace for Candida.

But when Morell is accepted and the poet is spurned in the famous choosing scene, Marchbanks leaves as a more adult being with a secret in his heart and apparently quite eager to go out into the night. It may well be that Marchbanks realizes that this mundane domesticity is not for him—he has a greater destiny than this. Candida has revealed the average happy marriage to him, and he realizes there is no poetry in it. A poet must go out into the night, and on to greater and more exalted triumphs.

This, quite possibly, is another of Shaw's main ideas in the play—that the man of genius is out of place in conventional society. However, the fact that the role of Marchbanks is often un-realistic and overdrawn reduces the total effect of this particular Shavian premise. Through his excessive behavior, the conflict between Marchbanks and Morell fails to convince many readers and viewers to some, there is no choice at all between the likable clergyman and the effeminate boy.

Most others, however, are willing to overlook this flaw and to ignore the charge that Candida, in the "choosing" scene, behaves in a most conceited fashion. Audiences have much more preferred to delight in the high comedy of Candida, its amusing situations and the witty, sparkling dialogue which is generally consistent throughout the play. This is, next to Saint Joan, Shaw's best constructed drama. And there is no doubt that its great popularity is due not only to its form, but also to the fact that in Candida we have Shaw's safest play.

CANTOS

Author Ezra Pound (1885)

First published 1925 1956 and continuing

The Cantos of Ezra Pound constitute an ambitious work of poetry that has been appearing in various drafts over many years, and fairly late sections of the Cantos bear such designations as these: The Pisan Cantos (1948) and Section Rock Drill (1956). This ambitious work is not yet complete and, for reasons that will at once appear, it is not likely to be complete

The work is more often talked about than read, and for several causes. First the poem does not escape association with the controversial career of its author Pound, for many years prior to 1939, lived abroad as an expatriate, critical of the economic systems of Anglo-Saxon culture. During World War II he broadcast from Italian radio stations against various aspects of Anglo-Saxon cultural life and economic systems. For these activities he was taken into custody at the end of the war, he did not face trial, however, and after a period of confinement for psychological reasons, he was released and returned to Italy to live. During this time Pound continued to add new cantos to his work, he was also the controversial recipient of an award—the Bollingen—for meritorious literary service in poetry.

The Cantos are also much talked about for reasons less sensational and more valid. To the reader who makes a hasty inspection—and possibly to the person who spends a good deal of time studying them—the work offers a surface that is daunting. One finds that many sections of the poetic discourse written in English are interrupted by quotations from Provençal, Italian, German, French, Latin, and Greek, not to mention Anglo-Saxon and Middle English. Even more, many pages are adorned with the completely enigmatic ideograms which Pound derives from classical Chinese. These syllabic symbols stand for ideas precious to Pound.

A closer inspection of the actual employment of language offers no further comfort to the beginning reader, the tone of the verse is extremely varied. There are passages in the earlier Cantos that are among the finest lines fashioned by English writing poets in our century: elegiac passages of lament for the virtues of "good" cultures, vitriolic attacks on the defects of what Pound regards as Anglo-Saxon finance capitalism. These passages of excellence alternate with others that, as poetry, seem very strange materials in deed. There are quotations from the prosy diplomatic correspondence of John Adams, phrases more than a century old and dead in intrinsic interest than that. There are quotations from the fiscal regulations of Leopold of Hapsburg Lorraine, who instituted good financial conditions in Tuscany before the disaster of Napoleon's arrival. There are abundant references to historical and literary figures good and bad, Oriental and Western. There are references to many people both well known and obscure, contemporaries familiar to Pound himself through them, the literary crusades and battles of the first half of the twentieth century find adequate memorial in some sections of the long poem.

All this, as suggested, is included and woven into a tight but anecdotal structure which Pound introduces and embroiders with great metrical variety and dexterity. His language varies from noble simplicity and elegance through imitations of the banality (with which all men in all ages have conducted the affairs of the world) to the argot of the illiterate. A special interest appears in the section entitled The Pisan Cantos in which we are allowed to view Pound in a prison camp at Pisa working away on an installment of his masterwork.

Strange and without many literary parallels in its lack of plan, in its preference for jumble rather than clarity, the Cantos should not, however, be regarded as a hoax or a fraud. The continuing poem is, rather, a record of the workings of a sophisticated and ingenious mind that has conducted a decades long war with a world out of joint. In this work language is in decay, social life is ebbing and the economic system is a center of rot.

To thread one's way with utter confidence through the poem one would have to be as erudite as Pound himself. But one can make some progress and have some profit if one reminds oneself of what Pound's abiding gustos and disgusts are Then one will see that the disorder of the poem is a transcription of the mixture of pleasure and nausea which the twentieth century—and the rest of human history, for that matter—have aroused in the poet's sensorium

More systematically than the Cantos ever present the matter, a list could be drawn up thus There are ages that are (or have been) human, and there are ages that have not been human The twentieth century, as Pound himself experienced it in American "learneries" and in the British countryside, is an age that has not been particularly human, has not afforded superior men a good chance to investigate their own natures and inspect the resources of art and language Thus, our age (or parts of our age) is against nature" an upside down world in which money has ceased to be a necessary convenience and has become, in many minds, the most real entity which man can handle Nature and the man fashioned grandeur of art have become sources of only second rate experience

Such an impression Pound repudiates To him, our money culture places us in the midst of ordure, and this is a view attested to in all sorts of ways Leisure is not understood and used, language itself that ultimate and precious human possession, is debased by the uses business and "affairs" make of it, it is more subtly and more thoroughly debased by the use which Victorian and Georgian poets made of it These facile poets, Pound is convinced, merely sweetened the air to wealthy nostrils that did not want to smell the stench that money making and interest taking created

Thus, the Cantos represent a break with the going social order and the modes of literary expression grateful to that order Pound, in a phrase he derives from the Chinese, must "make things new" The techniques of confusion, blending, and non sequitur in the poem are techniques of assault, indurated sensibility must be awakened, and new habits of direct, nonabstract apprehension must be set up Pound gathers hints from Homer, Confucius, the Provençal poets, and countless other writers who managed to be "human" By tearing apart the tapestry of the conventionally viewed past and weaving the threads into a new pattern of his own, Pound assaults in grained and complacent sensibilities in Rock Drill, for example, the agile reader must be willing to experience all stages of man's history at once, with each stage held before his attention for no more than a moment or so

Pound also startles conventional and unreflective moral tastes by expressing admiration for such "natural" monsters as Sigismundo Malatesta, whose evil was at least direct and not transmogrified into a neutral entry in a ledger One must have, in the world of the Cantos, a considerable amount of sin, but in "good" ages, unlike our age, sin and virtue declare themselves for what they are and do not masquerade as something else

Thus the organized confusion of the Cantos becomes the pattern of Pound's own outraged and crusading sensibility What the poem expresses is always clear to that sensibility If it is not clear to ours, according to the poet, so much the worse for us and our responses and our blindness Such, at any rate, is the intransigent accent of many a canto

One can, at any rate, say that Pound's long work is a representative poem which belongs to the same century as Eliot's The Waste Land and Joyce's Ulysses It also attempts to interpret a world that is on the verge of escaping all interpretation Long sections of the Cantos testify to a power with language that both W B Yeats and T S Eliot thought it worth their while to attend to Pound may or may not be a great poet, beyond question, he has been schoolmaster to a generation of poets

Defoe can justly be called the first English novelist. The three outstanding works of prose fiction before Defoe wrote were Lyly's Euphues, a courtly and philosophical work, Sidney's Arcadia, a chivalrous romance, and John Bunyan's religious and symbolic allegory, The Pilgrim's Progress. Realistic characters and the common sense point of view were Defoe's contributions to prose fiction. In The Life, Adventures and Piracies of the Famous Captain Singleton, unlike Robinson Crusoe to which it is undoubtedly inferior, character is subordinated to action. In both books Defoe relied heavily on Dampier's accounts of voyages, travelers' tales and available maps and geographies. However, the novel contains also a wealth of clearly imagined detail in its objective narrative, and two contrasted characters: the courageous, ego-centric Singleton and the shrewd pacifist, William. Here and in the rest of Defoe's fiction is the germ of the English novel.

Captain Bob Singleton was stolen as a child and reared by the gypsy who bought him. His first voyages, which began when he was twelve, were to Newfoundland. On one of these voyages the ship was captured by Turks. The Turkish vessel was subsequently captured by a Portuguese ship. After many months on shore Singleton sailed as a cabin boy from Portugal on a voyage to Goa on the Malabar coast. At this time Singleton began to learn the arts of navigation, and he also became an accomplished thief.

On the return voyage a storm drove the ship to the shore of Madagascar. There Singleton enthusiastically joined a group of malcontents who plotted the harsh captain's death, and he barely escaped hanging. However, he and twenty-six companions, with guns, tools, and provisions, were abandoned on shore. The natives were friendly and traded food with the sailors in exchange for metal charms cut out of beaten coins, as they had no knowledge of the value of currency. After exploring the island and the shore, the party was able to build a frigate and sail for the mainland.

Landing at Mozambique, they decided to trek across the entire unknown continent to the Atlantic. They began the journey with buffaloes loaded with their provisions and with some sixty captured natives as guides and bearers. Singleton was by this time their appointed leader. At first they marched only when travel by river was impossible. By hunting and foraging they survived well enough until they came to the first desert. After nine days on the desert they reached a lake, fished, and renewed their water supply. In sixteen days they completed the desert crossing and entered another fertile region where travel was easy until they came to an impassable river—possibly the Nile.

When the chief native prisoner found gold in a small stream flowing into the main river, they panned as much as they could and agreed to share it equally. After a time they built a garrisoned camp to avoid traveling in the rainy season. Protected by palisades from wild animals that roamed the region, the travelers remained there through the rainy season. On the subsequent march they almost perished while crossing a further stretch of arid land. Beyond this desert they obtained meat from a native village and soon moved into a mountainous region. While proceeding along the main valley, they were astonished to meet an Englishman who had been captured and robbed by the French. Having managed to escape inland, he had stayed in the country of friendly natives. He joined the travelers and told them where to find more gold. After two profitable years they continued on to the Gold Coast. There the party disbanded and Singleton sailed to England.

In England, during the next two years Singleton spent lavishly and was often cheated. When his money was gone, he sailed for Cadiz. Off the coast of Spain he broke his journey at the instigation of a friend and went aboard a vessel whose crew had mutinied and taken possession of the ship. Thus began Singleton's career as a pirate.

Having obtained provisions in Cadiz, the pirate ship sailed for the Canary Islands and thence to the West Indies. After the capture of a Spanish sloop, Singleton sailed aboard her and arranged to meet the other ship in Tobago. He found that the crew of a captured ship was often willing to join him. One man who did so was a Quaker surgeon named William Walters. William and Singleton became friends and the Quaker often saved him from wasteful maneuvers and bloodshed. After a meeting in Tobago the pirates arranged to cruise separately again and later to join forces in Madagascar.

In a successful engagement off Brazil, Singleton captured and took command of a forty-six gun Portuguese man of war. From the next ship captured they acquired many slaves. William persuaded Singleton and the crew not to kill these men. Instead, he sold them on the Rio Grande for gold and a fine French sloop.

Continuing the voyage, they rounded the Cape of Good Hope to land on Madagascar for provisions.

During the night which followed the sighting of a wrecked European ship on the African shore, William and the coxswain both dreamed that if they landed they would find gold. They discovered a group of their former companions who, shipwrecked on Tabago, had been taken aboard another ship and subsequently had captured several ships of their own and thereby gained much gold. The whole pirate fleet, including ships under Captain Wilmot and Captain Avery, gathered at Mangahelly. Some stayed in a camp on shore. Eventually William and Singleton sailed for Ceylon in the man of war.

Off Ceylon they captured a ship from the Mogul's court. The vessel yielded so much gold that the sailors wished to return at once to Madagascar. Together, William and Singleton persuaded them to continue the voyage.

Singleton's ambition was to capture ships from the Dutch Spice Islands. After sailing north of the Philippines they finally overtook a vessel laden with nutmegs. Unfortunately, they grounded the man of war on a group of rocks and were forced to beach and repair her. Soon after they resailed they were hit by a violent storm which shook the ship and momentarily so terrified Singleton that he believed the lightning to be the punishment from Divine Providence for his crimes. However, nobody was hurt and, with the ship only slightly damaged, they continued as before.

North of Manila three Japanese ships yielded cinnamon, nutmeg, cloves, and some gold. From there they sailed two months until they reached Formosa. By this time everybody was agreed that they were rich enough. Off the Chinese coast they made contact with merchants with whom William traded spices and cloth for gold. Then they began the long journey southward and westward home.

The vessel sailed to Java for provisions and then to Ceylon, where they had great trouble with natives who nearly ignited the ship with fire arrows. Finally, after tricking the native leaders through a Dutch interpreter who was a prisoner there, they managed to take him on board and to sail away unharmed.

William continued to trade, and when he had satisfactorily disposed of most of the booty he talked earnestly to Singleton about his crimes. Together they agreed to abandon piracy. Furthermore, Singleton said that from then on he would be under William's command. William made two more trading trips. On the second Singleton and another surgeon accompanied him in the sloop with their accumulated treasure. William sent a letter to the man of war saying that they had been captured and that they must sail away to save their own lives. The men quickly obeyed.

William and Singleton disguised themselves as Persian merchants. During this time Singleton became profoundly troubled by his conscience. William dissuaded him from suicide that they might be able to put their illegal fortunes to some good use. They traveled in caravan to Alexandria and thence sailed to Venice.

In time William wrote to his widowed sister in England. He and Singleton both sent her money to buy a house for her children and themselves. Finally, still disguised as merchants, they returned home. Singleton, whose repentance was complete, married William's sister and lived with her in great quiet and contentment.

CARMINA

Author Gaius Valerius Catullus (c. 84 c. 54 B.C.)

First transcribed c. 50 B.C.

Catullus, greatest of the Latin lyric poets, was born in Verona in northern Italy, only a few years after it had been conquered from the Celts. Some scholars believe him to have been Celtic, not only because of his name, but also because of his use of Celtic words like "basum," for "kiss," instead of the Latin "osculum."

He was one of the "New Poets," whose leader was Valerius Cato. Beginning about 90 B.C., these revolted against the conservative poets who treated only wars, history, and mythology. In their experiments with Greek meters and Greek words, under the inspiration of Sappho, Archilochus, and especially the Alexandrians, Catullus was a pioneer. One cannot know how radical his fellow poets were, for most of their work has been lost, and the poetry of Catullus survived only by chance.

During his lifetime he probably published a number of books—"libelli," the Latins called them—made by pasting together sheets of parchment or papyrus into a long strip and rolling it on a stick.

About a thousand lines constituted a book. Someone arranged all the poems of Catullus, by length rather than by subject or chronology, on one roll. It could not have been the poet himself, because the dedication provided was hardly suitable for such a volume. This roll of 116 poems was disregarded for fourteen centuries (Catullus was not an important classical poet like his friend Vergil, whose indebtedness to him is evident both in his earlier poetry and in the Aeneid, or Ovid or Martial, both of whom praised him highly). Then the roll came to light briefly in Catullus' native city in the fourteenth century, long enough for two admirers to make complete copies. After that it was lost forever, but from those two copies the world learned to admire the lyric genius of Catullus. Petrarch owned and used one copy.

After the Carmina (Poems) appeared in print, the cult of Catullus began to spread. The pious Fénelon, overlooking the Roman's occasional vulgarity and obscenity, accounted in two words for his greatness "simplicite passionée" And that has been the critical judgment of him ever since one of the supreme poets of love, a singer of ardent and sincere passion expressed with fiery earnestness, but also with simplicity

The date of Catullus' first poems cannot be determined It is known that he went to Rome when he was about twenty There he met the object of an overpowering love, a woman whom he addressed in his verses as Lesbia, a name suggested by the homeland of Sappho, whose meter he used in several of the poems Scholars later identified her as Clodia, wife of the praetor Quintus Caecilius Metellus, a highly sexed, talented, cruel beauty, described as ox eyed, even by her enemies She still had a husband when Catullus, meeting her, was so upset that he could not speak But he wrote for her one of the most famous of all love poems, in which he declared that a man becomes godlike who sits and constantly in your presence watches and hears you laugh

Possibly about this same time he courted her in a charming and well known lyric (Number 2 in his collected verse), addressed to her pet sparrow, who could be happy though its mistress and the poet were miserable and thwarted

Before he had progressed very far in his courtship, his older brother, a diplomat in the east died suddenly Perhaps he had financed Catullus' literary career in Rome Certainly the poet never mentioned his father's assistance At any rate, Catullus returned home in 60 B C Verona was not then the romantic city of Romeo and Juliet In it, the poet with no kindred spirits was frankly bored One rhyme to a friend complained that he found no poetic inspiration Another lyric begged a fellow poet to come and visit him Julius Caesar is known to have lodged with his father several times when going from his Gallic campaigns to Rome, but Catullus did not like him

time for him to get into politics, the poet secured an appointment to the staff of Memmius, Governor of Bithynia, in northern Africa, but from the evidence of Catullus' satirical poems, his superior appropriated all the art treasures and the gold All that fell to the poet was a yacht

Stranger the bark you see before you says

That in old times and in her early days
She was a lovely vessel that could make
The quickest voyages and overtake
All her competitors in sail or oar

This vessel brought him home the following year On the way he stopped to visit the tomb of his brother near the site of Troy, where he wrote one of the most beautiful of his elegiac poems (Number 101)

By ways remote and distant waters sped,
Brother, to thy sad graveside am I come
That I may give the last gifts to the dead

And vainly parley with thy ashes dumb

Take them all drenched with a brother's tear,

And, Brother for all time, hail and farewell

Back in Rome, trouble making Clodia, after her husband's suspiciously sudden death, had become the mistress of Caelius When his ardor cooled, she tried to destroy his political career by bringing all sorts of charges against him Cicero, the greatest orator of his time, defended Caelius in an oration, still existing, that completely demolished the reputation and character of Clodia But the returning Catullus still felt some of "Lesbia's" old charm, and again he wrote impassioned lyrics to her Some scholars have tried to arrange the score or more in a pattern to show the growth of their love, their quarrels, charges of infidelity reconciliations, and the final break, but their suppositions are pure guesswork There is not, for instance, any chronological clue to the shortest and most memorable poem about her (Number 85)

I hate and love You ask perhaps how that could be?

I know not, but I feel its agony

Determined to leave her, Catullus wrote (Number 8)

She devil damn you! What life's left for you?

Whom will you kiss? In whose lips set your teeth?

Stop, Catullus! It's over, don't give in

But he did write one more poem about her, in Sapphic meter, asking several friends to take her a message, "short and not kindly," bidding farewell to her and her "hundreds of lovers, whom she exhausts sexually"

Poets ever since have been inspired to translate and adapt these love lyrics Robert Herrick (1591-1633), has been called an English Catullus, though he certainly lacks the Latin poet's depth of passion.
Nearer in spirit was John Donne (1572-1631), who claimed that Catullus was only one of the "1,400 authors" the English poet had analyzed.

Among the 116 poems of Catullus are themes other than those on love. About twenty-five deal with friendship in various forms. Some, fewer but fiercer, po-etize his hates false friendship, pretension, infractions of the moral code, and corruption in high places. His dislike of Julius Caesar he expressed in the invective of Number 93. Later, however, he felt more kindly toward Caesar and made amends by praising Caesar's undoubted personal charm and military ability.

Among Catullus' works are several long poems, including two wedding hymns and two epyllia, or little epics, modeled on those of the Alexandrian poets. One, celebrating the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, includes the story of Theseus and Ariadne. The other, a translation of Callimachus' "Lock of Berenice," is one of the sources for Alexander Pope's "The Rape of the Lock."

The largest number of the Carmina of Catullus were satiric poems, sometimes with invective or humor so vulgar that they have shocked readers of later centuries. Perhaps forty-six can be considered, but those are not the verses for which Catullus will be remembered. He is immortal because of his expressions of passion and love, and for his inspired poems of sadness, which, though only a few, are enough to have made Tenny-son refer to Catullus as the tenderest of Latin poets.

Critique

The Castle of Fratta, second only to Alessandro Manzoni's The Betrothed among Italian novels of the nineteenth century, is the English title of Le Confessioni di un ottuagenario, written between December, 1857, and August, 1858, by Ippolito Nievo, one of Garibaldi's historic "Thousand." Nievo never lived to revise his work, to which he originally gave the patriotic title, Le Confessioni di un Italiano, the later change of name was made by his publisher, who thought Nievo's title too forthright for those unsettled times. The novel, a work of tremendous vigor, presents a remarkable gallery of character portraits, both real and imaginary, and tells with passionate patriotic feeling of half a century of strife that led at last to the period of the Risorgimento and the liberation of Italy. Lucilio Vianello is undoubtedly modeled after the life of Mazzini. Carlo Altoviti is a man dedicated to two great passions, his love of freedom and his love for Pisana, that lovely, wayward sensual woman capable of great loyalty and cruel betrayal. Certainly she must be listed among the notable women of Italian fiction.

Carlo Altoviti, born in Venice on the Day of St. Luke the Evangelist in 1775, spent his boyhood in the ancient, decaying castle of Fratta, the neglected, unwanted poor relation in a household of feudal gentry such as he would live to see swept away by war and revolutions.

His mother, the sister of the Countess of Fratta, had made a runaway match with an adventurer named Todero Altoviti but had deserted her husband a few months later. When her child was born, the infant had been dispatched at once to Fratta. In his childhood Carlo knew only that his mother was dead and that his father was reported to have turned Turk somewhere in the Levant.

The household at Fratta was made up of the austere, pompous count and his haughty wife, their daughters, Clara and Pisana, the count's brother, Monsignor Orlando, a stupid, gluttonous priest, the chancellor who managed the count's business affairs, Captain Sandracca, the swagging but timid captain of militia, the chaplain, and a number of hangers on and servants. Carlo's place was a menial one, and he spent most of his time in the cavernous, gloomy kitchen with the retainers. Sometimes he slipped away to play with his cousin Pisana, who even as a child was a creature of whims and passions, contradictions and loyalties, in later years she was to make Carlo's life a torment and a delight. The older daughter, Clara, was a grave, lovely girl who devoted herself to the care of her bedridden grandmother, Lady Badoer. It was Clara who drew the young men of the Friuli region to Fratta. Among these were Giulio del Ponte, a writer of graceful verses, Lucilio Vianello, a medical student, and Alberto Partistagno, a young man of noble family.

once rescued young Carlo from the marshes, was the friend of Antonio Provedoni, the mayor of the commune. When Antonio's son Leopardo courted Doretta, daughter of the chancellor of Venchieredo, he was set upon by some bullies of Venchieredo and the Spacca fumo rescued him. The Count of Venchieredo charged that the chaplain of Fratta had sheltered the bandit and he then laid siege to Fratta; his real purpose was to secure some incriminating documents that a retainer at Fratta possessed. His plan was thwarted by Lucilio Vianello, who put the castle in a state of defense, and by Partistagno, who arrived with his retainers to put the men of Venchieredo to rout. Later Carlo saved the documents from theft. The Count of Venchieredo was sentenced to ten years in prison. With Venchieredo humbled, Leopardo was free to marry Doretta.

When the news of the French Revolution reached Venice and men began to dream of a new kind of freedom, the Inquisition of State began a reign of terror. Seeing troubled times ahead, Almorò Frumier, a Venetian senator and kinsman of the Count of Fratta, moved with his family to Portogruaro. There the people of Fratta went frequently to visit, and Carlo, now an acknowledged member of the family, went with them. The boy was often thrown into moods of depression as Pisana revealed her flirtatious nature among the young gallants of the region. Clara was kinder to him than ever, but Pisana paid no attention to his bitterness and gloom.

For relief, Carlo turned to his studies so earnestly that the count decided to send him to Padua to study for his doctor's degree. About the same time Raimondo di Venchieredo, son of the disgraced castellan, returned to his nearby castle and Pisana began to pay attention to the young nobleman. Meanwhile, Clara was being courted by a number of aristocratic dandies. The countess tried to arrange a match between young Ven-chieredo and Clara, however, the alliance was unacceptable to Venetian authorities. Partistagno became Clara's accepted suitor, but she refused him, people said that she was really in love with Lucilio. When the countess took her daughter to Venice, Lucilio after taking his degree at Padua, settled there also.

Carlo, on a scholarship, went to Padua to study shortly before the French invaded Italy. Returning to Fratta for a visit, he found Pisana now a beautiful woman, demanding admiration from all. Her chief aim was Giulio del Ponte Baci in Padua, Carlo came under the influence of Amilcare Dossi, a young man of liberal political views, and became an ardent Voltairian. Then word came that the old chancellor had died at Fratta, leaving affairs disordered, Carlo returned to take over his duties. Clara entered the Convent of St. Therese. The old count died and Pisana went to Venice.

One day news arrived that a young French general, Napoleon Bonaparte, had taken command of the Army of the Alps. Within a few months he controlled the fate of Italy. The people of Fratta fled as the French advanced. Returning from a trip to Portogruaro, Carlo found Fratta deserted and looted and old Lady Badoer dying as the result of French atrocities. When Carlo went to Urbino to protest, Napoleon refused to listen to his story.

A change came in Carlo's fortunes when his father returned unexpectedly to Venice. Grown wealthy in trade, he planned to establish a family of social and political prestige. His hopes failed when Venice capitulated to the French in 1797. The fall of the patricians completed the ruin of the Frattas. Pisana gave in to her mother's urgings and married an aged kinsman, Mauro Nava. Lucilio begged Clara to marry him, but she refused to return to a world that had no respect for God and the Church. When the French turned Venice over to Austria, Carlo prepared to take refuge in the Cisalpine Republic. His father returned to the Levant after giving him a letter of credit on Apostulos, a Greek banker. Pisana became Carlo's mistress and lived with him until he was forced to flee the city. In Milan he learned that Aglaura Apostulos, his companion in his flight, was his half sister.

Carlo fought with the Cisalpine Legion under Ettore Carafa, who became Pisana's lover. When English and Russian troops entered Naples, Carafa was captured and hanged. Carlo, Lucilio, and Pisana escaped aboard a Portuguese ship to Genoa. After the battle of Marengo, Carlo served as Secretary of Finances at Ferrara. Returning to Fratta after the Peace of Pressburg, Carlo married Aquilina Provedoni, two children were born to them. Later he fought under General

Pepe against the Austrians. Captured, he was sentenced to death but was later pardoned. Accompanied by Pisana, he went to London. There he lost his sight, restored to him through an operation performed by Lucilio Pisana, who had begged in the streets in order to provide for Carlo during his illness, died.

Carlo returned to Venice in 1823 and engaged in trade until he and Aquilina returned to the Friuli in 1848. Aquilina died soon afterward. At last Carlo found courage to return to the site of the Castle of Fratta. Only a few stones remained of the place so full of memories of the past. Writing his memoirs, he realized that these were memories of sweetness as well as grief.

Critique

Even the most ardent Jonsonian are unlikely to agree with the author in giving this tragedy place above the great comedies of Jonson's prime, though certainly there is much to respect and admire in it. To Jonson, historical accuracy was evidently a major merit of his tragedies, and they are based on diligent research. Catiline was drawn chiefly from Sallust's Catiline, Cicero's Orations, and Plutarch's Lives, but poets as well as historians furnished source material. The Prologue with Sulla's ghost is modeled on Seneca's Thyestes, and various passages in the play recall Statius, Lucan, and other classical poets. Both Sejanus and Catiline have been called "studies in statecraft," and they have been wisely considered as the tragedies of a nation rather than of individuals. Most readers and audiences prefer emphasis on individuals in tragedy, hence Jonson's tragedies have not aroused the enthusiasm their excellent workmanship deserves Jonson's use of the Chorus in Catiline is noteworthy. Whether this Chorus, like Shakespeare's in Henry V, is a single speaker, or whether it is a group speaking in unison is not clear from the text. The latter would probably appeal more to a lover of the classics like Jonson, therefore, it is assumed that the Chorus is a group of substantial Roman citizens speaking in concert. In plot character drawing, and poetry, the appeal of Catiline is more to the intellect than to the emotions. Both the sculptural veise and the characterization foreshadow Milton, whose council in Hell recalls the deliberation of the conspirators.

Under the sinister influence of Sulla's ghost, the reckless patrician Catiline organized a conspiracy to overthrow the Roman Republic. The conspirators, including the rash Cethegus and outcast senators Lentulus and Curius, gathered at Catiline's home. Catiline and his wife pandered to the weaknesses of each and skillfully manipulated them without allowing them to realize that they were his puppets. The conspirators concluded their meeting with a gruesome sacrament, pledging faith by drinking the blood of a newly slaughtered slave. The first step in their plan was to have Catiline elected as one of the two consuls. When four of the candidates withdrew in favor of Catiline, leaving only three men in the race, success seemed very probable. The two remaining candidates were Antonius, impecunious and lukewarm, and Cicero, a "new man" but a dangerous antagonist.

A Chorus of Roman citizens gathered and discussed the uncertainty of the survival of great national powers, which often seem to carry in themselves seeds of their destruction. Luxuries and vices soften nations and leave them easy prey to their own malcontents or alien invaders.

Fulvia, the profligate wife of an elderly fool, numbered among her lovers the conspirator Curius and Julius Caesar, the latter on a very casual basis. Since she was interested in wealth, not romance, she forbade her servants to admit the down-at-heels Curius on future visits. While being readied for her social day, she was visited by Sempronia, a feminine bluestocking politician well past the bloom of youth. Sempronia was an eager supporter of the patrician Catiline and a scorner of 'that talker, Cicero' who presumed to be more learned and eloquent than the nobility. When Curius arrived to interrupt their gossip, Sempronia overrode Fulvia's objections, ushered him in, and made great play of leaving the lovers alone. Fulvia's reception of Curius was so hostile that he became enraged and dropped threats and hints of future greatness and power. Fulvia immediately shifted to Delilah's tactics and wheedled his secret from him.

The Chorus gathered before the election and prayed for wisdom to choose consuls worthy of Rome's great past. Antonius and Cicero won the election, shocking and infuriating Catiline and his party. Cato praised Cicero warmly but Caesar and other sympathizers with Catiline regarded the new consul with veiled hostility or open contempt. Catiline masked his fury in public, but in private he planned rebellion and civil war. Fulvia, partly through self interest and partly through a vain dislike of playing second fiddle to Sempronia, carried information about the conspiracy to Cicero. Using her information to intimidate Curius and appealing to his greed, Cicero won him as a spy in Catiline's inner circle. Fulvia served the same purpose among the feminine conspirators. Alone, Cicero bemoaned the low estate of Rome, which was reduced to dependence on such tools as Fulvia and Curius for safety. He strengthened his position still further by giving a province to Antonius.

Caesar showed Catiline favor and gave him advice, but did not join the assemblage of conspirators. At the conspirators' next meeting, plans were laid for setting fire to the city at strategic points and starting local uprisings to be timed with invasion from outside. The first move was to be the murder of Cicero that very night. The feminine conspirators entered with Catiline's wife Aurelia. Under cover of their excited chatter, Curius whispered to Fulvia the plan to assassinate Cicero. She left the meeting and warned Cicero in time for him to gather protecting friends and impartial witnesses. Although the attempt on Cicero's life failed, the threat of civil violence terrified senators and citizens. The Chorus expressed horror at the danger, which seemed brought about by the city's guilt.

In the Senate, Cicero delivered an impassioned oration against Catiline and disclosed knowledge of intimate details of the conspiracy. Catiline lost control of himself, threatened Cicero and Rome, and left to join his army outside the city. Lentulus and Cethegus remained in charge of the internal organization of the conspirators. Cato warned Cicero of the danger from Caesar and other concealed supporters of Catiline, but Cicero chose to avoid a break with them. He persuaded the ambassadors from the Allobroges, who had been approached by Catiline's men, to pretend to join the conspiracy and to secure incriminating documents. When the ambassadors were arrested, as prearranged, a conspirator taken with them turned state's evidence to save his life. With the evidence of the conspirator and the ambassadors, the Senate approved the arrest and execution of the conspirators remaining in Rome, though Caesar tried to save their lives. Caesar was accused by Curius, but Cicero chose to pretend that this dangerous man was innocent, allowing him to remain alive and uncurbed.

After the execution of the conspirators, the leader of the Roman forces arrived and reported the defeat of Catiline and his "brave bad death" while leading his troops. Honored and rewarded by the Senate and the Roman people, Cicero pronounced thanks for Rome's rescue.

Critique

Cecilia, or, Memoirs of an Heiress is a blend of wit, sentiment, and morality. If, as has been charged, Fanny Burney's writing is marred by caricature and priggishness, it cannot be denied that she had a real gift for maintaining the interest of her readers. Seen in historical perspective, Miss Burney merits credit for being one of the writers who made the novel respectable. She also has a special literary significance in having influenced Jane Austen, whose Pride and Prejudice

(1813) got its title from a sentence in Cecilia

The Story

Cecilia Beverley, just short of her majority, was left ten thousand pounds by her father and an annual income of three thousand pounds by her uncle, the latter inheritance being restricted by the condition that her husband take her name. Until her coming of age, she was expected to live with one of her guardians, the fashionable spendthrift Mr. Harrel, husband of a girlhood friend. One who warned her against the evils of London was Mr. Monckton, her clever and unscrupulous counselor, whose secret intention to marry Cecilia was at present prevented by the existence of an old and ill tempered wife, whom he had married for money.

The constant round of parties in London and the dissipation of the Harrels were repugnant to Cecilia. Kind but unimpressive Mr. Arnott, Mrs. Harrel's brother, fell hopelessly in love with the girl, but Harrel obviously intended her for his friend, insolent Sir Robert Floyer, whom Cecilia detested. After vainly begging Harrel to pay a bill, which Arnott finally paid, Cecilia became so disgusted with the Harrels' way of life that she decided to leave their household. But she found the abode of her miserly guardian, Mr. Briggs, so comfortless, and was so repulsed by the pride and condescension of her third guardian, Mr. Delvile, that she decided to remain with the Harrels.

At a masquerade party she was pursued by a man disguised as the devil. He was Monckton in disguise, his aim being to keep others away from her. She was rescued first by a Don Quixote and later by a domino whose conversation pleased her greatly. At first she believed the domino was Mr. Belfield, a young man she had met before. Later she was surprised to learn that Don Quixote was Belfield.

so that a duel resulted and Belfield was wounded. A young man, courteously attentive to Cecilia, proved to be the domino and Mortimer Delvile, the only son of her guardian and the pride and hope of his family, whose fortune he was to recoup by marriage. Cecilia visited his mother and was charmed by her graciousness and wit. She was disturbed, however, by the knowledge that she was universally believed to be betrothed to either Sir Robert or Belfield. Monckton, feeling that only the Delviles were a threat to him, attempted to destroy her friendship for them.

Cecilia met and immediately liked Henrietta Belfield. When she visited her new friend, she found Henrietta nursing her wounded brother, whom Mortimer wished to aid. Seeing Cecilia there, Mortimer believed that she was in love with Belfield. Having been educated above his station, Belfield had grown to feel contempt for business. He was clever and pleasant but unable to settle down to anything.

Although Cecilia had refused Sir Robert's proposal, she still saw that Harrel was bent on the marriage. Monckton's constant warnings against the Delviles disturbed her, for she was now in love with Mortimer. Knowing his father's pride, however, she determined to conquer her feelings.

Cecilia, who had previously discharged some debts for Harrel, was now so alarmed by his threats of suicide that she pledged herself to a total of seven thousand additional pounds. Since Briggs would not advance the money she was forced to borrow from a usurer.

Mortimer, learning that Cecilia loved neither Sir Robert nor Belfield, betrayed his own love for her—and then avoided her. Cecilia discovered that Henrietta had also fallen in love with Mortimer. Mrs. Belfield, believing that Cecilia loved her son, constantly urged him to propose marriage to her.

Cecilia lent another thousand pounds to Harrel, who was to escape his cred itors by leaving the country Meanwhile, his wife was to live with her brother until Cecilia's house was ready Harrel shot himself, however, leaving a note for Cecilia in which he revealed that her marriage to Sir Robert was to have canceled a gambling debt

Monckton discharged Cecilia's debt with the usurer, she was to repay him on coming of age Against his wishes she went with the Delvile to their castle Only Mrs Delvile was agreeable there The family was too proud to encourage visitors, and Mortimer still avoided Cecilia Much later, during a thunderstorm in which he contracted a fever, he betrayed his true emotions Cecilia was puzzled and hurt, the more so when Mrs Delvile, who had guessed the feelings of both Mortimer and Cecilia, let Cecilia know that they were not for each other Mortimer, before going away for his health, told Cecilia that his family would never accept the change of name clause in the will

Cecilia then went to live with an old friend There she was surprised to see Mortimer's dog, sent, she discovered later, as a joke, unknown to the Delvile She spoke aloud of her love for its master, and turned to discover Mortimer beside her She agreed to a secret wedding, but Monckton, chosen as their confidant, persuaded her of the wrongness of the act

Cecilia went on to London with the intention of breaking off the match But discovery made her feel she was compromised, and she agreed to go through with the wedding She could not continue however, after a disguised woman interrupted the ceremony Later Mrs Delvile, whose family pride exceeded her love for Cecilia, made her promise to give up Mortimer She renounced him in a passionate scene during which Mrs Delvile burst a blood vessel Cecilia consoled her misery by acts of charity which Monckton, feeling that she was squandering his money, tried in vain to prevent

with the Moncktons There she discharged her debt to Monckton Abused by Mr Delvile, she was sure that some one had slandered her When Cecilia went to visit Henrietta, Mr Delvile, having just heard Mrs Belfield say that Cecilia loved her son, saw her there and had his suspicions of her impurity confirmed

Mrs Harrel and Henrietta moved with Cecilia into her new home Mortimer came to tell her that both his parents were agreed that if she would renounce her uncle's fortune, he would marry her, though she would have only the ten thousand pounds inherited from her father Mr Delvile knew, however, that she had already lost her father's money Enraged at his father's treachery, Mortimer was determined to marry Cecilia, even though she was portionless She agreed, but only if his mother would consent Again a secret wedding was planned, this time with Mrs Delvile's approbation They were married, Cecilia returned to her house, and Mortimer went to inform his father

A woman Cecilia had befriended identified Mrs Monckton's companion as the person who had stopped the first wedding Mortimer was prevented from telling his father of the marriage by the scandals with which Delvile charged Cecilia On learning that the slanderer was Monckton, Mortimer fought and wounded him, and was forced to flee

The man who was to inherit Cecilia's fortune, since her husband had not taken her name, demanded his rights Cecilia determined to join her husband Mrs Harrel took Henrietta with her to Arnott's house Cecilia hoped that Henrietta, as miserable in her hopeless love for Mortimer as Arnott was in his for Cecilia, would comfort and be comforted by him

In London, Cecilia consulted Belfield about her trip Mrs Belfield, hoping to get her son married to Cecilia, had left them alone when Mortimer entered The meeting seemed to confirm his father's accusations, and he sent her to wait for him at his father's house Mr Delvile refused to admit her Wild with fear that Mortimer would fight a duel with Belfield, she began a distracted search for her husband Fevered, delirious, and alone, she was locked up by strangers When Mortimer, convinced of her purity by Belfield, found her, she was too sick to know him

After many days of uncertainty, Cecilia eventually recovered Monckton also was out of danger and grudgingly admitted that he had deliberately lied to Mr Delvile about Cecilia's moral character Mr Delvile then accepted her as his daughter

ter Mrs Delvile recovered her health Mrs Harrel married again and resumed her life of careless frivolity Arnott and Henrietta married With Mortimer's help, Belfield finally settled down to an army career Monckton lived on in bitterness and misery Cecilia was willed a fortune by Mortimer's aunt, so impressed was she by Cecilia's unselfishness and sweetness Cecilia was then able to continue her charities, though never extravagantly She did occasionally regret the loss of her own fortune, but wisely recognized that life cannot be absolutely perfect

The Chainbearer, or, The Littlepage Manuscripts, is the second novel in James Fenimore Cooper's anti-rent trilogy Told through Mordaunt Littlepage, it combines Cooper's insight into social conditions with his dramatic writing style The novel suffers from Cooper's consistent weaknesses lack of subtlety, stereotyped and wooden characters, and extreme romanticism At the same time it is fast moving, clearly written, and enjoyable reading Much of the characterization is too obvious to be considered good literature, but the author's treatment of the relationship between landlord and renter is excellent, although heavily slanted toward the landlord's viewpoint Like most romantic novels, good and bad are at loggerheads through out the work Equally romantic the good wins out in the end Cooper's faithful surefooted Indian plays an important role on the side of good

Mordaunt Littlepage, son of Cornelius Littlepage, of Satanstoe was at Princeton for six years studying for his bachelor of arts degree during most of the Revolutionary War Upon graduation, he served in his father's battalion at the siege of Yorktown and there met sixty seven year old Captain Andries Coejemans a skilled woodsman and known as Chainbearer because he carried the forward chain in the surveying work he did as a civilian Mordaunt himself attained the rank of captain by the time of Cornwallis' surrender

Mordaunt formed a strong attachment to the hale old man and at the close of the war Chainbearer suggested that Mordaunt meet Dus Malbone, his orphaned niece The captain thought that she would make a fine wife for his young friend, but Mordaunt, determined to remain unattached, returned home Chainbearer went back to his civilian occupation, which was considered an ordinary laboring job

Traveling back to Lilacs bush, Mordaunt and his aged servant, colored Jaap, were low in funds because by that time the continental currency was practically worthless On one occasion they stopped at an inn where Jaap performed and collected plenty of money for their lodging After stopping at Lilacs bush, Mordaunt and Kate, his youngest sister, rode on to Satanstoe to visit their grandmother During the ride Kate told Mordaunt that she hoped to marry Tom Bayard, whom they would meet at Satanstoe, where he was visiting with his sister Priscilla, Kate's good friend Kate had hoped that Mordaunt would fall in love with Priscilla Mordaunt's grandmother was also conniving to have him fall in love with Priscilla Bayard

Mordaunt found that Priscilla as beautiful and intelligent as his sister had promised, was outspoken in her independence and also free in her opinions, which always found Mordaunt in perfect agreement Tom, her brother, was rather conservative in his beliefs but Tom and Mordaunt respected each other Mordaunt readily gave his consent to his sister's marriage

After a short time Mordaunt announced that he was to travel to Ravensnest, land that his grandfather, Herman Mordaunt, had left him, and that he was to be gone for the entire winter Before they parted, however Mordaunt learned that Priscilla was a schoolfriend of Dus, Chainbearer's niece and had the highest opinion of her The two discussed the qualities of Dus and Chainbearer who had been hired to contract for all the surveying work at Ravensnest

Mordaunt went with Jaap to Ravensnest It was to be Mordaunt's first visit to the wilderness tract Jaap had been there several times previously with Mordaunt's father Chainbearer was already on the ground and surveying the land into small plots for rental At the Bridge Inn it was learned that he was working with Dus and her half brother, Frank Malbone Before reaching Ravensnest, Mordaunt heard a beautiful Indian song sung, as he learned later, by Dus, and he met Susquesus, a faithful Indian hunter who had served Mordaunt's father years before Susquesus was a good friend of old Chainbearer

Putting on clothes less fitting a gentleman, Mordaunt with the Indian went to Ravensnest village to learn something of the people there He learned that a town meeting had been called, with Squire Jason Newcome presiding Newcome, a powerful and highly respected man, prodded the crowd to vote for the erection of a Congregational rather than a Presbyterian church Mordaunt watched the proceedings with contempt The men of the town raised the pike poles of the church with the help of a

Chainbearer welcomed Mordaunt to Ravensnest and took him to the hut where he lived when he was not out surveying. There Mordaunt met Dus for the first time. She seemed ashamed to meet him and said that she had been working with her uncle; she considered herself below Mordaunt because of her work. Mordaunt convinced her that she was his equal.

Mordaunt made Frank Malbone his agent, replacing Squire Newcome, who had proved himself untrustworthy. This work assured Frank of a good living. Newcome was given a new rental lease to which, it was explained, he had no right other than the liberality of his landlord.

When Chainbearer took Mordaunt to see the land he had surveyed, Dus accompanied them. By that time Mordaunt had fallen in love with her, as he told her one evening. Dus answered that her affections were tied to another. Mordaunt left the hut and that night slept on the open ground.

The next morning Mordaunt found Susquesus camped nearby. The Indian brought word that a hidden sawmill was being illegally operated on Littlepage land. Following his guide, Mordaunt came upon the sawmill of Aaron Timberman, called Thousandacres. Not knowing that his white guest was Mordaunt Littlepage, Thousandacres welcomed him. Later Mordaunt made himself known and was thrown, a prisoner, into the storehouse. Susquesus made his escape, however, and informed Jaap of Mordaunt's capture before returning to aid the prisoner. Captured by several of Thousandacres' sons, the Indian was also imprisoned in the storehouse. Meanwhile, Mordaunt learned that Thousandacres and his sons, Tobit and Zephaniah, like most squatters, would have nothing to do with the law. Lowiny, the daughter, proved friendly to Mordaunt and did not think that he should be kept a prisoner. From his place of confinement Mordaunt watched Squire Newcome visit the mill and offer to buy the timber at a lower price than Thousandacres demanded, for, as Newcome insisted, the Littlepages were sure to discover the mill before long. Thousandacres sent Newcome away as soon as possible.

That night Lowiny came to the storehouse bringing food. The next morning Chainbearer appeared and, while trying to open the door of the storehouse, was seized and confined with Mordaunt and Susquesus. Dus, hiding nearby, sent Zephaniah a letter saying that she would not now have him as a husband.

At a family council Thousandacres tried to bargain with Chainbearer but the old man refused to be disloyal to the Littlepage family. Thousandacres then threw Chainbearer back into the storehouse, leaving Mordaunt in the house with Lowiny. The girl helped him to escape while her father and brothers were otherwise occupied. Thousandacres, looking for Mordaunt, found him with Dus who had just confessed her love to him. Returned to the clearing, Dus was held in the house and Mordaunt was returned to the storehouse.

At another family gathering to which Mordaunt and Chainbearer were summoned, Thousandacres attempted to coerce Dus into marrying Zephaniah. Dus refused, however, and Chainbearer became extremely angry at the suggestion. As the angry old man, his arm around Dus, tried to leave the room, someone fired a shot and Chainbearer fell, mortally wounded. Chainbearer, dying on the bed to which he had been carried, said that death was not a bad thing. He told Dus and Mordaunt, who sat by his bedside, that they must follow whatever course their hearts directed, even though he felt that Dus should not marry above her station.

Suddenly rifle shots sounded outside. Frank Malbone, informed by Jaap of his master's capture, had arrived at the head of a rescuing posse. During the attack

Thousandacres was mortally wounded. His sons and the other squatters fled into the forest. Thousandacres was given a respectable burial, and his widow was allowed to remove her personal effects from the cabin. Lowiny, who had been friendly with Dus, decided to stay with her.

The business of the squatters settled, Chambearer's body was taken back to Ravensnest for burial. There they found Kate, Tom and Priscilla Bayard, and Mordaunt's parents who had come to pay tribute to Chambearer after receiving news of his death. Chambearer was buried with simple but sincere dignity and honor.

Dus, introduced to the Littlepages and now convinced that she was their equal, agreed to marry Mordaunt. Lowiny decided to live with them and be their maid. Priscilla Bayard found herself attracted to Frank Malbone and later they decided to get married. Susquesus, amply supplied by the Littlepages, continued to live at Ravensnest. Jaap, who had become the Indian's good friend, decided to stay with him. The two lived happily together for many years.

Squire Newcome continued his knavery for many years, but in the end he died poor and in debt.

Mordaunt and Dus had a happy marriage, and she gave her husband a child within a year. Feeling deeply indebted to Chambearer for their happiness, the Littlepages erected a monument at his grave. From then on he was known as Uncle Chambearer, and his friends remembered him always with affection.

Critique

Despite its pointless title and a trivial, rather coarse secondary plot, The Changeling is generally considered the masterpiece of those plays written by Middleton and Rowley in collaboration. Its virtues far outweigh its faults, and the two great characterizations of Beatrice and De Flores are alone enough to lift the drama above the level of the commonplace. De Flores, especially, in his intensity of aim, singleness of devotion, and brutality of cynicism is a creation worthy of Shakespeare himself. The main plot has usually been credited to Middleton, with the exception of the opening and concluding scenes Rowley's contribution, a distinctly doubtful one in this case, is mainly connected with the minor plot, which, mercifully, is as brief as it is tasteless.

Alsemero, after glimpsing Beatrice at church, expressed to himself the hope that he could gain her hand in marriage Outside, in the street, his musings were interrupted by Jasperino To the latter's surprise, he learned that Alsemero, whose enthusiasm for travel was common knowledge, had become reluctant to undertake a projected voyage to Malta While they were talking, Beatrice entered accompanied by Diaphanta, and the four talked in friendly fashion But the mood of Beatrice changed when she was angered by the arrival of De Flores, her father's servant, to whom she had a seemingly unconquerable aversion She made no effort to hide her feelings from De Flores, who, nevertheless, remained unabashed and continued to follow her about

Vermadero, Beatrice's father, passed by and met Alsemero for the first time He was pleased to learn that the young man was the son of an old friend of his, a battle companion now dead To Alsemero he gave an invitation to visit the castle of which Vermadero was governor The invitation was eagerly accepted, but Alsemero's pleasure turned to dismay when he learned of Vermadero's determination to wed Beatrice to Alonzo De Piracquo within the next seven days As they started for the castle, Beatrice dropped one of her gloves In disdain she threw its mate after it rather than accept the glove from the hands of De Flores, who had picked it up and offered it to her

Meanwhile, in another part of Alicante, Alibius was giving instructions to his servant Lollo Alibius, a doctor, made Lollo promise to keep an eye on Isabella, the former's much younger wife The doctor's establishment, which included facilities for the care of madmen and fools, soon increased with the arrival of a new patient Antonio, enamored of Isabella, had chosen to pose as an idiot so that he could be near her Lollo in interrogated Antonio in an effort to establish his degree of stupidity, but Antonio cleverly parried the servant's questions

nicated with each other and arranged a secret meeting De Flores, coming to announce the arrival of Beatrice's suitor, Alonzo, was cruelly railed at but he equably prolonged the interview in order to be in Beatrice's presence His doggedness aroused in her a vague presentiment of evil, which was quickly dismissed when she rallied herself to face Alonzo He and her father reluctantly agreed to her request for a three day postponement of the wedding Her behavior prompted Alonzo's brother, Tomaso, to utter the warning that Beatrice was not in love, but Alonzo shrugged off any intimation that the marriage was not wise

Beatrice and Alsemero confessed their mutual affection Beatrice, however, refused her lover's offer to engage Alonzo in a duel because she feared that his death or punishment would be the result of such an affair Instead, she suggested another scheme to get rid of Alonzo, with De Flores serving as a possible tool through whom to work her will Seeking him out, she gained his consent to help her, but she did not know the price which he expected her to pay Fate took a hand in their plotting when Alonzo presently asked De Flores to guide him about the castle's obscure maze of passageways De Flores cozened Alonzo into disarming then killed him with a rapier previously hidden behind a door Before disposing of the body, he cut off a finger adorned by a diamond ring

Back at the house of Alibius, Isabella complained to Lollo about the strict watch under which she was kept Out of curiosity, she prevailed upon him to let her visit the quarters reserved for the madmen and fools There she met Francisco who, like Antonio, was one of the gentlemen from the castle of Alicante with amorous designs upon Isabella He managed to convey his feelings to her, and she reflected that, after all, a lady need not leave her home if she has any desire to stray from virtue Lollo, infected by all this romantic intriguing, forgot his master's commission and made

advances to Isabella, but she repulsed him

De Flores, to prove that he had done her bidding, brought the finger of the murdered Alonzo to Beatrice. Refusing her offer of gold, he threatened her with exposure for her part in the crime if she refused to reward him with her love. Beatrice, twist and turn as she tried, could find no avenue of escape from his relentless blackmail, and eventually she yielded to his desires.

Vermadero misunderstood the sudden disappearance of Alonzo, angered, he allowed his daughter to make a hasty marriage to Alsemero. Nevertheless, he began to wonder about the prolonged absence from the castle of Antonio and Franciscus, and they were sent for, to be questioned about Alonzo. A few hours before her wedding night, Beatrice began to fear Alsemero's discovery that she was no longer a maid. Pleading timidity, she persuaded Diaphanta, who was still a virgin, to act as her substitute in Alsemero's bed during the early part of the night. Diaphanta was far from displeased at being asked for this favor, even without the gold with which her mistress promised to reward her.

Elaborate nuptial celebrations had been planned for Beatrice and Alsemero. As part of the entertainment, Vermadero had requested Alibius to rehearse some of his madmen and fools so that they might perform a weird dance for the amusement of the assembly. Alibius decided that he would let Isabella accompany him to the castle for that event. Meanwhile that lady, attracted to Antonio, disguised herself briefly as a madwoman in order to converse with him. Lollo played a prank on Antonio and Franciscus by pretending, to each, that Isabella would reward him for getting rid of the other.

Diaphanta, pretending to be Beatrice, amorously overstayed her time with Alsemero, so that her impatient mistress became first dismayed, then suspicious, and at last vengeful. At the suggestion of De Flores, she agreed to Diaphanta's death. A fire was set, to create confusion and arouse Diaphanta from the marriage bed. The unfortunate girl was followed to her own bedroom and slain by De Flores.

By that time Franciscus and Antonio had been apprehended and charged with the murder of Alonzo, since it was learned that they had entered Alibius' house in disguise on the very day of Alonzo's disappearance. But Beatrice and De Flores finally brought about their own undoing. Discovery of their secret meetings, by Alsemero, made him suspicious. Under his questioning, Beatrice broke down and confessed. Although she pleaded her love for him as an excuse for the crime, Alsemero, shocked, took her and De Flores into custody. But the pair were unwilling to face trial. De Flores gave Beatrice a fatal wound and then stabbed himself, unmoved by his fate and unrepentant to the last.

Charles Demailly originally published as Les Hommes de Lettres, is among the early works of the Goncourt brothers whose novels were of great importance in the development of naturalism. Their joined effort to convey contemporary life in all its details is shown here in a realistic dissection of the world of letters, and their interest in the secrets behind man's behavior and in the undiscovered or overrefined aspects of both personality and society led them to depict the impact of this world on a hypersensitive young writer. The course of the story is interwoven with discussions from many points of view on art and literature.

A new kind of literary world came into being in Paris during the mid nineteenth century. This world was that of the journals, the little newspapers which thrived on gossip and superficial aesthetic criticism by creating, or catering to, the shifting fads of the fashionable world yet debasing tastes through a concentration on personality, modishness, and sensationalism.

Two young men among the writers for Scandal, one of these journals, were thoroughly immersed in their world. Nachette, a belligerent, clever man who had fled his father's bad name in his home province, enjoyed the power, which he felt the journals possessed, to create or ruin a reputation. Couturat, hiding behind a mask of innocence and gaiety, was a thorough opportunist. Also among the group was Charles Demailly, who disliked these dilettantes and their trivial gossiping but seemed unable to do anything more than observe them ironically as he accompanied them to cafés, salons, and balls.

Charles, after many illnesses as a child, had grown up a nervous and acutely sensitive young man. The heightened perceptivity of all his senses extended to an unusual awareness of emotional nuances in those around him. This oversensitivity, however, kept him from finding satisfaction in real life. His search for perfection always met his uncanny ability to perceive imperfection. Pleasure for him paled at the slightest false note. Even in writing, his real refuge, his hypersensitivity was a handicap, for his meticulously keen observation and attention to detail almost precluded true depth and greatness.

A letter from an old friend, Chavannes, urged Charles to visit him in the country and settle down to serious writing. Although Charles declined the invitation, he did shut himself up to work on his novel. At last his book, La Bourgeoise, was finished, but his late friends of Scandal, irritated because he had deserted them and jealous of his potential success, decided to harm him. Scarcely bothering to read the book, they ignored its attempt to convey psychological reality. Instead they used the title as an excuse to generalize wittily on it as an inept social document. Full of anguish at this criticism, Charles wandered about the streets until he met Boisroger, a poet who cared nothing for the fripperies of society. Seeing the worth of the novel, he introduced Charles to a circle of men who were truly artists in various fields. Charles, happy among these vivid, intelligent people, admired greatly their individualism and their informed opinions on art and literature.

Charles' uncle died, leaving him feeling bereft. A discussion of the nature of love led some of his friends to assert that the artist cannot be a true husband or lover; other men seek in love what the artist finds only in creation.

These two factors may have predisposed Charles to fall in love himself as a protest against the loneliness which his friends felt inevitable. At the theater he saw a charming young ingénue, Marthe, and fell violently in love with her. At last he met her at a masquerade ball. Three months later they were married.

For a time they created a blissful world

in which only they existed Marthe entranced Charles with her affection and endearing, childlike ways Charles worked secretly on a play whose heroine captured Marthe's coquettish innocence Finding his hidden work, Marthe was enraptured by it because the role was so well suited to her Charles, delighted by her appreciation, failed to look beneath the surface and assumed in his idealization of her, that she was actually the character he had created

After Marthe had read an article by the now fashionable Nachette, criticizing Charles' work, she suggested that he find a collaborator to help him with the play Realizing that she cared only for his reputation and its effect on her own, and not for his work, Charles began to see her as she really was an insensitive chatter box, full of false sentiment and other people's ideas Marthe, too, had tired of her sweet role Now she tried another the woman who despises her husband for the love he bears her, who delights in violent changes of mood and becomes wholly self absorbed

His distress at his disillusionment and Marthe's behavior made Charles ill and the couple went to stay at a provincial spa so that he might recover Charles rejoiced in the placid beauty of the country Marthe, bored, posed as the martyred wife Refusing to leave, she showed her pique in subtle ways Her banality and insincerity further tortured Charles, but the growing knowledge that she no longer loved him was even worse, for it threatened to destroy what remained of the image he had created

At a country fete they met the group from Scandal and the visitors returned to dine with them Nachette, however, stayed on for a week Shortly afterward a mock play in which a sweet ingenue was held prisoner by a neurasthenic appeared in Scandal Charles was hurt, not by the silly play but by knowing that Marthe had deliberately created the impression on which it was based

Paris There, however, events combined to break him down again He first discovered that his wife had borrowed money, ostensibly because he was a madman who never gave her any In retaliation for his indignation at her falsehoods she announced that she was leaving her role in his play, which had gone into rehearsal At length trying to create a scene, she told him that she loved Nachette When he refused to give her the opportunity for histrionics, she walked out

Next day she returned, stricken with remorse, and almost succeeded in captivating Charles again by her winsome affection For two weeks she behaved as if they were again on their honeymoon Then she asked to have her role back When Charles refused, saying truthfully that it was too late for any change before the opening night, she broke into a furious tirade, saying that she had never loved him and that she had spread stories to dishonor him Overcome with anguish, Charles wept When she laughed at his tears, he ran into the street At last he acquired enough self control to return and order her out of the house

When Marthe left, however, she took the letters Charles had once written to her while gaily parodying some of his friends in the inner circle of artists into which he had been welcomed Really innocuous, when lifted out of context and changed slightly they looked like malicious attempts to scoff at his friends Marthe, unable to bear the thought that her husband's play might be a success without her, believed that if these influential gentlemen were offended, they might somehow contribute to its ruin

Spitefully, she gave the letters to Nachette, who was engaged in a silent struggle with Couturat for control of Scandal Nachette recognized their sensational value but told Marthe to leave him she could do him no good and her ingenuous charms were wearing thin Couturat, the opportunist, won the paper, however, and saw in the letters, set up on the front page, an excuse to fire Nachette and to establish himself as a good fellow. He sent one copy of the front page to Charles and burned the rest.

Charles' friend Chavannes brought news that Charles had suffered an attack on seeing the journal. At length Charles himself, wraith like but calm, appeared to hear Couturat's supposedly profound apologies. To Charles, the knowledge that Marthe had been behind the attempt to ruin him was intolerable. Loathing Paris, the theater, life itself, he refused to allow the performance of his play and withdrew to another part of the city. There only his old nurse cared for him as he sank into apathy and madness.

Feeling his reason slipping away, he tried to write, but could only scrawl his own name over and over.

Charles was taken to an asylum where steady treatment brought him gradually to himself. When he was at last well enough to go outside, he rejoiced at a new life opening up. He felt able to attend a small theater, but when he saw his wife on the stage—for Marthe had descended to playing in second rate theaters—madness overcame him once more. After months of violence, he became calm again, but with the calmness of an idiot or a beast. So he lived, little more than a heap of flesh, to the end of his days.

Critique

A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, the only play now extant known to have been acted at the Swan Theatre, belongs to that lively series of farcical comedies which Middleton produced between 1604 and 1612. Bawdy, skillful, and wholly laughter provoking, it is notable for its exceptional freedom and audacity, even if not for its chastity. Its story interweaves most adroitly the affairs of several households, and it travels at a fast pace through wildly comic situations to a satisfactory conclusion. Despite the lightness of its subject matter, however, the drama is given some ballast by its incidental comment on contemporary manners and customs. In one hilarious sequence, Middleton sees to it that detested police informers are made ridiculous, in another, a realistic christening party provides certain pious Puritan ladies with an excuse for imbibing wine with a zeal over and beyond the demands of mere politeness.

In the London shop of Yellowhammer, the goldsmith, a family discussion was taking place, a sharp, even quarrelsome exchange. Maudlin, the goldsmith's wife, was finding fault with Moll, her daughter. Moll, opposed to the distasteful marriage into which her parents were trying to inveigle her, was not attracted to the elderly libertine, Sir Walter Whorehound, whose suit the parents had encouraged. Nevertheless, her final consent was being taken for granted by her mother, who railed against Moll for her lack of enthusiasm for the match. So anxious were the Yellowhammers to achieve that connection with Sir Walter that they proposed to cement the family alliance in still another way. As a bride for their son Tim, a bemused student at Cambridge, they had approved Sir Walter's supposed niece, reportedly a Welsh heiress owning nineteen mountains. Actually, the Welshwoman was Sir Walter's mistress, whom he was conveniently preparing to discard as a preliminary to his marriage to Moll.

As the Yellowhammers argued, Sir Walter entered their shop, accompanied by his "niece." From all except Moll, the newcomers received a warm welcome. In the festivities which followed, the younger Touchwood made a casual entrance and, under the very nose of her father, slipped a note to Moll. To the latter, Touchwood posed as a customer in the shop for the purpose of ordering a wedding ring. He said that he had for gotten the correct size, but he was sure that it would be satisfactory if it would fit the finger of the goldsmith's daughter.

In another household, that of Allwit and his wife, Sir Walter was also held in high esteem, but for very different reasons. Allwit, the nominal master of the household without being its breadwinner, was an arrant but satisfied cuckold whose wife had been Sir Walter's mistress for many years and the mother of Sir Walter's six children. At the time, in fact, she was expecting the imminent birth of a seventh. Allwit, anxiously awaiting Sir Walter's arrival and complacently reviewing the advantages of his singular situation, gloated over the fact that Sir Walter maintained the house, kept it stocked with food, begot Allwit's brood for him, and even—by being jealous of Mistress Allwit—relieved the husband of that irksome prerogative. The only cloud on the Allwit horizon was the possibility that Sir Walter might eventually grow restive and drift into marriage with someone younger and more attractive. Allwit had spiked such disastrous prospects before by making judicious hints to those rich widows and landed virgins who had found favor with Sir Walter. He intended to do the same again before parting with such a prize as his treasured benefactor.

Elsewhere in London, the older of the Touchwood brothers was persuading his disconsolate but understanding wife that they must separate from each other for a while. Touchwood Senior's infallible gift for acquiring paternity had brought their domestic establishment to the verge of financial ruin, and there seemed no other way to slow down the steady increase in the size of his family. This matter settled, Touchwood Senior—a generous man—prepared to help his younger brother, who had requested aid in securing a marriage license.

At the same time, Touchwood Senior was, unknown to him, the subject of conversation between Sir Oliver and Lady Kix, a childless couple who bewailed the fate that kept them without heirs, thereby diverting income and property that should be theirs into the coffers of Sir Walter Whorehound. To achieve parenthood, they had tried numberless remedies in vain, in the meantime endlessly debating the blame for their childless state. Their hope had been quickened when their maid recommended the services of Touchwood Senior, who reportedly worked wonders with a fabulously effective, though quite expensive, type of water.

Mistress Allwit gave birth to a fine girl and in preparation for the christening Allwit and Sir Walter collaborated in the choice of godparents. To allay suspicion, Sir Walter appointed himself, along with his fiancée, Moll, Allwit selected Touchwood Junior. At the christening, the latter was able to exchange a few hurried words with Moll, commenting with satisfaction on the fact that the goldsmith had completed work on the wedding ring.

A short time later Touchwood Junior and Moll met secretly to be married. Their plans were thwarted, however, when Yellowhammer and Sir Walter burst in and took Moll away. The goldsmith promised, henceforth, to keep his daughter under lock and key until her marriage to Sir Walter could be accomplished. Meanwhile, Touchwood Senior, motivated by the prospect of both revenge and profit, agreed to turn the tables on Sir Walter by bringing parenthood to Sir Oliver and his lady. Sir Oliver was induced to drink a dubious liquid and then was sent to ride horseback for five hours. In his absence, Touchwood acquainted Lady Kix with the measures connected with her part of the treatment.

Allwit, disturbed to hear of Sir Walter's wedding plans, told Yellowhammer some colorful details of Sir Walter's behavior. Although the goldsmith professed dismay at the disclosure, after Allwit's departure he reaffirmed his intention to give his daughter to Sir Walter. Moll, however, had once more proved resourceful enough to escape her father's house, only to be brought back dripping wet and dragged by the hair by her angry mother, who had overtaken the run away after a chase along the river. Angry, Yellowhammer decided to forestall any additional attempts of the kind by setting the next day for Moll's marriage. Desperate at the thought of losing his sweet heart, Touchwood Junior forced Sir Walter into a duel in which they were both wounded.

Sir Walter, distraught, was carried to

Allwit's house. His reception there, however, did not follow the usual pattern of unquestioning welcome. Bad news came thick and fast: one moment he heard the rumor that he was guilty of the death of Touchwood Junior, the next his spirits sank at the news that Sir Oliver Kix's wife was finally pregnant. Allwit, sensing the turn in his benefactor's fortunes, decided to get rid of Sir Walter, even in his wounded condition. When he blusteringly threatened the old libertine with the law, Sir Walter woefully directed his servants to take him away. Left alone, Allwit and Mistress Allwit congratulated themselves on the profits they had gained from Sir Walter's past generosity.

Moll, ill from exposure and grief, received a letter purportedly containing a dying message from her lover. Swooning, she was carried out by Touchwood Senior and the servants of the Yellowhammers. Conscience stricken, the goldsmith and his wife berated themselves for causing her death.

Later, in church, the coffins of Touchwood Junior and Moll were placed by separate doors. To the surprise of the mourners assembled, however, the supposed corpses rose from their coffins and revealed the lovers as alive and well. The goldsmith and his wife at last conceded defeat and agreed to the marriage of Touchwood Junior and Moll. Since his son Tim had just married the Welsh woman, Yellowhammer consoled himself with the fact that one wedding feast could serve for the marriage of both his son and his daughter.

EDMÉE, the girl Chéri married

MARIE LAURE, Edmée's mother

Critique

Chéri is probably the most perfect example of Colette's exploration of the human heart through the five senses. The emotional truth with which she is concerned is complemented by her disciplined intellect, and a balance is maintained throughout the book between Léa's shrewd personal vision and the wholeheartedness with which she abandons herself, with Chéri, to sensual delight. Colette holds her unique place in French literature in part through the central matrix of sensuous perception in her work. In highly individual language which is both lyrical and precise, she wittily and dispassionately measures the cost of man-woman relationships. Amoral, but never irresponsible in outlook, Colette was at the time of her death the foremost woman novelist in France.

In the pink boudoir of Léa, a still lovely courtesan, Chéri, her handsome young lover, demanded her valuable pearls to play with. She discouraged his mood, fearing that the removal of her pearls might cause him to notice that her neck was showing the wrinkles of age. Chéri cursed his luncheon engagement with his mother. Léa gently and teasingly helped him in his erratic dressing. Although he became lazily aroused at her touch, she managed to send him away.

Alone, Léa dressed with efficient care, choosing a white brimmed hat for her visit to Mme Peloux. She ate a good lunch before joining Chéri at his mother's house. There she found Mme Peloux loud-voiced, gossipy and inquisitive, but years of familiarity, and later Chéri, had cemented their relationship. There also were Marie Laure, an elegant woman of forty, and her quiet daughter Edmée, whose looks nearly equaled her mother's. They left as soon as Léa arrived and the degree to which mother and son then relaxed disgusted Léa. Despite his careless manners Chérie still looked to her like a young god.

She remembered him as a very beautiful and lonely child who had soon developed his mother's miserliness and her keen business sense. In his late adolescence Léa had taken him away to Normandy to feed him well and also to remove him from his dissipated life in Paris. Her offer to do so had been accepted with a kiss which had inflamed them both.

In Normandy they had become lovers. Chéri was devoted to Léa for her passion and solicitude, and she to him for his youth, ardor, and faunlike freedom. At that point Léa would still have been willing to abandon him because of the inconvenience he caused her; he was, in succession, taciturn and demonstrative, tender and spiteful. But after they returned to Paris Chéri still wanted Léa, and he became her established lover. He had remained with her for six years.

When Chéri returned to Léa after the luncheon party, he told her that he was to marry Edmée. Since Léa had always known a marriage would be eventually arranged for Chéri, she did not outwardly react to this news. Chéri declared that his wife would influence him little and that she already adored him. Wounded by Léa's apparent lack of emotion, he declared that he would like her to hide herself in Normandy and grieve. He desperately wanted to be her last lover.

In the few weeks before Chéri's marriage he and Léa were very gay, though at times she was appalled at his heartlessness toward his future bride and realized that by pampering him she had maintained in him the immaturity of a child. When Chéri chattered about his honeymoon, Léa reminded him that she would not be there. Chéri turned white and gave her great happiness by announcing ambiguously that for him she would always be there.

While visiting Mme Peloux during the honeymoon, Léa was suddenly overwhelmed by an ill-defined grief. Thinking that she was ill, she returned home and went to bed. When she realized that she was for the first time really suffering from the loss of a great love, she fled from Paris and stayed away for a year.

Chéri and Edmée lived with Mme Peloux at Neuilly until their own house was finished. Chéri, also miserable, questioned his mother about Léa's uninformative parting note. No one knew where she had gone. Sometimes he fought viciously with his young wife, who loved him and bored him. Again, he would be come obsessed with plans for their house and give many and contradictory orders for exotic decorations.

Edmée became so unhappy that at last she resorted to looking for love letters in Chéri's desk. When she accused him of loving only Léa and wept unrestrainedly, Chéri was unmoved but clinically interested. Léa had never cried. Edmée deeply offended Chéri when she suggested that their own love making was not really love. Chéri explained that no man could tolerate such remarks. Their quarrels finally forced Edmée to suggest a divorce. Chéri calmly rejected the suggestion because he knew that Edmée loved him and because divorce offered no real solution to his problem.

Chéri next went to Léa's house, but her servants had no news of her. In deep despair he dined away from home for the first time. He stayed in Paris, living a miserable and silent life with a young man who had frequently lived on his money before. He recovered the strength to act when at last the lamps in Léa's house were again lighted. Then, without seeing Léa, he bought jewels for his wife and returned home.

Léa did not wholly regret her exile, but she was distressed to discover how much the year had aged her. Only her eyes remained as lovely as before. Although a visit from Mme Peloux restored her spirit, she was hurt by the news she received of Chéri, and she realized that she was not free of her love for him. While out walking, she twice saw young men who she was convinced were Chéri. Knowing that she was not yet strong enough to meet him unexpectedly, she returned home. She changed her street clothes for a peach-colored robe and paced about her room while trying to face the fact that she was alone.

About midnight Chéri arrived, sullen and disheveled, and declared that he had returned to her. She quarreled with him for a time but at last was so completely disarmed by his pleas that she kept him there. For the first time, that night, they declared to each other that they were in love.

In the morning Léa, unknowingly watched by Chéri, made wild plans for their departure together. She looked old to Chéri and he felt exhausted. Unable to draw him into her plans, she bitterly abused Edmée. He stopped her by insisting that she was not being the fine and lovely woman he had known. She told him gently that their fate had been to love and then part. Chéri, although he knew how he had hurt Léa, was unable to follow any course but return to his family. Léa begged him not to make Edmée miserable and told Chéri how she loved him. Having thus successfully sent him away, Léa last saw Chéri breathing in the air of the courtyard as if it were something that he could savor and taste.

Critique

The Chevalier of the Maison Rouge is a particularly striking example of Dumas' genius in catching and holding the reader's interest. With a plot based on the hero's supposed love for Marie Antoinette, the novel tells of his several unsuccessful attempts to free her before she was sentenced to death and executed. The fact that the reader knows these attempts are bound to fail in no way diminishes the interest of a complex story in which the fabricated circumstances fit precisely into the actual ones. A champion of monarchy and of aristocratic virtues, Dumas has endowed his republican heroes with these same qualities. Maurice and Louis are republicans only for the sake of plot. The former is the ideal romantic lover, the latter is the faithful friend and perfect gentleman. The book can in no way serve as a manual of history, but it is captivating reading for amateurs of adventures in fiction.

At the beginning of the year 1793, after the death of King Louis XVI on the guillotine, France was menaced at her borders by practically all of Europe at a time when the Convention was torn apart by dissensions between the Montagnards and the Girondins. One night in March, Maurice Lindsey, a lieutenant in the Civic Guard, met a group of enlisted volunteers who were taking a woman to the guardhouse because she had no pass permitting her to be out at that time. The woman implored the officer for his protection against these men, who showed the effects of having drunk many toasts to their future victories. He decided to conduct her to the guardhouse himself, but she talked him into escorting her to her home.

Louis Lorin, Maurice's friend, had tried to persuade the lieutenant to avoid involving himself with an unknown woman who was so afraid of the guardhouse and who might well be a ci devant, an aristocrat. But Maurice was already in love with her, he was afraid only that she was returning from a lovers' tryst. He escorted her home, but she refused to tell him her name, and once they had arrived in the old Rue Saint Jacques, in the center of the tanneries, with their horrible smell, she ordered him to close his eyes, gave him a kiss, and, leaving a ring between his lips, disappeared. The next morning he received a short note in which the woman gave him her thanks for his gallant conduct and said goodbye to him forever. This note he treasured with the ring.

Now that he had the lovely unknown woman on his mind he was not too upset to learn that the same night the Chevalier of the Maison Rouge, back in Paris had attempted a new conspiracy to free Marie Antoinette. The immediate consequence was that the Dauphin was taken away from the apartment where he was imprisoned with his mother, sister, and aunt. The boy was given to Simon, a shoemaker, to receive a so called republican education.

On another evening Maurice went back to the same spot where the beautiful stranger had vanished. When he began reading all the names on the doors in the hope that love would prompt him to identify the right one, he was suddenly surrounded by seven men and thrown into a cave with his hands tied and his eyes blindfolded. Behind the door he could hear the men deliberating to determine whether he was a spy and whether they should kill him. The name of Mme Dixmer was also mentioned. Maurice had gathered from their talk that she was the wife of one of the men, apparently the manager of a large tannery. The men continued talking, emphasizing that Mme Dixmer must know nothing of this happening. Maurice wondered why a tanner would want to assassinate him.

Meanwhile, he had succeeded in freeing himself, and when the door was opened he jumped out, only to find himself in an enclosed garden where he found no visible means of escape. He leaped through a window and found himself in a room where a woman was reading. Dixmer followed him and ordered the woman to step aside so that he could shoot the intruder. Instead, she stretched out her arms to protect him. Geneviève Dixmer was the unknown woman of his previous encounter. Dixmer offered his apologies, explaining that he was using prohibited acids in his tannery business and that his smugglers had been afraid. Maurice was an informer. Maurice was asked to stay for dinner, where he met Dixmer's business partner, Morand. At the end of the evening he was invited to return.

One day in May, Maurice was on duty at the Temple—the apartment where Marie Antoinette was held—when Heloise Tison came to visit her mother, the prisoner's keeper. She was accompanied by a friend who was allowed to go up stairs. After they had left a letter was discovered in Marie Antoinette's pocket, a note confirming the death of a friend. The handwriting was familiar to Maurice, and he wondered how Geneviève Dixmer could have anything to do with the queen. The next day Marie Antoinette asked to go to the top of the tower for a walk. After a while turning to the east, she received signals from a window. Maurice thought he recognized Geneviève and immediately went to the Rue Saint Jacques, where he found everyone very busy with a new dye. He was amused at his own suspicions.

While he believed that Geneviève felt esteem rather than real love for her husband, Maurice was growing more and more jealous of Morand, whom for no reason at all he suspected of being in love with her. One day he did voice his jealousy. Geneviève pleaded with him to remain her friend. On the following day he received a note from her asking him to send a letter to her husband giving any reason he might think of for stopping his visits. Once more he complied with her wish.

His action greatly upset Dixmer and Morand, whose tannery business was only a cover to hide their conspiracies. Morand was the Chevalier of the Maison Rouge. After Geneviève refused to write to Maurice or to invite him back to their home, Dixmer himself went to see him. Maurice, true to his promise, refused to return. However, he became so lovesick that he could not do anything until he received a letter from Geneviève, in which, at her husband's insistence, she invited him to call once more. He had no suspicion that the conspirators had great need of him. They had bought a house close to the Temple and had worked all night to connect its caves with a trapdoor.

Geneviève having expressed a desire to see the queen, Maurice asked her to come to the Temple on the following Thursday. He also invited Morand. When a girl offered them some carnations, Maurice bought a bouquet for Geneviève. Later, as the queen walked by, on her way to the top of the tower, she admired the flowers and Geneviève offered her the bouquet.

Simon, who hated Lorin and Maurice because they protected the Dauphin against his cruelty, picked up a flower that had fallen from the bouquet and discovered a note hidden inside, but the note was blown away by the wind. After Simon had given the affair great publicity, the flower girl was found, tried, and condemned to death. The Chevalier of the Maison Rouge was unsuccessful in his efforts to rescue her, for she was executed immediately. She was Héloïse Tison. Her mother had contributed to her doom by joining her accusations to Simon's.

When the day set for the queen's escape arrived, Marie Antoinette asked to go into the yard for a walk. She was to sit by the trapdoor, then pretend to faint, during the confusion, she and her daughter and sister-in-law could be carried away through the tunnel. But as they were entering the yard, the queen's little black dog jumped forward and went barking toward the concealed trap. The conspirators were forced to retreat. Because the plot confirmed his earlier charge, Simon became the man of the day. Maurice fell under suspicion, together with his friend Lorin.

Lorin, determined to save his friend, insisted that he join the expedition which was to arrest the man who had bought the house to which the tunnel led. Maurice accepted, only to learn that Dixmer was the man. He realized that he had been a mere instrument in the hands of his alleged friends. When he arrived at the house, Geneviève said that she really loved him, and she promised to be his if he would let the chevalier go free. He revealed the password to them, and the conspirators escaped. The house was burned down. As Maurice ran every where desperately calling for Geneviève, Lorin realized who the woman was. He followed his friend through the city on a fruitless search for his love, and finally took him home after he had become completely exhausted. There they found Geneviève waiting for Maurice.

Maurice decided to leave France in order to take Geneviève away. She was left alone to pack her few belongings while Maurice went to see Lorin. During his absence her husband came after her and forced her to go away with him.

In the meantime Marie Antoinette had been transferred to the Conciergerie. The chevalier managed to be hired as a turnkey there, replacing the former turnkey, whom he had bribed.

Dixmer also had a plan for the queen's escape. His design was to introduce himself in the Conciergerie as a registrar. He hoped to get into Marie Antoinette's room with Geneviève and kill the two keepers. Geneviève would then persuade the queen to change clothes with her and leave with Dixmer.

The Chevalier of the Maison Rouge had introduced into the queen's room a small file with which she was supposed to cut the bars of her window. Meanwhile, he would keep the jailers busy at the other window.

Unfortunately, the two attempts, taking place simultaneously, worked against each other, and Geneviève was arrested.

Maurice, having searched all Paris in order to find Geneviève again, had gone to live with Lorin after narrowly missing arrest in his own quarters. He and Lorin were definitely marked as suspects.

It was not until Marie Antoinette's trial, at which he met the chevalier, that Maurice learned what had happened to Geneviève. Every day he went to the Revolutionary Tribunal in the hope of finding her there. Finally she was brought in, and Maurice was surprised to see Lorin brought in also The com missary who had come to arrest Maurice had arrested Lorin instead when Maurice was not to be found Genevieve and Lorin were sentenced to death

Maurice had seen Dixmer in the audience After the trial he followed him and killed him during a quarrel He took a pass which Dixmer, in order to harass his wife and accuse her of adultery, had secured for the purpose of entering the room where the prisoners were kept Maurice ran to the waiting room and, handing the pass to Lorin, told him he, Lorin, was now free But Lorin refused his friends offer Maurice was seized and all three died on the scaffold

Critique

There are so many awkwardnesses in the structure of the Children of Herakles (the Herakleidae) that critics have suggested that important scenes must be missing or that, like Alcestis, it was not intended as a tragedy but as a substitute for a satyr play Another suggestion is that since the Herakleidae was presented in the early years of the Peloponnesian War and glorifies the virtues of the Athenian city state, Euripides depended upon the high patriotism of the play to carry it The unity of the play lies in the fact that in the beginning Eurystheus threatens to slay the surviving relatives of Herakles, who are seeking refuge in Athens, and at the end of the play he is himself slain by command of Alcmene, the mother of Herakles

Iolaus, the aged warrior friend of the dead Herakles, together with Alcmene and the Herakleidae, the children of Herakles, had for years been wandering over Greece seeking a refuge from Eurystheus, King of Argos No city had dared to take them in against the command of the powerful Argive ruler At last the wanderers arrived in Athens There, while resting at the temple of Zeus, they were immediately confronted by Copeus, the herald of Eurystheus, who demanded that they proceed at once to Argos and submit to death by stoning Iolaus stanchly refused, and when Copeus seized the children a violent conflict ensued and Iolaus was thrown to the ground

The chorus of aged Athenians immediately summoned their king, Demophon, who was warned by Copeus that his refusal to surrender the Herakleidae to the Argives would surely result in war In response to Iolaus' plea, Demophon offered his protection on the grounds that the children of Herakles were gathered around the altar of Zeus, that they were bound to him by ties of kinship, and that the honor and freedom of Athens were at stake Copeus sullenly departed, after warning that he would return with an army and punish Athens for its insolence. The grateful Iolaus praised the Athenians for their willingness to aid the helpless in an honest cause, but he refused to leave the temple until the issue with Argos was settled.

The Argive host appeared, led by Eurystheus himself. Demophon, who had consulted a variety of public and private oracles, came to Iolaus with the news that victory depended upon the sacrifice of some royal maiden and that he could not in good conscience slay his own daughter. When the distraught Iolaus offered to surrender himself to Eurystheus, Demophon pointed out that the Argive king desired only the children.

Macana, daughter of Herakles, emerged from the temple to offer herself, insisting that she be chosen even after Iolaus proposed that the victim be selected by lot. After she had been led away, a servant of Hyllus, son of Herakles, entered to announce that Hyllus had arrived with an army to aid the Herakleidae. The elated Iolaus summoned Alcmena from the temple to hear the good news. He was so overjoyed that in spite of his age he insisted on donning armor and setting off to take part in the battle.

Later a servant brought Alcmena tidings of victory and described how, after the cowardly Eurystheus had refused single combat with Hyllus, the rejuvenated Iolaus plunged into the fray and took Eurystheus prisoner. Alcmena was astounded that Iolaus had not killed him on the spot. When guards brought the bound Eurystheus before her, she demanded his immediate death.

The messenger of Demophon cautioned her that such an act would violate Athenian custom, but the vengeful Alcmena swore that she herself would kill Eurystheus if necessary. The Argive king explained that he had never had any personal quarrel with the Herakleidae and that he was merely forced to do as he did by the divine power of Hera, the deity of Argos. Nevertheless, he would not ask for mercy in fact, since an old oracle had predicted it, he was quite willing to submit to death if his body would be buried at Pallene, where in the future his spirit could protect his former enemies. The bloodthirsty Alcmena then demanded that he be taken away from the city, slain, and cast to the dogs. The chorus, observing that so long as Eurystheus was not killed within Athens no stain of guilt would come upon the city, led him away to be executed.

Washington Irving, youngest of the eleven children of a wealthy New York merchant, was sickly as a child. Unable to continue in school, he educated himself along lines that struck his fancy, and his studies included the Spanish language. One of the early books in his scattered reading was Don Quixote, which inspired in him a life long interest in Spain and the Spanish people.

In 1825, while traveling in southern France, he decided to see the land of Cervantes, using as his excuse the need to go to Madrid to consult manuscripts dealing with Columbus. Out of this visit developed A History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus (1828). From material uncovered but unsuitable for this work, and from impressions of his travels, he wrote a chronicle of the conquest of Granada which he attributed to an imaginary historian, the Jesuit Fray Antonio Agapida. While in Granada he visited the Alhambra, then no national monument but a dirty, run down building, and secured permission to live there while writing the tales contained in The Alhambra (1832).

In the introduction to the first edition of A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, Irving invented details of the life of Fray Antonio and affirmed that the original manuscript was in the Escorial Library. In a note to the 1850 revised edition, however, he confessed that the Jesuit priest was his own invention. He also admitted romanticizing some of the scenes and incidents of the history, but in this respect he was only doing what the Spaniards had done before, especially Ginés Pérez de Hita (c. 1544 c. 1619) in his Civil Wars of Granada (1595-1604), which he attributed to an imaginary Arabic contemporary.

The advantage of putting the account of the conquest of Granada into the mouth of a monkish zealot like Fray Antonio Agapida was to keep it in spirit with contemporary accounts by orthodox chroniclers of Spain. It also provided an explanation for its attitude toward religion and the throne, so much a part of the Spanish spirit in the fifteenth century.

After seven centuries of warfare between Moors and Christians, Aben Ismael, King of Granada, became weary of fighting in 1457 and bought a truce from King Henry IV of Castile and Leon. When his proud son, Muley Abul Hasan, inherited the throne in 1465, he stopped payment of the tribute. King Henry did nothing about the matter, but his successors, Ferdinand and Isabella, after amalgamating the kingdom in 1478 sent Juan de Vera as their ambassador to demand resumption of payment. The Moorish monarch rebuffed the ambassador with the statement that the Moorish mint no longer coined money, only scimitar blades and the heads of lances.

Ferdinand listened to de Vera's report of the strength of the city, whose name means pomegranate, and the impossibility of direct siege, then made a punning threat that he would pick out the pomegranate seeds one by one. Washington Irving's book tells with fascinating and romantic details how he kept that promise.

Granada in the late fifteenth century was a fortress city of parks, fountains, pools, and architectural gems still to be seen, but it was also a city of intrigue, as Irving bears witness. Among the women of Abul Hassan's harem was the captured daughter of a Christian warlord, Isabella Ximenes de Solis, better known to history by her Arabic name of Zoraya, the Morning Star. As mother of two of the king's sons, she schemed to place one of them on the throne of Granada instead of Abul Hassan's firstborn, Boabdil, the son of Princess Ayxa la Horra. Nobles in the court were taking sides in this intrigue, and one group was plotting to depose the king in favor of Boabdil.

Meanwhile, the ambitious Abul Hasan, unpunished for refusing to pay tribute, decided to break the unwritten truce and reconquer a poorly defended frontier town. Now that war with Portugal had ended, however, Ferdinand was free to retaliate by sending an army against the

Moorish town of Alhama Irving makes the campaign sound like a chess game Troops from Granada marched to defend the town Urged by Isabella the powerful Duke of Medina Sidonia forgot his quarrel with the Marques of Cadiz The combined strength of the Spaniards drove Abul Hassan back to Granada, where his disappointed subjects revolted against him and crowned his son Boabdil, nicknamed El Chico, the young king

By a wealth of details Irving keeps his account from being a dry catalogue of battles and proves that the war was fought during the age of chivalry Moors and Christians vied to outdo each other in courtesy Boabdil, captured by King Ferdinand, was released in exchange for Christian captives Isabella, marching to visit her fighting husband, was allowed to pass by the Moors, who were unwilling to wage war against women Fatima, niece of Boabdil's vizier, was captured by the Count of Tendilla while on her way to marry the governor of Tetuan To ransom her, Boabdil offered a hundred Christians in exchange Without waiting for their arrival, Tendilla loaded Fatima with jewels as a wedding present and escorted her home The admiring king increased her ransom by twenty priests and a number of peasant women, and the delighted vizier started a correspondence with Tendilla that lasted through the siege and was useful in persuading the hesitant Boabdil of the uselessness of further fighting

The author divides his study into two volumes, the first dealing with a succession of brief forays, and the second narrating the slow "picking" of the pomegranate seeds While the world watched, Málaga, Granada's seaport for trade with Syria and Egypt, was besieged The

Grand Turk and the Soldan of Egypt stopped their feuding to send help to their Moorish brother monarch Queen Isabella called on all Spaniards under the age of seventy to enlist in the Holy War, and she and her daughter, later to marry Henry VIII of England, came to cheer the fighters Even the ancient Grand Cardinal of Spain donned armor and promised high pay to all who would follow him into battle

Eventually the worried Boabdil offered to rule Granada as a vassal of Ferdinand if he were allowed time to prepare the minds of his subjects for the change, but with the capitulation of the last Moorish stronghold in sight, the Catholic monarch refused When the Moors burned the camp of their besiegers, Ferdinand ordered a permanent city built, called Santa Fe, to prove his intentions of remaining in the field until Granada surrendered

From legends and ballads, as well as histories, Irving reconstructed the last year of the siege He told of the brave Moor who rode into the Christian camp and flung an insulting spear at the queen's tent and of Hernando Pérez del Pulgar, who answered the Moorish knight by stealing into Granada and fastening a scroll bearing the words "Ave Maria" to the door of the chief mosque There were no pitched battles At the king's command, Spanish soldiers refrained from fighting while they waited for the starving Arabs to capitulate Finally, on November 25, 1491, a sixty day truce was declared Before it ended, Boabdil surrendered, and on January 2, 1492, he marched out of the fallen city With the Count of Tendilla appointed governor of Granada, Spain concluded a crusade of reconquest that had lasted for seven and a half centuries

CHRONICLES OF FROISSART

Author Jean Froissart (c 1338 c 1410)

Time 1316 1399

First transcribed 1373 1410

Jean Froissart, by being so much a man of his age, has become a man for all time. This unpriestly priest, this citizen celebrator of chivalry, took such an intense childlike joy in chronicling his times that he devoted an entire half century to traveling, interviewing, writing and rewriting. He interviewed over two hundred princes in various courts from Rome and the Pyrenees to Edinburgh, and with such zest that he was a favorite of the nobles on both sides in the Hundred Years' War. In his own time his works were widely copied and—a sure sign of the value placed upon them—illuminated.

Although he recorded the Hundred Years' War on a colorful and unprejudiced scale, he is not a reliable historian. Born in Valenciennes, now a city in France but at that time in the Low Country countship of Hainaut, Froissart was a Fleming who shifted his allegiance from one side of the conflict to the other, depending on the court that offered him patronage at the moment. Relying mostly on hearsay evidence from partisan observers, he never consulted official documents, many of which are still extant. As a result his history abounds in anachronisms, erroneous dates, garbled names, and impossible topography. More important, Froissart was afflicted with a psychological astigmatism; he was unaware that the fourteenth century marked the waning of the Middle Ages, and that he was the last of the medieval innocents. The Ottomans had penetrated deep into Europe in the East and Southwest, plagues were ravaging England and the Continent, the incessant wars were gradually increasing in ferocity, the peasants were challenging social order everywhere, the "universal" Church was split between Rome and Avignon—and Froissart was writing to praise famous men. The most significant historian to follow him was Philippe de Comines (c 1447-c 1511), whose Memoirs reflect a realism and disillusionment in startling contrast to Froissart's chivalric naiveté.

Froissart's purpose was clear: he wrote "in order that the honorable and noble adventures and feats of arms, done and achieved by the wars of France and England, should notably be registered and put in perpetual memory." His remarkable career was auspiciously launched in 1361 when he went to England as Queen Philippa's secretary and court historian. There he thoroughly ingratiated himself with the aristocracy and began a pro-English account of the wars from the time of Edward III in 1316 to the death of Richard II in 1399. Curiously enough, he makes no mention of Chaucer, a tacitly ignored rival, at court and Chaucer reciprocated the slight. After the queen's death in 1369, Froissart returned to Valenciennes, went obscurely into business ("je me suis mis dans la marchandise"), and completed Book I of the Chronicles under the patronage of Robert of Namur, Philippa's nephew. A very large proportion of that version was directly plagiarized from his pro-English predecessor, Jehan le Bel, but Froissart's fame was such that Count Guy de Blois gave him first a prosperous living at Les tinnes and later a sinecure as a private chaplain. Under Count Guy's patronage Froissart traveled through France, making an especially fruitful trip in 1388 to Gaston de Foix in Orthez. During this period, he rewrote Book I and completed Books II and III, adopting a pro-French perspective on the wars. "Let it not be said," he prevaricates, "that I have corrupted this noble history through the favor accorded me by Count Guy de Blois, for whom I wrote it. No, indeed! For I will say nothing but the truth and keep a straight course without favoring one side or the other." The facts belie these lofty words.

In 1397 Count Guy de Blois died, a sot who had sold his patrimony, and Froissart gained a new patron in the Duke of Bavaria, who sent him again to England. Although Richard II, the new king, did not receive him cordially, when he retired to his home town eighteen months later, to revise and complete his work, it is interesting to note that the chronicles again took on a somewhat pro English turn, whether subconsciously or by design

Froissart more than returned the favors of his patrons by immortalizing them as heroes and heroines of chivalry, and he took immense delight in doing so "I have taken more pleasure in it than in anything else The more I work on these things, the more they please me, for just as the gentle knights and squires love the calling of arms and perfect themselves by constant exercise, so I, by laboring in this matter, acquire skill and take pleasure in it" What Froissart loved most was the resplendent panoply and pageantry of jousts and battle and the Chronicles are really a pastiche of anecdotes, great and small His knights are invariably "noble, courteous, bold, and enterprising" and his ladies are eternally noble, beautiful, and gentle It is no wonder that Sir Walter Scott said of Froissart, "This is my master!"

The Chronicles abound in dramatic vignettes the Black Prince graciously submissive to his own prisoner, King John, the Duke of Brabant's envoy sick almost to death of the treachery he has unwittingly performed, King Henry IV meditatively feeding his falcons as he deliberates on the murder of deposed Richard, Gaston de Foix discovering a purse of poison on his treacherous son's person and unwillingly killing him, the blind King of Bohemia found dead in battle surrounded by the bodies of loyal guardsmen In these narratives Froissart's style occasionally soars above the conventional rhetoric of the medieval romance Johan Huizinga is surely too harsh when he says that "poverty and sterility" mark a "style wholly devoid of rhetorical qualities," for Froissart can range from the crude language of peasants and soldiers to the lofty rhetoric of the Bishop of St Andrew's A knight storming battlements in Spain leans over the wall to see the defenders, "ugly as monkeys or bears devouring pears" The Earl of Derby greets Pembroke after the battle of Auberoche "Welcome, cousin Pembroke, you have come just in time to sprinkle holy water on the dead!" "Where is that son of a Jew's whore?" demands de Trastamara before the murder of Don Carlos

When the chessmen arrived, the King, who wished to leave some possession of his with the Countess challenged her, saying "My lady, what stakes will you play?" And the Countess replied "And you, Sire?" Then the King placed on the table a very fine ring, set with a large ruby, which he was wearing on his finger The Countess said "Sire, Sire, I have no ring as valuable as that 'Lady,' said the King, "put down such as you have, it is indeed good enough"

The Countess, to please the King took from her finger a gold ring which was not of great worth Then they played at chess together the Countess playing as well as she could, in order that the King should not consider her too simple and ignorant and the King made wrong moves and did not play as well as he might And there was scarce a pause between the moves but he looked so hard at the Countess that she lost countenance and fumbled her game And when the King saw that she had lost a knight, a rook, or whatever it might be, he lost too to keep the Countess in play

Froissart is by no means always so delicately perceptive He can describe in gruesome detail the dismemberment of Hugh Despencer, the heart thrown into the fire, the head sent to London, and the pieces of his quartered body carried off to be displayed in other cities—and then calmly proceed with the narrative of the queen's joyous arrival for feasting in London One feels a bizarre sense of the grotesque when Froissart asserts mat ter of factly that Galeas Visconti murdered his uncle "by bleeding him in the neck, as they are wont to do in Lombardy when they wish to hasten a person's end." He laments when captives are killed because they would have brought a good ransom. There are dozens of accounts of towns sacked and women and children murdered, all related without the least trace of compassion. Perhaps this detachment is explained by the fact that death was common (G. G. Coulton cites the fact that in proportion to the total population, more Christians killed each other then than they do now) or by Froissart's evident commitment to Boethian philosophy of the Wheel of Fortune, dramatically presented in one of the illuminated miniatures of an early manuscript.

Montaigne, who was a touchstone of the Renaissance just as Froissart was of the Middle Ages, said of the Chronicles that they were the "crude and unshapen substance of history." If he meant that they lacked any profound philosophical perspective, he was right. The simplicity of Froissart's mind can be seen in his obtuse declaration that "Mankind is divided into three classes: the valiant who face the perils of war, the people who talk of their successes and fortunes, and the clerks who write and record their great deeds." Froissart was a man who could report, without realizing the realistic significance of his account, that French King John's Round Table of three hundred knights, who were to meet annually to tell their tales and have their heroism recorded, lasted only one year because all the knights perished in their foolhardiness.

Nevertheless, the Chronicles are rich in the sheer entertainment value of Gothic adventures. Froissart's account of the blazing day when Charles VI went mad is illustrative. As the troupe rode along, a page accidentally struck another's helmet with his spear:

The King who rode but afore them, with the noise suddenly started, and his heart trembled and into his imagination ran the impression of the words of the man that stopped his horse in the forest of Mans, and it ran into his thought that his enemies ran after him to slay and destroy him, and with that abusion he fell out of his wit by feebleness of his head and dashed his spurs to his horse and drew out the sword and turned to his pages, having no knowledge of any man weening himself to be in a battle enclosed with his enemies, and lifted up his sword to strike, he cared not where, and cried and said "On, on upon these traitors!"

Of greater horror are the descriptions of Sir Peter of Be'arn haunted by the ghost of a bear, or of the King of France at a marriage feast almost cremated alive when five of his squires dressed in pitch covered linen for an entertainment brushed against a torchlight and were consumed in the flames. It is for these tales that Gray dubbed him "the Herodotus of a barbarous age," but it is for his celebration of chivalry that he was first translated into English by Sir John Bourchier, Lord Berners, in 1523-1525. In the preface to that work, Lord Berners cites a reason for reading the Chronicles that is still valid five centuries later: "What pleasure shal it be to the noble gentylmen of Englande to se, beholde, and rede the highe enterprises, famous actes, and glonous dedes done."

CICERO'S ORATIONS

Author: Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 B.C.)

First transcribed: 80-43 B.C.

When one thinks of the greatness of Rome and especially of its government, the name of Cicero is likely to come to mind. While a figure like Julius Caesar may symbolize the military greatness of imperial Rome, the figure of Cicero is a symbol of Roman justice and law, of the Roman Senate and its traditions, and of Roman greatness in philosophy and literature. Cicero is important in literature primarily for his orations and his numerous writings about oratory and rhetoric. As the author of these writings Cicero set a pattern in public speaking that is still alive in European culture. More than that, because of what he wrote and said, because of the viewpoints he held and defended, even to dying for them, Cicero became historically one of the great advocates of culture and conservatism.

Cicero took ten years to prepare himself as a lawyer before he appeared on behalf of a client in public. In those years of preparation he held, as he did all his life, that a thorough education is necessary for success in any activity. There have been exponents of oratory who have averred that manner is everything, Cicero disagreed, believing that matter is as inescapably a factor in oratorical success as is manner. In the Orator, one of his most mature pieces of writing on the art of oratory, Cicero wrote that his own success, like that of any orator, was more to be credited to his study of the philosophers than to his study of earlier rhetoricians, and that no one can express wide views, or speak fluently on many and various subjects, without philosophy. Although Cicero tried to make a science of rhetoric and saw profit in his own attempts at its systemization, he also realized that no simple set of formulas could ever make a great orator. As he put it, an eloquent man should be able to speak "of small things in a lowly manner, of moderate things in a temperate manner, and of great things with dignity."

In Cicero's time there were two prevalent styles in oratory, the Attic and the Asian. In the latter type, Cicero himself discerned two varieties, the one epigrammatic and euphuistic, dependent upon artful structure rather than importance of content, and the other characterized by a swift and passionate flow of speech in which choice of words for precise and elegant effect was a dominant factor. Cicero found both styles wanting in some degree and built his own style upon an eclectic combination of the two.

Fifty eight speeches by Cicero are still extant, although not all have complete texts. The number of his speeches is unknown, but more than forty are known to have been lost. Not all the speeches Cicero wrote were delivered, sometimes he wrote them for an occasion which did not occur. His second Philippic is an example of such a speech. Marcus Antonius was so enraged by Cicero's first speech against him after the death of Julius Caesar that Cicero's friends persuaded the orator to leave the city of Rome temporarily. While absent from Rome, living at a villa near Naples, Cicero wrote the second Philippic, which was not spoken in the Senate or even published immediately. A copy was sent, however, to Brutus and Cassius, who enjoyed its invective against their enemy.

Not all of Cicero's speeches are of equal interest to a modern reader. His earliest extant oration, containing relatively little of interest, was delivered in a law court on behalf of Publius Quinctius. Cicero appeared for the defense, as he usually did, and spoke against Quintus Hortensius, the greatest lawyer in Rome at the time. Although Cicero won his case, it is difficult for a modern reader to retain interest in a case decided two thousand years ago when the stuff of the argument is largely points of law. But this speech along with other early efforts, provided the opportunity for Cicero to prove himself. He made such a reputation that he was chosen to prosecute Caius Verres, who was accused of tyranny and maladministration in Sicily. Once again the famous Hortensius was Cicero's legal opponent. In the second oration he made against Verres, Cicero managed to produce such overwhelming evidence against the defendant that he went voluntarily into banishment. The evidence included chicanery designed to prevent the case from coming to trial, and even Hortensius could find little to say for the defendant. Although Cicero had no occasion to deliver five additional speeches he had written for the trial, scholars have judged that they are among Cicero's best and have found them excellent sources for material about Sicilian government, history, and art. Another of Cicero's noteworthy speeches is the one given in defense of Aulus Cluentius, who was tried and acquitted on a charge of having poisoned his father-in-law who had tried a few years before to poison Cluentius.

Cicero's intent was to move his hearers, and his devices to insure victory in court were not always above reproach, as his speech in defense of Lucius Flaccus indicates. The defendant was accused of extortion while an administrator in Asia, and apparently Cicero could find little to say in his client's defense beyond impugning the Jews and Greeks who were witnesses against him, members of groups not much in favor in Rome. Of even greater interest is Cicero's defense of Aulus Licinius Archias, a poet of Greek descent whose status as a Roman citizen had been questioned. In this oration Cicero developed a long passage in praise of literature, saying that literature and its creators are of paramount interest to a nation because they afford excellent material for speeches, because they make great deeds immortal by preserving them in writing, and because they give readers a useful and refreshing pastime.

Not all of Cicero's speeches were intended for courtroom presentation. Some were written for delivery in the Senate and some with a view to Cicero's own benefit. In 58 B.C. Cicero was exiled temporarily as a result of his activities in crushing the conspiracy of Catiline. When Pompey recalled him to Rome a year later, he thanked the Roman Senate in one speech for his recall, in another he thanked the Roman people generally, and in a third he made a request to the Senate for the return of his home, which had been taken over by Clodius for the state.

The most famous of Cicero's speeches are those he wrote against Marcus Antonius after the death of Julius Caesar. Cicero, a conservative, had not been favorable to the autocracy of Caesar and rejoiced when Caesar was assassinated. During an eight-month period in 44-43 B.C. when Marcus Antonius presumed to try to succeed Caesar, Cicero directed fourteen orations against him. These orations, passionate and sincere, are called the Philippics, after the famous speeches of Demosthenes against Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. In his first speech Cicero spoke with some moderation, speaking only of Antonius' public life and appealing to his sense of patriotism. In later speeches, especially the second Philippic, he made all sorts of attacks on Antonius' private life, accusing him of almost every conceivable type of immorality. Eventually Antonius had his revenge when he, Lepidus, and Octavianus formed their triumvirate, Cicero was put to death.

Whether Cicero's Orations will ever again be popular with readers is doubtful. Orations of any kind are in little favor today. More than that, too few modern readers have the background in Roman history and culture needed to enjoy reading what Cicero wrote and said two thousand years ago.

Critique

Although this play is widely known merely by its title, the subtitle, "The Mercy of Augustus" is more revealing. The theme of royal generosity and clemency made a timely commentary of special importance during the years of Louis XIV's minority, and because of this play its author received benefits from the great Richelieu, formerly his antagonist. The third of Corneille's great plays (the others are The Cid and Horace), Cinna displays the writer's unusual ability to utilize the so called classical unities of time, place, and action heightened by noble sentiments concerning a superior person. The play is chiefly remembered today for Augustus Caesar's brilliant soliloquy on the confusion of good and evil, the nature of egotism and humility, and the strength and weakness that may exist in one person.

Amelia, the daughter of Augustus' tutor, sought revenge for her father's death, and she had asked for vengeance as a provision of her marriage to Cinna, the grandson of Pompey and perhaps more deeply wronged than his loved one. Her friend Fulvia felt that the plot against Augustus' life could be successful only if anger and hatred were not apparent, especially since Augustus held Amelia in such high esteem that courtiers often asked her to act as an intermediary in affairs at court. The two women debated the worth of Augustus as compared to the cruelties exercised to establish him in his high position. Amelia thought the winning of love through the destruction of a tyrant worth all the risk involved, but self glorification seemed to Fulvia more obvious in the design than either love or desire for vengeance — a thought which almost caused Amelia to waver in deference to her endangered and beloved Cinna.

Cinna, however, felt the plot had an excellent chance of success. All the conspirators seemed to him as desirous of vengeance and as eager for the rewards of love as he himself, though their inspiration was the result of his oratorical eloquence in reciting his own as well as the historical grievances against the emperor — especially those of the proscriptions who, like Amelia's father, deserved better than they received. Cinna himself would, while bearing the sacrificial cup at tomorrow's thanksgiving to the gods, strike home the dagger. His friend Maximus would hold back the mob while others would surround Cinna. Even though he proclaimed he cared not whether he lived or died as long as honor were upheld — an honor not unlike that of Brutus and Cassius — Amelia hastened to add — he believed that the people would then accept him as emperor.

Evander, a freed servant of Cinna, brought news that Augustus wanted to see both Cinna and Maximus, an event which upset their plans and struck fear into Amelia's heart. She retired to Livia's side while Cinna went to confront Augustus after each had sworn to die for the other

Augustus prefaced his remarks by a long history of man's desire for the empty bauble of power and then asked the two young men to decide his fate, whether he should be the emperor or a private citizen. Both conspirators swore that Augustus, so much more noble than Julius Caesar, should remain supreme in power as the rightful ruler of a grateful empire. Although the sentiment redounded to Augustus' credit, neither felt it more than weakness to want a republic when a monarchy could be maintained. But Augustus was not convinced that five generations of struggle to eminence proved anything more than that the people wanted democracy. Cinna, disclaiming this idea, even citing his grandfather's claim on the throne as evidence, urged Augustus to name a successor who could carry on this Augustan age to posterity. Cinna was surprised to hear himself so named. Although Maximus wavered after such a noble act by their ruler, Cinna remained resolute in his bloody plan: he will kill Augustus, put his bloody hand in that of Amelia, and marry her on Augustus' tomb.

A short time later Maximus revealed to his companion and confidant Euphorbus that he too loved Amelia, the freed man in turn urged his former master to kill Cinna and gain not only the girl but the emperor's gratitude. Maximus, after much argument, was repelled and yet intrigued by such a prospect. Just such a conflict existed in Cinna's breast as well; he loved the avenger but could not feel true hatred for the object, so dear was his own person to Augustus. Maximus suggested that these sentiments were enfeebling, though he felt the justice of their cause. Cinna, alone with his conscience, reasoned from cause to effect and decided to ask Amelia to release him from his promise of revenge.

Amelia greeted her lover with rejoicing, for she too had heard the news of Augustus' high regard for Cinna, she was, however, relentless in her desire for vengeance. When Cinna pleaded with her to return not only his love but that of Augustus as well, she replied that treason was the only answer to Augustus' tyranny. Finally he agreed to her demands, though not without a commentary on woman's ruthlessness.

In the meantime, perhaps thinking to better his own low position, Euphorbus went to Augustus with news of the plot against him. Augustus was more shocked at Cinna's treachery than at that of Maximus, who at least gave warning of his feelings, and he would have pardoned the latter had not Euphorbus lied and said that Maximus had committed suicide. In a soliloquy Augustus summarized the pity of it all. In the meantime Maximus proposed flight to Amelia as the best of a bad situation. When she spurned his love as traitorous to his friend, he in turn lamented the counsel of Euphorbus.

Augustus summoned Cinna and spoke of the leniency with which he had allowed his traditional enemy to live as recompense for ancient wrongs. For this, he declared, Cinna had planned to kill him at a religious ceremony in the Capitol. The emperor then offered all to Cinna, even though without the help of Augustus the young man could not succeed in his design. Cinna, unrepentant, refused to give Augustus satisfaction over his death.

Amelia and Livia then resolved the conflict, the former taking the blame on herself, even begging to die with Cinna, the lovers quarreled over the seeming break in love and honor, honor and love. Maximus then hastened to reveal his betrayal, through Euphorbus, of the plot. These circumstances moved Augustus to ask the friendship of those whom he most admired and loved. Amelia, the first to respond, was followed by the others, all moved by royal clemency. Livia commended her husband's generosity as a heavenly thing, a bright example to future rulers. Augustus humbly wished

it would be so and appointed the morrow
as the day of joyous sacrifice, doubly so

Critique

A typical Chinese classical play in four acts (with a prologue) of the Yuan dynasty (1259-1368), The Circle of Chalk is remarkable for the beauty of its lyrical verse. The plot of the original play is concerned with a case of murder and a disputed son solved by a Solomon-like judge. The love affair between the prince and the commoner was introduced by the German adapter, who also widened the application of the symbolic circle of chalk.

The Story

Chang hi tang, a beautiful girl of sixteen, was sold to a teahouse in Nanking by her mother. Her father, a market gardener and grower of silkworms, had been unable to pay his taxes, and in consequence he and his wife and children were driven from their home. Later, the father had hanged himself. Hi tang's brother, Chang ling, was opposed to her sale into the house of ill fame but, being a poor scholar, he could do nothing to help his family. He took a part of the money paid for his sister and left Nanking to seek his own fortune.

On her first night in the teahouse, Hi tang met Prince Po, one of the emperor's many sons, and the young man was struck with her beauty and many accomplishments. The girl drew a circle of chalk to symbolize her fate. But before their love could be fulfilled, another man visited the teahouse. Mr Ma, the mandarin and tax collector, outbid the prince and bought Hi tang as his concubine.

One year later, Hi-tang had given birth to a boy. Mr Ma, though a man given to sensual pleasure and money seeking, felt real love for the concubine. Naturally, his childless lawful wife was jealous.

One day Chang ling, in beggar's rags, appeared at the door of Mr Ma's house. Hi-tang did not at first recognize him. Then he told her that he had joined a secret society, the Brotherhood of the White Lotus, whose purpose was to take revenge on the oppressors of the poor. Mr Ma's name was marked in the black list, and the gangsters intended to murder him and plunder and burn his house. Hi tang tried to dissuade her brother by consulting the oracle. She drew a circle and threw a knife. Instead of striking inside the circle, the knife cut the chalk line, it seemed the gods did not approve.

of the crime Chang ling then agreed to reconsider the case. Hi tang gave him her fur jacket to protect him from cold.

Mrs Ma, who had seen the stranger, reported to Mr Ma that Hi tang had been talking to a man, obviously a lover, and had given away her fur jacket. Mr Ma was satisfied when Hi tang said that the man was only her brother.

On the same day Chow, an official of justice in the local courts, was invited to Mr Ma's house to discuss a legal point. Mr Ma was thinking of getting a divorce and raising Hi tang to the rank of wife. Divorce to Mrs Ma would mean the loss not only of her position but also of the inheritance of Mr Ma's property. Even if she remained the head wife, as Chow explained to her, the concubine and her boy would be the heirs to the property and she could expect to receive only a certain amount of allowance, as she was childless. She was desperate. But Chow was actually her paramour, so she could depend on his help.

Her solution came when Mr Ma wanted a drink. She put in the tea the poison brought by Chow. It was Hi tang who served the tea, so she became the suspect when Mr Ma dropped dead after taking the drink. She was put under arrest and sent to the prison.

Chu chu, the local judge, accepted a bribe from Mrs Ma. Her position was further strengthened by the testimony of a midwife who declared that it was really Mrs Ma who had given birth to the child and that of two coolies who remembered how they were entertained at a feast in celebration of the birth of Mrs Ma's child. Mrs Ma swore that Hi tang had murdered her master in order to obtain the child and the inheritance. Chow suggested the motive of revenge since Mr Ma had caused the death of her father. Hi tang, who had been kneeling inside a circle of chalk, was therefore convicted and sentenced to death.

At that moment a courier arrived from Peking with the news that the old emperor had died. The new emperor had ordered that all death sentences be suspended and that the judges and judged alike be summoned to Peking for imperial investigation. So Hi tang's life was saved for the time being. Chang ling, who had been in the crowd of people watching the trial, was angry at the kind of justice his sister received; he expressed his indignant doubt that the new emperor would be any more just than the old. His blasphemy was overheard and he, too, was put in the block.

Hi tang suffered greatly on the way to Peking under the escort of two soldiers. In a big snowstorm she saw her brother, also guarded by two soldiers, struggling onward. When he collapsed she took off her mantle to buy a glass of wine to revive him. The soldiers had their drinks, too, but did not pay much to the chagrin of the innkeeper. Chu chu, Chow, Mrs Ma, and the child were traveling in sedan chairs.

In the Imperial Palace the young emperor, who was Prince Po, kept thinking of the teahouse girl whom he had been unable to marry in Nanking a year before. When the prisoners from Nanking were brought before him he and Hi tang immediately recognized each other, but their recognition was not noticed by anyone else. He questioned her about her life in the teahouse and suggested that surely she remembered the young prince she had met on the night she entered the place. But it was his official duty to reestablish justice in China before he could declare his love again. He ordered a circle of chalk to be drawn on the floor wherein the child was placed. The two women were to pull the boy out of the circle, one grasping each arm. She who succeeded in pulling him out would prove herself his mother. Mrs Ma won with one pull, since Hi tang pulled only gently, not making the least effort. The emperor asked her why she did not pull with enough strength to win. Hi tang answered that a child's arms were tender and that to pull him hard would hurt him. Since a mother would never harm her own child, it was decided that Hi tang was the child's real mother. Also, Mrs Ma having sworn on oath that the false mother was also the murderess, the murder case was easily solved.

The emperor left his rod of justice in Hi tang's hand and let her pass sentence on the criminals. She pronounced the judgment that Chow and Chu chu be deprived of their offices and Mrs Ma should make herself a cup of tea, the kind of tea she should make was left to her conscience to decide. The emperor approved this judgment and appointed as Chu chu's successor Hi tang's brother Chang ling, whose crime had been pardoned when his criticism of the corruption in government found a sympathetic listener in the emperor, who shared the young scholar's zeal for reform.

After the court had been dismissed, the emperor held Hi tang for a private talk. She told him that she had had a dream on the first night she was brought to Mr Ma's house. She was alone, dozing, and she dreamed that a young lord climbed to her bed and loved her as a husband would his wife. The young man was Prince Po. And it was not a dream, for the prince had not given up his desire even after he was outbid, but had followed her to Mr Ma's house and ravished her while she was still a virgin. Thus, the prince had begotten the child. Hi tang was made empress.

This metrical romance, the second in chronological order of the surviving tales of Chrétien de Troyes, marks also the second period in that writer's work, one devoted to combining materials from the Arthurian cycle with classical elements drawn from Ovid, Vergil, Statius, and others. It is generally held that the central situation, the duping of Alis through the drinking of a potion, reflects the influence of an early Byzantine story, now lost, and there is some resemblance to the account of the wife of King Solomon who deceived her husband in the same way. The fusion of the materials, based as it may have been on a lost medieval manuscript, is clearly original, however, and delightful in its subtleties. Also interesting is the fact that this tale contains the writer's most detailed analysis of the anat-

Alexander, the older son of the Emperor of Greece and Constantinople, scorned to receive knighthood in his own country. Having heard of the famed King Arthur of Britain, the young prince was determined to emulate the brave and courteous knights of that monarch's court and to win knighthood by his own merits. Accordingly, he swore never to wear armor on his face or helmet upon his head until King Arthur himself should gird on his knightly sword. At last he was allowed to have his own way in spite of the disapproval of his father and his mother's grief at being separated from her son, and he set sail at once for Britain. With him went twelve noble companions and a store of rich treasure.

When Alexander and his friends arrived at the royal court in Winchester, King Arthur and Queen Guinevere welcomed them with gracious speech. All who saw him were impressed by the young Greek, not alone for his generosity but for his strong character and handsome appearance as well. Sir Gawain, a knight of great prowess and the nephew of the king, took him for his friend and companion, and King Arthur, about to make a journey into Brittany, included the young man in his retinue. On the trip Alexander and the damsel Soredamors, sister of Sir Gawain, fell deeply in love. Since each felt that such a love was hopeless, they did nothing but grow pale and sigh and tremble, so that Queen Guinevere, observing them, mistook their love sickness for the effects of the heaving sea.

King Arthur remained in Brittany through the summer, and during that time the young lovers were much perplexed and distressed by emotions they were unable to reveal to each other. At the beginning of October messengers arrived with news that Count Angres, who had been entrusted with the rule of the kingdom during the king's absence, was raising an army and preparing to withstand King Arthur on his return. Angered by this traitorous deed, the king transported a great host across the Channel and prepared to lay siege to London, where Count Angres had assembled his forces. Prince Alexander and his twelve companions were knighted while the king's army was encamped outside the city walls. Queen Guinevere's gift to the young knight was a white silk shirt on which Soredamors had embroidered strands of her own hair, indistinguishable from the golden thread of the design.

When Count Angres and his army slipped away from the city under cover of night and retreated to the strong castle at Windsor, King Arthur and his troops pursued the traitors and besieged the fortress. During the siege Alexander displayed great bravery and prowess. One night, while he was in attendance on the queen, Guinevere noticed that the gold thread on his shirt was tarnishing but that the golden hair of Soredamors was as lustrous as ever. So the damsel's deed was disclosed and Alexander rejoiced to wear on his person a token of the lady to whom he had vowed undying devotion.

A short time later Windsor Castle was taken through his wit and valor. He and several of his companions dressed in the armor of vanquished traitor knights and then went by a secret path into the fortress, where they killed many of the enemy and captured Count Angres. For this deed Alexander was awarded a gold cup which the king had promised to the most valiant of his knights. In the meantime, believing Alexander killed during the fighting inside the castle, Soredamors had revealed her love for the young prince. After the battle the knight received three joys and honors as the reward for his valor: the town he had captured, a kingdom in Wales, and, greatest of all, the hand of Soredamors.

From this union was born a handsome son, Cligés. Meanwhile, in Constantinople, the emperor died without hearing again from his older son, and Alis, the younger heir, assumed the rule of the empire after receiving a report that Alexander was also dead. Hearing that his brother had taken the crown, Alexander set out to reclaim his kingdom, accompanied by his wife, his small son, and forty valiant knights from King Arthur's court. When Alis learned that his older brother was alive, an amicable arrangement was made whereby Alis would rule in name only and the affairs of the kingdom would be entrusted to Alexander. Also, Alis promised never to marry or have heirs, so that Cliges would in time reign over Greece and Constantinople. Before Cliges had grown to manhood, however, Alexander died of a pestilence and Soredamors of grief.

Not long afterward advisers began to urge Alis to take a wife, with the result that the emperor was moved to break the oath made to his brother. The bride proposed was the daughter of the Emperor of Germany, the Princess Fenice, prophetically named for the phoenix bird. The princess had previously been affianced to the Duke of Saxony, however, and that incensed nobleman felt that he had a prior claim to her hand. While arrangements for the wedding were being made, Cliges and Fenice fell deeply in love. About the same time the duke sent his nephew to proclaim that his uncle's claim to the princess would be defended against the Greeks. His defiant speech so angered Cliges that he challenged the young Saxon to trial by arms and in the melee unhorsed him and routed his followers. By this time, although Fenice loved Cliges dearly, she prudently decided that she would not yield herself to either the uncle or the nephew, and with the help of her nurse Thessala, a sorceress, she planned to remain a virgin. A potion served unwittingly, to the bridegroom by his nephew made it seem to the emperor that in his dreams he possessed his bride, though he never did so in reality.

On the return trip to Constantinople, the nephew of the Duke of Saxony set an ambush for the travelers. When Cliges killed the treacherous knight and the duke offered a reward for Cliges' head, that resourceful young knight cut off the head of an enemy and affected a disguise as his father had done before him. Fenice was abducted, however, during the battle that followed. Overtaking her captors, Cliges killed all but one, who survived to carry to the duke news of what happened. The conflict ended when Cliges, inspired by his love for Fenice, defeated the duke in single combat. The lovers then parted, Fenice going to Constantinople with her husband and Cliges traveling to England, there to fulfill his father's wish that he receive knighthood at the hands of King Arthur.

At a great tournament on the plain before Oxford, Cliges, changing his armor each day, defeated King Arthur's most valiant knights and bore himself so bravely that he became the subject of much speculation concerning his origin and whereabouts, for the young warrior retired to his lodgings every night and kept away from the feasting that followed each day's tourney. As the Black Knight he defeated mighty Sagremore, as the Green Knight, Sir Lancelot of the Lake, as the Vermilion Knight, Sir Percival of Wales. On the fourth day, disguised as the White Knight, he would have defeated Sir Gawain, his uncle, if King Arthur had not intervened. Then Cliges appeared in his own person and at the royal banquet revealed his name and told his story, to the pleasure and astonishment of all King Arthur and Sir Gawain, in particular, were delighted to find their young kinsman so brave in conduct, so pleasing in modesty and knightly courtesy.

On his return to Greece, Cliges learned that Fenice had missed him as much as he had desired her. Since their great love could no longer be denied, they were able, with the help of Thessala and an artful stonecutter, to devise a plan that would ensure their happiness. From the artisan, John, Cliges got possession of a tower in which the builder had constructed hidden chambers with secret entrances and exits. Thessala then concocted a potion which put Fenice into a trance so deep that all except three skeptical physicians from Salerno believed her dead. But the three doctors were slain by a mob of indignant women before they could restore Fenice to consciousness by acts of torture, and the body of the empress was placed, amid great mourning throughout the kingdom, in a sepulcher which John had built. From there she was taken in secret by Cliges, restored to life, and hidden in one of the secret chambers of the tower.

There, for a year and two months, they were free to take their pleasure with each other as they pleased. At the end of that time Fenice began to pine for the out of doors, and John revealed a secret door which opened upon a walled garden filled with beautiful blooming trees and flowers. Cligés and Fenice had much joy in their hidden paradise until, one day, a hunter searching for his lost hawk climbed the wall and saw the lovers asleep in each other's arms. Although Cliges awoke and wounded the hunter, the man escaped to tell the emperor of what he had seen. Alis dispatched troops to the tower, but Cligés and Fenice had already fled. Arrested, John accused the emperor of having tried to wrong Cliges by marrying and expecting to produce an heir; then the artisan revealed how Alis had been tricked by the potion he had drunk on his wedding night, so that he had never possessed his wife except in his dreams. The emperor swore that he could never again be happy until he had taken his revenge for the shame and disgrace that had been put upon him.

In the meantime Cligés and Fenice, with Thessala's aid, had eluded their pursuers and enlisted the aid of King Arthur, who promised to fill a thousand ships with knights and three thousand more with men at arms in order to help Cliges regain his rights. Before the mighty expedition could set sail, however, messengers arrived in Britain with word that Alis had died of rage and grief because the lovers had escaped him. With Fenice, Cliges returned to rule over Greece and Constantinople, and there the two lived happily in love, as husband and wife, lover and mistress.

Since that time, however, every emperor, remembering the story of Fenice and her potions, has had little confidence in his empress and has kept her closely guarded, attended by no man except one who has been an enunch since his boyhood.

COLLECTED POEMS

Author Walter de la Mare (1873-1956)

Walter de la Mare published his first book of poems, Songs of Childhood, in 1902, his last, O Lovely England, in 1953, three years before his death, and his career, spanning more than half a century, was productive to the end. Since five books of new lyrics and a supplementary volume of earlier verse followed the 1941 edition of his Collected Poems, this collection cannot in any sense be regarded as complete. Rather, it marks an interval stage of revision and regrouping of work which de la Mare wished to preserve and present in its final form. A number of the poems have been slightly altered from their original versions, others have been regrouped by subject matter, and some have been omitted from earlier single volumes. Most of these have been reprinted in a second series, Collected

Rhymes and Verses (1944) In the light of these changes it seems certain that at the time the poet considered this volume the definitive edition of his most serious work

"Delamarian" has come to stand for that blending of supernal beauty and the supernatural, nature and mankind tinged delicately with "theotherworlde," as Henry C Duffin, friend and critic of the poet, has styled it Poems 1906 opens on this note in "Shadow"

Even the beauty of the rose doth cast,
When its bright fervid noon is past,
A still and lengthening shadow in the dust,
 Till darkness come
And take its strange dream home

The poem concludes with recognition of the "dark and livelong hint of death" which is the shadow of life haunting us into eternity In this first group is an other poem, "England," which presents the other side of his brightest coin

No lovelier hills than thine have laid
My tired thoughts to rest
No peace of lovelier valleys made
Like peace within my breast

The poem continues with a celebration of the woods, "a refuge green and cool," and seas that "like trumpets peal," and concludes

Thine be the grave whereto I come,
And thine my darkness be

Neither the sonnets nor the attempts to re create characters from Shakespeare are equal to de la Mare's lyric or descriptive poems, though the selections which are recalled from childhood display his unique ability to "become as a little child," often with startling results, as in "Fear" or "Echo," in which phantasms arise and will not be put down Then, too, the lovely idyl which is childhood takes shape in "The Mermaids" and "Myself," but always with a touch of strangeness, a shadow

title poem, too well known to be repeated but beloved by all, and many others which exhibit the same masterly blending of clear, singing music and the twilight atmosphere of a world of fantasy and dreams, qualities that made his poetry popular "All That's Past" suggests in modern runes the wonder and antiquity of winds, brooks, minerals, the rose, and immemorial man

Very old are we men
Our dreams are tales
Told in dim Eden
By Eve's nightingales,
We wake and whisper awhile,
But the day gone by Silence and sleep like fields
Of amaranth lie

From this past, against the background of "Arabia" or other romantic, distant lands, Walter de la Mare takes his reader on a pilgrimage from light to shadow, from the real to the unreal "Martha," one of the unreal, tells stories "in the hazel glen" of fairies and gnomes that the poet makes real For those who believe that de la Mare is limited in subject and mood, "The Keys of Morning" presents the poignant wisdom of a child, Louisa, who faces death with an understanding beyond that of adults

Motley (1918) and The Veil (1922) mark the maturation of the delamarian style the most exact and exacting words in the most carefully chosen places, the rhythmic cadences more syllabic than metered, the rhymes more individually and unmistakably set in a perfection of sentiment Here, too, the poet's themes match the times, for de la Mare was against the Philistines, "Mrs Grundy," and all those who gloat in righteousness Here is one of the most perfect poems, "Music," which takes one away from this earth to the place where "all her lovely things even lovelier grow" The antique though rememberable past comes forth and the poet reaches a synthesis with time

realism is discernible in the later poems
 "The Old Angler," obviously a stylized person, fishes in eternity though he himself, his boat, and his surroundings are often naturalistically displayed "Tit mouse" is an exercise of the physical senses with symbolic overtones

This tiny son of life this spright
 By momentary Human sought
 Plume will his wing in the dappling light
 Clash timbrel shrill and gay—
 And into time's enormous nought,
 Sweet fed, will flit away

In this section great love lyrics appear, and also humor—that most difficult element to place in lyric poetry—as in "Maerchen"

Soundless the moth flit, cnsps the death
 watch tick
 Crazed in her shaken harbour bird did sing
 Slow wreathed the grease adown from soot clogged wick
 The Cat looked long and softly at the King

The section closes with "An Epitaph" (de la Mare wrote many such, all wonderful)

Last, Stone, a little yet,
 And then this dust forget
 But thou, fair Rose, bloom on
 For she who is gone
 Was lovely too, nor would she grieve to be Sharing in solitude her dreams with thee

The Fleeting (1933) is full of surprises, new cadences, startling themes, odd forms "The Feckless Dinner Party," for example, contains all these and satiric thrusts against an insane society madly orbiting to death, and led by a butler,
 Toomes Here, too, is "Slum Child," de la Mare's bitterest criticism of a society which allows a child to go frightened and unloved into "evil, filth, and poverty" as

"epitome of man's disgrace", yet there is hope of finding "living bread in stones and "a self beyond surmise" Echoes of an early note however, sound with the same chill magic in such a fine though macabre poem as "The House"

Mother, it's such a lonely house
 The child cried and the wind sighed
 A narrow but a lovely house
 The mother replied

Child it is such a narrow house
 The ghost cried, and the wind sighed
 'A narrow and a lonely house
 The withering grass replied

If the poet could not pass a graveyard without stopping, neither can the reader overlook the resulting poems, especially the epitaph of "Isaac Meek" who "inherited the earth" or that of "J—H— Aged 34" who sleeps "Beneath a Motionless Yew," remembered faintly
 by his ancient widow

Memory (1938), containing as it does echoes from earlier poems even a reworking of earlier themes under similar titles returns to the essential de la Mare of childhood of ancient ways, of shadows extended backward in time, all expressed in the short lyric, the close cropped line, the sentient rhyme, the evocative symbol
 The title poem suggests that memory is a "strange deceiver" who brings back the relevant and irrelevant, "poor and trivial, rich and rare," but refuses to yield "grave fact and love's fantasy" The poet then cites, autobiographically though symbolically, instances of memory's caprices

The loss of a child, "Sallie's Musical Box," is as poignant a short lyric as exists in the language

Once it made music, tiny, frail, yet sweet—
 Bead note of bird where earth and elf land meet
 Now its thin tinkling stirs no more, since she
 Whose toy it was has gone and taken the key

Here, again, is the earlier theme of lost rapture, but now without the Blakian quality noted in the earlier Songs of Childhood

Walter de la Mare may have considered this his last volume of poems, published as it was when he was sixty-eight. Fortunately, some of his loveliest writing, like the beautiful and moving "Winged Chariot," came later. In this book, however, the last lines of the last poem, "Snow," appropriately epitomize his unique poetry

A marvel of light,
Whose verge of radiance seems Frontier of paradise
The bourne of dreams

O tranquil silent, cold—
Such loveliness to see
The heart sighs answer, Benedicite!

COLLECTED POEMS, 1934-1952

Author Dylan Thomas (1914-1953)

First published 1952

When Dylan Thomas died at the age of thirty-nine he was, for a poet in this century, extraordinarily popular. His poetry had been read and admired for years, a paean of praise greeted his collected works, and still more appreciation was accorded him after his death. However, many reputable critics, fellow poets, and general readers have disliked, derided, and dismissed his work on the grounds that it is merely sibilant raving. These contradictory reactions are explained by the fact that Thomas was primarily a violently emotional poet. The strength of his feelings thus either forcibly attracts or repels his readers.

The poems make an emotional impact, on first reading, that subsequent analyses will not displace. With the exception of Ezra Pound, Thomas is probably the most obscure of the great poets of this century. Whether he is a major or a minor poet will be established only by the evaluation of critics in the future, as no contemporary can have the necessary perspective to place a poet accurately in such a hierarchy. Undeniably, Dylan Thomas' poetry is great in kind, to what degree posterity will decide.

A poet who is both very obscure and very popular is an anomaly, but Thomas is not in this position by virtue of belonging to a particular school of verse, nor by writing in a recognized poetic convention. Nor is he socially or politically committed. His poetry is an affirmation of life. "These poems are written for the love of man and in praise of God, and I'd be a damn' fool if they weren't." The truth of this assertion in the introductory note to his volume of collected verse is shown in every successful poem that he wrote. His early poetry is egocentric; he was writing of his own private feelings in these poems of birth, death, and sex and the glory he found in these themes was entirely personal. His later poems show a far wider human interest and an increasing concern for mankind.

Throughout his work a unity of vision is apparent. He sees death in birth and resurrection in death. He is aware of the hate in all love and of the power of love to transcend suffering. He comprehends the simultaneous glory and corruption in life, and the fact that all forms of life are interdependent and inseparable. "I see the boys of summer" is a dialogue between the young poet who sees the destruction of the future in the present, and the adolescent boys living their first passionate and confusing loves. The successive images of light and dark, heat and cold, throughout the poem emphasize this contrast. The poem is filled with pleasure and pain conjoined, and with gain and loss. The polarity of these emotions is explicitly stated in the final, joyful image:

O see the poles are kissing as they

"If I were tickled by the rub of love" is a difficult poem, to be understood by remembering the comprehensiveness of Thomas' idea of life. In the context of the poem, "tickled" appears to mean completely involved with, or wholly absorbed by, but the term necessarily retains the connotations of amusement and enjoyment. "Rub," as well as having sensual implications, also means doubt, difficulty, or strain. The poet says that if he were "tickled by the rub of love," he would not fear the fall from Eden or the flood if he were "tickled" by the birth of a child, he would not fear death or war. Desire is spoken of as devilish and is provoked by the drug that's smoking in a girl

And curling round the bud that forks her eye

This harsh image is followed by a statement of the poet's consciousness that he carries his own old age and death already within him:

An old man's shank one marrowed with my bone,
And all the herrings smelling in the sea,
I sit and watch the worm beneath my nail
Wearing the quick away

The feeling of fear is strong, and neither love, sex, beauty, nor birth is the "rub"; the solution is in wholeness or unity:

I would be tickled by the love that is Man be my metaphor

Thomas' poetical development is unusual in that the thought in his later poems is usually not at all obscure. These poems are also less cluttered with material; there are fewer esoteric symbols. Ideas are developed at greater length, and tension is relaxed. The close attention to rhythm and structure persists, and the evocative power of his language is enhanced. Thomas' genius lay in the brilliant and highly personal use of the words with which his penetrating perception is communicated. The ambiguity of his language parallels the reciprocal nature of his images. He delights in punning and the various meanings of a word or image will often reverberate throughout an entire stanza.

"Poem on his birthday" is a good example of his method. The last poems are often, as this one is, set in the Welsh countryside. The heron is always in his poems a religious or priestly symbol. In the first stanza "herons spire and spear", in the third "herons walk in their shroud," and in the ninth he writes of the "druid herons' vows and of his 'tumbledown tongue'"—this last a beautifully fused image of the action of the tongue of a pealing bell and the impetuous voice of the poet. In the tenth stanza he speaks of the "nimbus bell" which is a magical goal. By this use of compound images Thomas explores and thoroughly penetrates his subject. All aspects of the experience are involved, and pain, happiness, grief, and joy are equally present in this expression of unified sensibility.

This inclusive view of the universe is sometimes incoherent in his early poems, sometimes illuminating. One of the finest of his early poems is titled "The force that through the green fuse drives the flower." The symbolism here is not obscure and the emotions are controlled by the form of the poem. The third line of each of the four five-line stanzas has only three or four words and is the main clause of the three-line sentence in which the theme of each stanza is stated. The last two lines of each stanza begin with the words "And I am dumb." After the dramatic first two lines the short solemn third lines ready the reader for the equally forceful antithesis. The poem ends with a rhyming couplet

And I am dumb to tell the lover's tomb,
How at my sheet goes the same crooked worm

The theme of the poem is that the forces of nature are the same as those that drive man and that these forces both create and destroy. The careful structure of this poem is typical of Thomas' craftsmanship. He has been called undisciplined. He is not, but his unfettered imagination can confuse his meaning and his symbolism remains, in spite of pains taking analysis, almost inexplicable.

The sonnet sequence, "Altarwise by owl light," is Thomas' most difficult poetry. The sonnets contain lines and passages of great beauty, and the overall movement, from horror and suffering toward the idea of the redemption of man by the Resurrection of Christ after the Crucifixion, is clear. But the sequence as a whole remains too compressed and fragmentary to be successful. Thomas has failed mainly to communicate the bases of the intense suffering and hope that he so obviously felt.

In "After the funeral," an elegy for a cousin, Ann Jones, Thomas expresses both his own grief and the character of the dead woman. It is, as the poet points out, written with a magniloquence that exceeds the subject's,

Though this for her is a monstrous
image blindly
Magnified out of praise

This manner contrasts so sharply with the humble and suffering woman that the poignancy of the portrait is increased. His grief

Shakes a desolate boy who slit his throat
In the dark of the coffin and sheds dry leaves

The clear-sighted description of the woman after the expression of such grief is very moving.

I know her scrubbed and sour humble hands Lie with religion in their cramp her thread bare Whisper in a damp word, her wits drilled hollow,
Her fist of a face died clenched on a round pain

The sonnet sequence and the elegy give some indication of Thomas' later themes, where religious faith and a concern for mankind are evident.

During the second world war Thomas spent several years in London, where he was deeply moved by German air raids on the city. This reaction is very clear in his fourth volume, Deaths and Entrances. The well-known "A refusal to Mourn the Death, by Fire, of a Child in London" is both an affirmation of Christian faith and an expression of cold fury at such a death. The poet feels that the event was too great for grief and that no elegy should be written for the child until the end of the world. Writing of grief at the time would be as if to murder her again.

I shall not murder
The mankind of her going with a grave truth

The child is representative of all mankind and of all London's dead, a view which gives her a certain greatness.

Deep with the first dead lies London's daughter

The last line of the poem is ambivalent; it communicates both the irrevocability, finality, and cruelty of death and the Christian belief of the deathlessness of the soul.

After the first death there is no other

After the war Thomas was concerned to recapture in his poetry the world of his childhood. The rhythm of these poems is more relaxed and flowing than that of his early work, and the landscapes are glowing and full of color and wonder. These lyrics are poems in praise of the created world Thomas' skill with words and rhythm evokes the whole Welsh countryside, and his unique imaginative vision makes the places his own. He has here communicated his great reverence and love of life. The unified vision of life remains, and Thomas is still aware of the presence of death in life, although this is no longer a cause of anguish as it was in the early poems.

In "Fern Hill," Thomas describes his youth on a farm. He has re-created youthful feeling that the whole world was his, there is an atmosphere of timelessness, a lulling of the consciousness of time's destruction, which the poet in recapturing his youthful feeling has conveyed without negating his manhood's knowledge.

Dylan Thomas was a highly emotional poet whose lyrics express a unified vision of life. His poetry contains many of the aspects of birth and death, fear, grief, joy, and beauty. From the violent, anguished poems of his youth, his power over his "craft or sullen art" increased until he was able to channel his special mode of feeling in ways which enabled him to speak for all men.

And you shall wake, from country
sleep this dawn and each first dawn, Your faith as deathless as the outcry of the ruled sun

Principal personages

JULIUS CAESAR Roman governor and general in Gaul

VERCINGETORIX rebel leader of the Gauls

ORGETORIX, a chieftain of the Helvetii

DIVITIACUS, a Gaul loyal to the Romans

ARIOVISTUS, a chieftain of the Germanic tribes

Two thousand years ago the Roman Empire expanded north and westward into the area now known as France and Germany, and in 59 B.C. Julius Caesar, already famous as a general and administrator, was appointed to govern the Roman territories inhabited by the Gauls. When he went to Gaul he faced a situation requiring strong, active government, and as he proceeded he kept records of the events of his governorship, a record eventually to be known as Caesar's Commentaries. The Commentaries are an important record for posterity, despite the fact that many generations of English-speaking schoolchildren learning Latin have found them repugnant as a classroom exercise. Scholars and general readers have wished that Caesar had left a more complete record than he did. To expect a detailed history in the Commentaries is, however, to misunderstand the writer's purpose. His intention was not to write a definitive history of the period of the Gallic Wars, but rather to put down in writing what he considered, as the Roman general and administrator, most important.

No one can understand the Commentaries without having some concept of the flux of migration and its consequent pressures in Europe during the first century before Christ. The Gallic peoples were under pressure from the Germanic peoples across the Rhine River, tribes that coveted the rich lands of the Gauls and were, in their turn, under pressure from migrations still farther to the east. Rome faced a double threat from the Germanic tribes. First, they were pressing constantly southward, eventually they would invade and dismember the Roman Empire. The Germanic tribes also threatened Rome indirectly by the unrest they created in Gaul Being a man of action and a clear analyst of the situation confronting Rome, Caesar took war home to the Germans

In the Commentaries he gives a chronological account of his activities in Gaul from the time of his succession to the governorship of Gallia Narbonensis in 59 B C to the end of the Gallic revolt led by Vercingetorix late in the same decade During those years Caesar and his Roman legions were set first against one group of tribes and then another Most of the sections of the book carry such headings as "Campaign against Arrovistus," "Expedition against the Unelli" "First expedition into Germany," and "Siege and Sack of Avaricum" Only two sections the first section of Book I and the second section of Book VI, are not about actual battle operations or preparations The former is a description of Gaul and its inhabitants, the latter, an account of customs of the Gauls and Germans

In his comments about the Gauls, Caesar stirs the imagination and stimulates curiosity by giving only enough information to make the reader wish more had been written for example, an account of the druids' place in Gallic culture and the religious rites at which the druids officiated would be welcome In some other cases, however, Caesar taxes the imagination, as in reporting certain kinds of animals as existing in the Hyrcanian Forest One such animal is an elk that is captured, says Caesar, by partly cutting trees the elk leans against to rest, the animal has no joints in the legs and once down cannot rise Caesar also reports a fabulous ox with but one horn growing from the middle of the forehead Such reports, when compared with other natural histories of the period do not detract from the value of the Commentaries, for in Caesar's time such reports were generally taken seriously, however absurd they may seem today

Caesar's account of the Gallic Wars reminds us that war has been a continual factor in human affairs As one example of the fury and effectiveness of war in ancient times, Caesar comments at the end of his account of the battle with the Nervii "This battle being ended, and the name and nation of the Nervii almost reduced to annihilation, their old men, together with the boys and women whom we have stated had been collected together in the inlets and the marshes, when this battle had been reported to them, convinced that nothing was an obstacle to the conquerors, and nothing safe to the conquered, sent ambassadors to Caesar with the consent of all who survived, and surrendered themselves to him and in recounting the calamity of their state, they said that their senators were reduced from six hundred to three, that of sixty thousand men who could bear arms scarcely five hundred remained" Another example of the character of these ancient wars is the siege of Avaricum, at which, according to Caesar, scarcely eight hundred people of all ages and both sexes escaped the city when it was taken, out of a population of forty thousand, the rest were killed

Caesar the Roman administrator is apparent throughout the Commentaries He writes in an impersonal fashion, however, much as though he were preparing a favorable report to the Roman Senate Only rarely does an individual come through to the reader as a real personality Even Caesar himself, whose name figures more largely than any other, remains an official and a general, rather than a clearly visualized person The Gallic and Germanic chieftains who opposed him are little more than names, and the same is true of the lieutenants who served under him The only outstanding exception to this general statement is the passage concerning Sextus Baculus who, sick though he was, arose from his bed and saved the day for the Romans, rallying their forces when they were attacked in a camp at Aduatuca and fighting bravely until he had to be carried back to rest

ing readers are those portions of the Commentaries which deal with Britain and Caesar's invasions of Britain. Most of us know all too little about the early history of that part of our heritage, and Caesar's account is the earliest in any Roman documents. Caesar tells of his first expedition, an abortive one, made in 55 B.C., and his second and more successful at tempt the following year, an invasion which paved the way for the Roman occupation that was to last until the fifth century after Christ. For his second invasion he built and assembled a fleet of more than eight hundred vessels, a logistical success noteworthy in any era of history. This fleet carried two thousand cavalrymen with their mounts, and five Roman legions, each consisting at that time of about five thousand men.

Caesar was a remarkable man, one of the greatest in human history, in the sense that greatness may be defined as leaving an indelible mark on the pages of history. Few such men have lived, fewer still have left written records for posterity, and none has ever left a document to compare with Caesar's Commentaries. The book occupies a unique place in the written records of the Western world. In addition to its value as history, it also deserves to be read as an example of the concise report presented with a style and flavor all its own.

One of the most modest and unassuming books ever written, The Compleat Angler has preserved its quality of evergreen freshness through more than three hundred editions since its first appearance in 1653. Its importance as a practical handbook on the angler's art has long since passed, although its appeal remains perennial to anyone who has ever sat for hours on the bank of a creek, with a cane pole and a can of worms, while waiting patiently for a horny-headed chub to take the hook, or has crept up behind some bushes at dawn to lay a fly in water swirling around a shaded rock where the ruffle is guarded by hungry trout. What survives is the pastoral beauty of woodland, meadow, and stream, charmingly yet vividly drawn, the mood of pure pleasure that a sport like fishing holds for the contemplative man, and above all the author's ability to convey a message of fellowship and peace to all "honest, civil, quiet men" in an age of turmoil and revolution.

Izaak Walton, who wrote The Compleat Angler in a decade of religious and political ferment, himself remained serene and detached from the disturbances of his age. Aptly subtitled "The Contemplative Man's Recreation," his book is addressed to the "honest angler." "We anglers," he declares, "all love one another." In his Epistle to the Reader prefacing the third edition, he wrote:

And though this discourse may be liable to some exceptions, yet I cannot doubt but that most readers may receive so much pleasure or profit by it as may make it worthy the time of their perusal, if they be not very busy men. And I am the willingest to justify the pleasant part of it because though it is known I can be serious at seasonable times yet the whole Discourse is, or rather was a picture of my own disposition, especially in such days and times as I have laid aside business and gone a fishing with honest Nat and R. Roe but they are gone, and with them most of my pleasant hours even as a shadow that passeth away and returns not

Even a believer in the un strenuous life—the indoors man or woman—will be charmed by Izaak Walton, whose book is a highly personal treatise on the art of angling, a work of fascinating though not always reliable natural history, an anthology of reflective passages on the condition of man, and an example of the almost lost art of graceful writing

The author opens his discourse on a fine, fresh morning in May when Piscator, by stretching his legs up Tottenham Hill, overtakes Venator and Auceps. The latter is headed toward "a friend's house who mews a hawk for me, which I now long to see," and Venator hopes "to bestow another day or two in hunting the Otter." As the three walk along, each extols his favorite sport. First Auceps describes the beauty of his falcons as they soar high into his element, the Air. Venator commends his element, the Earth, and praises the pleasure of men who hunt "the stately Stag, the generous Buck, the wild Boar, the cunning Otter, the crafty Fox, and the fearful Hare." Both Auceps and Venator look somewhat down their noses at angling, believing it to be an easy art, but Piscator is so persuasive in defense of his element, Water, and so convincing on the importance of fish and the antiquity of his sport that, after Auceps drops off to see his hawk, Venator decides he would like to learn more from his new friend, the fisherman. Piscator agrees that they shall first spend one day in hunting the otter, a notorious killer of fish, and then Venator shall be gin his education in the art of angling.

At the stream Piscator demonstrates his skill by catching a chub (for it is the middle of the day and trout will not bite before evening) and when Venator objects to wasting time on such a rough, tasteless fish, Piscator proves the chub can be made delicious by proper dressing. The next day's instruction is on the catching of trout. Says Piscator, "The Trout is usually caught with a worm, or a minnow, which some call a Penk, or with a fly, viz either a natural or an artificial fly concerning which three I will give you some observations and directions." The names of the best worms for trout are strange to twentieth century ears: there is the Lob worm, the Brandling, the Gilt tail, the Twachel. But with charming detail Piscator tells where to find them and how to put them on the hook. He commends minnows highly, for "a large Trout will come as fiercely at a Minnow, as the highest mettled hawk doth seize on a partridge, or a greyhound on a hare."

Venator is unsuccessful in his first try at trout, but Piscator catches three brace. When he loses a big one his comment is a model of restraint for fishermen: "Nay, the Trout is not lost, for pray take notice, no man can lose what he never had." When Venator insists that he should learn to tie artificial flies, Piscator names twelve kinds "to angle with upon the top of the water," among them the Moonish fly and the Dark Drake fly. Then he gives instructions for the tying of flies and how to fish with them. All of this chapter on the trout is charmingly interspersed with references to and quotations from Bacon, the classics, and the Bible.

So it is with the other types of angling and other fish. For Piscator is thorough and his lessons take Venator (by now, of course, an ardent angler) from the grayling to the salmon to the tench to the eel to the gudgeon to the miller's thumb. Walton rounds off Part I of The Compleat Angler with discussions of rivers and fish ponds ("and how to order them") and with directions for making a line

Written by Walton's young friend Charles Cotton, whose additions are now an integral part of the text, Part II returns (this time with Piscator Junior and Viator) to what is obviously the great love of both authors, fishing for trout. Here we have more directions on technique (including one called 'Daping, Dabbing, or Dibbling') and more on what flies are best for what months. August, for instance, demands a Harry-Long Legs, "the body made of bear's dun and blue wool mixed, and a brown hackle feather over all." But Cotton, like Izaak Walton, is also a lover of fish well cooked, and so he includes a recipe for trout that is, to say the least, elaborate among the ingredients (aside from the trout) are beer, white wine, salt, lemon rind, horse radish root, "a handsome little fagot of rosemary, thyme, and winter savory," butter, and ginger. Having exhausted the possibilities of angling at the top, the middle, and the bottom for trout and grayling, Piscator Junior concludes his instructions to Viator by apologizing for having "tired you sufficiently."

But no one can grow tired (either sufficiently or insufficiently) of The Compleat Angler. True, a great deal of the information it contains is of little value to the present-day fisherman who may never see the Trent or the Severn, never feel on the end of his line a barbel or a bleak. He will, however, revel in Izaak Walton's (and Cotton's) tender consideration for the smallest detail of angling, and through the whole book he will feel the presence of the author, a man of charm, scholarship, and propriety. He will even find a special kind of morality, for Sir Izaak at one point apparently fears he may be making the sport too attractive; he suggests that a time be set when each man should "leave fishing, and fall to his business." Most of all, Walton is a writer. His style is polished and gentle, as befits a description of angling, and his sentences move at a leisurely pace, the pace of a man carefully working up a trout stream. As long as there are fish in rivers and readers who enjoy good writing, The Compleat Angler will be read and loved.

out his adult life. Along with this problem, the complications introduced into it by the feminist movement strongly concerned him also. While his Scandinavian contemporaries, Henrik Ibsen and Bjørnsterne Bjørnson, were defending the rights of women in their plays, Strindberg was pleading the cause of masculine supremacy. His relatively early play Comrades is an example of his attempt to deal with this problem through comic means. Here he is illustrating the impossibility of a marriage based on equal rights and, along with it, the shallowness, meanness, and actual viciousness of those females who aspire to masculine prerogatives. However, though they obviously have Strindberg's sympathy, the triumphant males here seem little better than the conniving females whom they defeat. The play, inferior to the best of Strindberg, is an excellent example of his early work and interests.

When Dr. Ostermark visited his painter friend Axel, he found that Axel was married to a young feminist named Bertha, herself an aspiring artist. Axel explained the conditions of his marriage: the two were to live, not as husband and wife, but as comrades, each with equal rights, each free to achieve artistic expression in his own way. Dr. Ostermark, a widower who, earlier in life, had been divorced, was dubious about the whole thing.

While they were talking, a male model arrived. Axel explained that the model was hired for Bertha and that he, forced to paint commercially to pay for Bertha's art lessons, could not afford one. Carl Starck, a Swedish army officer, and his wife joined the company. They were shocked that the model posed in the nude and that Bertha was left alone with him.

After the company had gone, Bertha returned. There was a slight altercation over finances, but Bertha kept the argument subdued because she had a favor to ask of Axel. Both had submitted paintings to an important show. It seemed certain that Axel's would be accepted by the jury, but there was much doubt about Bertha's. She begged Axel to use his influence—especially on the wife of the jury's chairman—to have her painting accepted. At first Axel claimed that to do so would be unsporting, but Bertha and her two friends, the masculine female, Abel, and the effeminate male, Willmer, finally convinced him to make the attempt. They even talked him into wearing the ribbon to a Russian decoration which he had vowed never to wear.

Axel carried out his wife's mission, returned, and then left again as the result of an argument. During his absence Abel arrived with the news that Axel's own painting had been rejected by the jury. A subsequent letter confirmed her statement: Bertha was triumphant. She and Abel gloated over the downfall of the male.

After Abel had gone, Bertha was visited by a Mrs. Hall, who explained that she was the divorced wife of Dr. Ostermark. The doctor, she claimed, had left her penniless with two young daughters twenty years before. Hearing that Dr. Ostermark was in Paris and that Bertha was a leading feminist, she had come to Bertha for help in devising a plan of vengeance. Bertha promised that she would present Mrs. Hall and her two daughters to the unsuspecting doctor at a masquerade party which she and Axel were to give the following evening.

Bertha planned that the party was also to further Axel's humiliation: she had ordered a dancing girl's costume for him to wear. When Axel returned, the quarrel over finances was resumed. Bertha taunted Axel with the charge that he was quibbling because her painting had been accepted and his had not. This charge angered him. When he saw his costume for the masquerade, he left again, completely enraged.

Abel and Bertha devised still another humiliation for Axel: they planned to arrange for the rejected painting to be brought home during the party. While they were contemplating their success, Willmer arrived with liquor and tobacco which they had ordered as supplies for a pseudo masculine orgy. Willmer agreed to see that the painting was brought in at the right time. When he tried to make love to Bertha, she slapped and insulted him. As he left, Abel warned Bertha that it was dangerous to turn a friend into an enemy.

Bertha waited hours that night for Axel to come home. When he finally did come in, she attempted to placate him with genuinely feminine wiles, but he informed her that it was too late for her to become feminine, he had regarded her as a comrade for too long. Besides, he had just been with a woman who was truly a woman. His intentions were to divorce her. Also, having learned from Willmer that she had mismanaged his finances, he intended to demand financial reparations as well. Bertha was reduced to purely female pleading, but Axel was adamant. His only concession was to hold off the proceeding until after the party.

At the party, everything went wrong for Bertha. Axel refused to wear the effeminate costume. Starck recognized Mrs. Hall's daughters as a pair of prostitutes who had once accosted him and a fellow officer. Then Dr. Östermark, confronted by Mrs. Hall, who by that time was too drunk to stand, revealed that he had divorced the woman twenty years before because she was a confirmed dipsomaniac and that the two daughters were not his at all but the results of a subsequent marriage or liaison.

Bertha's final blow was the return of the rejected painting, not Axel's, but Bertha's. Axel confessed that, like a good comrade, he had switched numbers on the paintings so that Bertha's might have the advantage of his name. The advantage had not been enough, it proved, to overcome the poor workmanship. When Willmer admitted arranging for its return during the party, Axel threw him out bodily.

Bertha now resorted to taunts inspired by jealousy. Axel was getting rid of her, she claimed, because he was in love with Abel. Axel assured her that the notion was preposterous—no more feminists for him. He had, he admitted, a womanly woman to take her place.

Defeated, Bertha begged to be allowed to see him again. He would see her, he agreed, but in the place where one ought to see comrades, in the café. At home he would see his wife.

The masque, popular in sixteenth and seventeenth century England, was originally composed of dancing, pageantry, and processions. Masques were performed in the homes of noblemen and were usually presented by the nobility themselves.

The music and scenery were composed and designed by well known musicians and architects Ben Jonson introduced the anti masque to these performances the presence of non noble and usually uncouth characters who were in sharp contrast to the chief characters Thus plot and character increased in importance, whereas in earlier times music and scenery had taken precedence over these Comus was first presented to the Earl of Bridgewater at Ludlow Castle in honor of his appointment as Lord President of Wales and was performed by his three children The Earl and Countess appeared in the final scene In this work the poetry is more sensuous in its imagery than in Milton's earlier Arcades, and the structure is more complex and architectonic, the masque thus marks an important advance in his poetic development Although Comus is not an example of the conventional masque (it would more properly be called a pastoral drama), it is important because by its verse structure and its wealth of classical imagery used to further Puritan philosophy, it foreshadows Milton's later epic poetry

The Story

The Attendant Spirit came into a wild wood, far from his usual abode outside Jove's court, far above the dirt and hubbub of the world He was on earth only to show the rare mortals before him some of the ways to godly virtue He spoke of the plight of the children of Neptune, ruler of many island kingdoms, who were traveling to visit their father Their path lay through a dark and treacherous wood where their lives would have been in danger if Jove had not sent the Spirit to protect them The chief danger was Comus, son of Bacchus and Circe He lived in the wood and possessed a magic wine which, when drunk by thirsty travelers, gave them the heads and inclinations of wild animals The Spirit disguised himself as a shepherd to guide the children of Neptune He left when he heard Comus and his band of bewitched travelers approaching

Comus, invoking joy and feasting drinking and dancing, declared that the night was made for love and should be so used before the sun revealed the revels of his band and turned them to sinfulness His followers danced until he stopped them, sensing the approach of a girl whom he immediately wished to enchant

The Lady entered, drawn to the scene by the noise of the revelers Unwilling as she was to meet such people, she nevertheless felt that they were the only hope she had of finding her way out of the wood Because she had been tired by her walking, her brothers had left her to find wild fruit for refreshment, but night had fallen before they could return and they were unable to find her again Meanwhile a dark cloud had covered the stars The Lady called and sang to the nymph, Echo, to guide her to her brothers

Comus, delighted with the song she sang, decided that the Lady should be his queen, and in the disguise of a village boy he greeted her as a goddess The Lady reproved him and said that she wanted help to find her companions After questioning her about them, he said that he had seen two such young men gathering fruit and that it would be a delight to help her find them Comus added that he knew the woods perfectly and that he would therefore lead the Lady to her brothers She replied that she would trust him They left the cleaning together

The two brothers arrived and the elder called to heaven for the moon and stars, so that they might see their way Failing this, he wished to see the lights of some one's cottage The Second Brother, adding that even the sound of penned up flocks would help them, expressed great fear for his sister's fate The Elder Brother insisted that the Lady's perfect virtue would protect her The Second Brother said that beauty such as hers needed to be guarded and that she could easily be in danger in such a place. The Elder Brother repeated that he had great hope for her safety as she was armed by chastity. Nothing could violate this, the very angels in heaven would protect her.

Hearing someone approaching, the brothers called out to him. When the Attendant Spirit greeted them, they thought they recognized him as their father's shepherd Thyrsis. He anxiously asked where their sister was and, hearing that she was lost, told them that Comus dwelt in the wood. He added that he had overheard Comus offer to escort a lady to her companions. Fearing that she was their sister, he had himself left to find the brothers. That news plunged the Second Brother into complete despair. The Elder Brother, maintaining that virtue could be attacked but not injured, declared that they must find Comus and fight him for their sister, but the Attendant Spirit warned them that swords would not help them against Comus. He said, however, that he had been given a magic herb that was effective against all enchantments. He instructed the brothers to break the glass in Comus' hand when they found him and to seize his wand.

In Comus' palace, meanwhile, the Lady refused his wine and attempted to leave, but she was restrained by a threat to transfix her in her chair. When she declared that Comus could not control her mind, he propounded his hedonistic philosophy, saying that she should enjoy her youth and beauty, not cruelly deny them. She replied that she would never accept anything from him, since only the good man can give good things. Comus argued that in rejecting him she was denying life, and the plentiful gifts of nature by her abstinence, beauty should be enjoyed, not left to wither like a dying rose. The Lady decided that she must refute these arguments with her own nature's gifts are for the temperate to use well, and excess of luxury only breeds ingratitude in men. She feared that Comus could never understand this doctrine and she felt that if she attempted to explain, her conviction would be so strong that his palace would tumble around him. Comus was impressed by her argument, which seemed to him inspired by Jove himself, yet he determined to try again to persuade her. As he began to speak, the brothers rushed in, broke his glass on the ground, and overwhelmed his followers.

Comus himself escaped because they had not captured his wand. The Attendant Spirit despaired of freeing the Lady until he remembered that he could summon Sabrina. This river nymph would help them, since she loved the virtue that the Lady personified. By song he summoned her in the name of Neptune and Triton to save the girl. As Sabrina rose from the river, she sang of the willows and flowers that she had left. She freed the Lady by sprinkling on her the pure and precious water from her fountain. The Attendant Spirit gave Sabrina his blessing and prayed that the river should always flow in good measure and that its banks would be fertile.

The Attendant Spirit then told the Lady that he would lead them to Neptune's house where many friends were gathered to congratulate him. In Ludlow Town, at the President's castle, country dancers led the Lady and her two brothers before the Earl and the Countess who impersonated Neptune and his Queen. There the Attendant Spirit praised the young people's beauty, patience, and honesty, and their triumph over folly, then he announced his return to his natural home in the Gardens of Hesperus, for his task was done. If any mortal would go with him, however, his way was the path of virtue.

"My Confessions in thirteen books," wrote Saint Augustine, looking back from the age of sixty three at his various writings, 'praise the righteous and good God as they speak either of my evil or good, and they are meant to excite men's minds and affections toward him. The first through the tenth books were written about myself, the other three about the Holy Scripture."

In the year before his death, writing to Darius, he declared "Take the books of my Confessions and use them as a good man should. Here see me as I am and do not praise me for more than I am."

The Confessions was a new form in literature. Others, like Marcus Aurelius, had set down meditations, but this was more. Others had written biographies and autobiographies, but again Saint Augustine did not follow their model. True, he does tell about his life, but his method is a departure from a narrative of dates and events. He was more interested in his thievery of pears than in more important actions, and he makes the fruit as meaningful in his life as the Old Testament symbolism of the apples in the Garden of Eden. Other episodes are selected because of their revelation of the grace and provision of God. As he wrote "I pass over many things, hastening on to those which more strongly compel me to confess to thee." In fact, his life story might be looked on as a parallel to the parable of the Prodigal Son, with his heart "restless till it finds its rest in God", and he brings his account to an end, after his struggles to free himself from pride and sensuality, with his return to his home at Tagaste. Half his life still lay ahead of him.

Although his friends, his teachers, and his mother appear in the Confessions, they lack any physical details by which one may visualize them. Two lines cover the death of his father. Neither name nor description is given to his mistress and the mother of his child, nor of the friend whose death drove him from his native city. Detail was of less importance to Saint Augustine than theological meditation and interpretation.

Taking his text from the psalmist who would "confess my transgressions unto the Lord," this work is one long prayer beginning, "Great art thou, O Lord, and greatly to be praised," and ending with the hope that "thus shall thy door be opened."

From the very first, the consolation of God's mercy sustained Saint Augustine. His memories of infancy made him wonder what preceded that period, as later he theorized about what had been before the creation. His pictures of himself crying and flinging his arms about because he could not make his wants known were symbols to him of the Christian life, even as the acquisition of facts about this early period from his mother impressed on him the need for help from others to gain self-knowledge.

Though his mother Monica was a devout Christian and her son had been brought up in that faith, young Aurelius Augustinus was more interested in Aeneas than in God. Once, at the point of death from a stomach ailment, he begged to be baptized, but his mother refused to have him frightened into becoming a Christian. So he went on, reading Latin and disliking Greek, and taking special delight in the theater. A frank but modest description of his many abilities, the gift of his God to one not yet dedicated to God, ends the first book of this revealing work.

Book II concentrates on the sixteenth year of lazy, lustful, and mischievous Aurelius. He and his companions robbed a pear tree, not because they wanted the fruit since they threw it to the swine, but because it was forbidden. His confession that he loved doing wrong made him ponder his reasons for wandering from the path of good and becoming a "wasteland."

When he traveled to Carthage to study, at the age of nineteen, his chief delights were his mistress and the theater. In the course of his prescribed studies he read an essay by Cicero, Hortensius, now lost, urging the study of philosophy. Remembering his mother's hopes that he would become a Christian, he tried to read the Scriptures but he found them inferior in style to Cicero. However he did become involved with a pseudo-Christian sect, founded by the Persian religious teacher Mani (c 216-277), because he approved of their logical approach to the problems of evil and good, represented by the dualistic concept of the universe. During the nine years that he was a Manichaean, his mother, encouraged by a dream that he would eventually see his error, kept loyal by him.

Back in Tagaste, he wrote plays, taught rhetoric, and lived with a mistress. He had no patience with a bishop, sent by his mother, to instruct him in Christianity. He was equally scornful of a magician who offered to cast spells to insure his success in a drama competition. He thought he was sufficient to himself,

His temporary interest in astrology ended when he was unable to prove that successful divinations were more than chance. The death of a dear friend, who during his last illness became a Christian and denounced the life Aurelius was leading, so profoundly affected him that he returned to Carthage. There, still following the Manichaean beliefs, he wrote several essays, now lost. He was soon to be disillusioned. Faustus, reputed the most learned of Manichaean bishops, came to Carthage, and Aurelius Augustinus went to him to clear his religious doubts. But he found Faustus more eloquent than logical. Hoping to improve himself, this teacher of rhetoric then went to Rome where students were reported to be less rowdy than those in his classes in Carthage. In Rome, malaria, the teaching of the skeptics who upset his confidence in the certainty of knowledge, and above all the lack of classroom discipline induced him to accept the invitation of officials to go to Milan and resume his teaching career in that city.

In Milan he enjoyed the companionship of two friends from Tagaste, Alypius and Nebridius. His mother, coming to live with him, persuaded Bishop Ambrose to try to convert her son. About the same time efforts to get him married and to regularize his life caused a break with his mistress, who on her departure left him with his young son Adeodatus.

The group around the young rhetorician often discussed philosophy, and in Neo-platonism he found an answer to his greatest perplexity. If there is a God, what is the nature of His material existence? Now he was ready to study Christianity, especially the writings of Saint Paul. In Book VII, which describes this period of his life, appears one of Saint Augustine's two ecstatic visions, a momentary glimpse of the One.

Book VIII recounts his conversion. Anxious to imitate those who had gained what he himself sought, he listened to an account of the conversion of the orator Marius Victorinus. While returning home, still upset and uncertain, he heard a child chanting "Pick it up and read it." Taking these words as God's command, he opened the Bible at random and found himself reading Romans XIII, 13. "Put on the Lord Jesus Christ." Convinced, he called Alypius, and they found Monica and reported to her their newly acquired convictions.

Giving up his teaching, Saint Augustine prepared for baptism, along with his friend and Adeodatus. He was baptized by Bishop Ambrose during Easter Week, A.D. 387. Then the party set out to return to Tagaste. During their journey, and following another moment of Christian ecstasy, Monica died at Ostia on the Tiber. Her son's Confessions contains touching chapters of affection and admiration for her, sure of his faith at the time of her death, however, he fell into no period of abject mourning such as that which had followed the death of his friend at an earlier time.

With Book X, Saint Augustine turned from episodes of his life to self-analysis, detailing the three steps of the soul's approach to God, passing from an appreciation of the beauties of the outside world to an introspective study of itself, and ending with an inexplicable anticipation of the blessedness of the knowledge of God, the "truth given Joy," that crowns the soul's pilgrimage.

Book XI represents one of Saint Augustine's great contributions to Christian thought, the analysis of time. Pondering the mysteries of creation in an "eternal world," he saw it not as measured by "the motion of sun, moon, and stars," but as determined by the soul, the past being its remembrance, the present, its attention, and the future, its anticipation. He wrote "The past increases by the diminution of the future, until by the consumption of all the future, all is past."

The last two books present speculation on the methods of creation and on the truth of the Scriptures, with most of the chapters devoted to interpretation of the opening verses of Genesis. The Old Testament account is open to many interpretations, and the final book of the Confessions deals with both the material and allegorical possibilities of the story of the Creation. At the end, Saint Augustine acknowledges the "goodness" of creation, and meditates on verses describing the rest on the Seventh Day. He begs that God will bestow the rest and blessedness of that Sabbath in the life eternal that is to come.

The Confessions, a work filled with the spirit of a sincere, devout faith, lays the groundwork for Saint Augustine's more formal treatises, On the Trinity and The City of God.

Rousseau's Confessions is the result of the attempt of a famous but psychotic romantic to speak fully and honestly of his own life. It is famous as a literary expression of a writer's remembrance of things past, more revealing through its signs of passion and prejudice than through its recording of the facts of his experience. The book serves as autobiography only to the extent that it can be checked against other, more objective, reports, but whatever its bias, the Confessions is Rousseau's work, and it reflects the man as he was at the time of its writing.

To some extent Rousseau undoubtedly succeeded in his effort to write an autobiography of such character that he could present himself before 'the sovereign Judge with this book in my hand, and loudly proclaim, Thus have I acted, these were my thoughts, such was I. With equal freedom and veracity have I related what was laudable or wicked, I have concealed no crimes, added no virtues

"Only a person attempting to tell all would have revealed so frankly the sensual satisfaction he received from the spankings administered by Mlle Lambercier, the sister of the pastor at Bossey, who was his tutor. Only a writer finding satisfaction either in truth or self-abasement would have gone on to tell that his passion for being overpowered by women continued throughout his adult life. "To fall at the feet of an imperious mistress, obey her mandates, or implore pardon, were for me the most exquisite enjoyments, and the more my blood was inflamed by the efforts of a lively imagination, the more I acquired the appearance of a whining lover." Having made this confession, Rousseau probably found it easier to tell of his extended affair with Madame de Warens at Annecy and of his experiences with his mistress and common-law wife, Thérèse Levasseur.

Rousseau records that he was born at Geneva in 1712, the son of Isaac Rousseau, a watchmaker, and Suzanne Bernard. His mother died at his birth, 'the first of my misfortunes.' According to the son's account of his father's grief Isaac Rousseau had mixed feelings toward his son, seeing in him an image of Suzanne and, at the same time, the cause of her death. Rousseau writes 'nor did he ever embrace me, but his sighs, the convulsive pressure of his arms, witnessed that a bitter regret mingled itself with his caresses.' When he said to me, 'Jean Jacques, let us talk of your mother' my usual reply was, 'Yes, father, but then you know we shall cry,' and immediately the tears started from his eyes."

Rousseau describes his first experiences with reading. He turned to the romances that his mother had loved, and he and his father sometimes spent the entire night reading aloud alternately. His response to these books was almost entirely emotional, but he finally discovered other books in his grandfather's library, works which demanded something from the intellect. Plutarch, Ovid, Molière, and others.

He describes with great affection how his Aunt Suzanne, his father's sister, moved him with her singing, and he attributes his interest in music to her influence.

After his stay at Bossey with Pastor Lambercier, Rousseau was apprenticed to an engraver, Abel Ducommun, in the hope that he would succeed better in the engraver's workshop than he had with City Registrar Masseron, who had fired him after a brief trial. Ducommun is described as "a young man of a very violent and boorish character," who was something of a tyrant, punishing Rousseau if he failed to return to the city before the gates were closed. Rousseau was by this time, according to his account, a liar and a petty thief, and without reluctance he stole his master's tools in order to misplace them.

He ran to reach the bridge, but he was too late. Reluctant to be punished by the engraver, he suddenly decided to give up his apprenticeship.

Having left Geneva, Rousseau wandered aimlessly in the environs of the city, finally arriving at Confignon. There he was welcomed by the village curate, M. de Pontverre, who gave him a good meal and sent him on to Madame Louise de Warens at Annecy. Rousseau expected to find "a devout forbidding old woman", instead, he discovered "a face beaming with charms, fine blue eyes full of sweetness, a complexion whose whiteness dazzled the sight, the form of an enchanting neck."

"He was sixteen, she was twenty-eight. She became something of a mother to him (he called her "Maman") and something of a goddess, but within five years he was her lover, at her instigation. Her motive was to protect him and to initiate him into the mysteries of love. She explained what she intended and gave him eight days to think it over, her proposal was intellectually cool and morally motivated. Since Rousseau had long imagined the delights of making love to her, he spent the eight days enjoying thoughts more lively than ever, but when he finally found himself in her arms, he was miserable. "Was I happy? No. I felt I know not what invincible sadness which poisoned my happiness; it seemed that I had committed an incest, and two or three times, pressing her eagerly in my arms, I deluged her bosom with my tears."

Madame de Warens was at the same time involved with Claude Anet, a young peasant with a knowledge of herbs who had become one of her domestics. Before becoming intimate with Rousseau she had confessed to him that Anet was her lover, having been upset by Anet's attempt to poison himself after a quarrel with her. Despite her generosity to the two young men, she was no wanton, her behavior was more a sign of friendship than of passion, and she was busy being an in-

Through her efforts Rousseau had secured a position registering land for the king in the office at Chambéry. His interest in music, however, led him to give more and more time to arranging concerts and giving music lessons, he gave up his job in the survey office.

This was the turning point of his life, the decision which threw him into the society of his times and made possible his growing familiarity with the world of music and letters. His alliance with Madame de Warens continued, but the alliance was no longer of an intimate sort, for he had been supplanted by Winzenreid de Courtilles during their stay at Les Charmettes. Winzenreid came on the scene after the first idyllic summer, a period in his life which Rousseau describes as "the short happiness of my life." He tells of rising with the sun, walking through the woods, over the hills, and along the valley, his delight in nature is evident, and his theories concerning natural man become comprehensible. On his arrival Winzenreid took over physical chores and was forever walking about with a hatchet or a pickaxe; for all practical purposes Rousseau's close relationship with Madame de Warens was finished, even if a kind of filial affection on his part survived. He describes other adventures in love, and although some of them gave him extreme pleasure, he never found another "Maman."

Rousseau, having invented a new musical notation, went to Paris hoping to convince others of its value. The system was dismissed as unoriginal and too difficult, but Rousseau had by that time been introduced to Parisian society and was known as a young philosopher as well as a writer of poetry and operas. He received an appointment as secretary to the French ambassador at Venice, but he and M. de Montaigu irritated each other and he left his post about a year later.

Returning to Paris, Rousseau became involved with the illustrious circle containing the encyclopedist Diderot, Friedrich Melchior Grimm, and Mme Louise d'Épinay. He later became involved in a bitter quarrel with all three, stemming from a remark in Diderot's Le Fils naturel, but he was reconciled with Diderot and continued the novel he was writing at the time, La Nouvelle Héloïse. His account of the quarrel together with the letters that marked its progress is one of the liveliest parts of the Confessions.

As important an event as any in Rousseau's life was his meeting with Thérèse Levasseur, a needlewoman between twenty-two and twenty-three years of age, with a "lively yet charming look." Rousseau reports that "At first, amusement was my only object," but in making love to her he found that he was happy and that she was a suitable successor to "Maman." Despite the difficulties put in his way by her mother, and despite the fact that his attempts to improve her mind were useless, he was satisfied with her as his companion. She bore him five children who were sent to the foundling hospital, against Thérèse's will and to Rousseau's subsequent regret.

Rousseau describes the moment on the road to Vincennes when the question proposed by the Academy of Dijon—"Has the progress of sciences and arts contributed to corrupt or purify morals?"

—so struck him that he "seemed to be hold another world." The discourse that resulted from his inspired moment won him the prize and brought him fame. However, it may be that here, as elsewhere in the Confessions, the actual circumstances have been considerably altered by a romantic and forgetful author.

The Confessions carries the account of Rousseau's life to the point when, having been asked to leave Bern by the ecclesiastical authorities as a result of the uproar over Émile, he set off for England, where David Hume had offered him asylum.

Rousseau's Confessions offers a personal account of the experiences of a great writer. Here the events which his story notes are mentioned—his literary triumphs, his early conversion, his reconversion, his romance with Madame d'Houdetot, his quarrels with Voltaire, Diderot and churchmen, his musical successes—but they are all transformed by the passionate perspective from which Rousseau, writing years after most of the events he describes, imagines his own past. The result is that the Confessions leaves the reader with the intimate knowledge of a human being, full of faults and passions, but driven by ambition and ability to a significant position in the history of literature.

Thomas Mann, who had left Nazi Germany in 1933 and who became an American citizen in 1944, returned in 1952 to Switzerland. There he wrote Felix Krull. Preliminary work to this novel had been published as early as 1922, but only after the nightmare of Hitler and World War II was over did Mann find time and the mood to continue writing about Felix Krull, a character who surprised some of his readers, accustomed as they were to a steady flow of more metaphysically inclined characters and unprepared for the diary of a confidence man. Shortly after publication of the book, the world knew that Felix Krull would be the last character created by the pen of the great Thomas Mann. Many Germans consider Mann the only writer worthy to continue the tradition of classical German literature as established by Goethe and Schiller. It is most unfortunate for Mann's readers in general, and for readers of this novel in particular, that the greater part of Felix Krull's adventures will remain a secret forever. The present book, subtitled The Early Years, indicates that more volumes of Krull's confessions were planned, but so far nothing has been found among Mann's papers that leads readers to hope for more information about the fate of Felix Krull, the confidence man.

The Story

Felix Krull was born in the Rhine Valley, the son of a champagne maker named Engelbert Krull. Townspeople considered the Krull family upper class, but frowned on the easygoing way of life in the Krull household. Engelbert Krull, for one thing, showed too much interest in one of his female employees. A number of fun-loving friends, led by Felix' godfather, Herr Schimmelpreester, were frequent guests at Krull's gay parties. Early in life Felix and his sister Olympia were allowed to take part in the festivities.

The greatest experience of Felix' youth was a dramatic performance starring a famous actor, Muller Rose. Since the actor was a friend of Engelbert Krull, Felix was allowed to visit backstage. When he saw the actor removing his make up, he was completely disillusioned. For a long time he marveled at the impressions an actor could create. Before long Felix himself became an actor. He decided to prolong the vacation period in school by falsifying his father's signature on absentee notes, but he gained much more satisfaction when he was able to feign sickness to such a degree that the family doctor was at a loss for explanations.

Unfortunately, the champagne business did not prosper. Krull's champagne was bottled in a most exquisite manner, yet the wine was of such a low quality that even Herr Schimmelpreester spoke of it only with disdain. The loss of his business and consequently his fun-loving friends was too much for Engelbert Krull, and he shot himself. Herr Schimmelpreester recommended that Frau Krull open a rooming house in Frankfurt. For sister Olympia he provided employment in a light opera company. For Felix he arranged an apprenticeship in a Paris hotel, but the problem of military conscription prevented Felix' departure. Thus he was free to explore city life in Frankfurt, although lack of financial means left for him only the role of an outside observer. He studied the behavior of society at theaters and learned from window displays what was recommended for gentlemen. With equal interest he studied the lives of prostitutes. So far his only affair had been with one of his father's female employees. This experience was enriched when he met Rosza. While her procurer was in jail he became her lover.

In order to follow Herr Schimmelpreester's advice about employment in Paris, Felix had two alternatives left to serve his military term before departure or to be excused entirely from service. Felix decided on the latter. After careful preparation he gave an impressive performance at the army medical examination center. While declaring dramatically his desire to serve the fatherland, he managed to convey the most unfavorable information about his background, and he crowned his performance with a pretended epileptic fit. Seemingly heart broken because of his rejection, he left for Paris. During the confusion at customs inspection he inadvertently, as he assured himself, slipped the jewel case of a woman traveler in his suitcase.

In Paris he found himself the lowest member of the hotel hierarchy. With the help of a roommate he sold some of the stolen jewels. As an elevator operator in a luxury hotel, he made every effort to please his customers, especially the women. The hotel director gave him the name Armand. One of the guests in his elevator turned out to be the original owner of the jewel case, Mme Houplé, the wife of a rich Strassburg merchant. When Armand realized that the woman did not suspect him of the theft, he was very considerate toward her and was rewarded with an invitation to visit her during off duty hours.

He became her lover. Mme Houplé enjoyed especially the humiliating aspect of the affair, and talked about her need to be humiliated. Armand considered the moment appropriate for confessing the theft of the jewel case. Surprisingly, Mme Houplé enjoyed the confession because it increased her abasement, and she suggested that he should rob her of all her valuables. He gladly obliged.

After he had sold the valuables, he rented a room in town. A dual life began during the day he was Armand the hotel employee, and during the night Felix Krull, man about town. Thanks to his excellent manners he was soon promoted to the post of waiter. Difficulties arose when the sixteen year old daughter of a wealthy family fell hopelessly in love with him and when the Scottish Lord Strathbogie was determined to have Armand as his valet. To all offers Armand said no, freedom to do as he pleased seemed to him the most valuable goal in life.

His favorite customer was the young Marquis de Venosta, who enjoyed the witty remarks of waiter Armand. The nobleman's mistress, a Parisian dancing girl named Zaza, also approved of him because he did not fail to call her Madame la Marquise. It was de Venosta who finally discovered Armand's double life when he came across Felix dining in a famous restaurant.

A great dilemma had developed for de Venosta. His parents, not approving of his relationship with Zaza, planned to send him on a trip around the world. Because he found the thought of parting from Zaza unbearable, the marquis was happy to find in Felix a sympathetic listener. Felix explained that the only way for him to stay with Zaza would be to let someone else assume his identity and travel under his name. Delighted with the idea, de Venosta decided that Felix was the best candidate.

After elaborate preparations and much coaching Felix received a letter of credit and took the train to Lisbon. On the way he met Dom Antonio Jose Kuckuck, director of the Museum of Natural History in Lisbon. Impressed by the high social standing of his fellow traveler, the professor explained the outline of his philosophy. Felix found in the professor's theories an explanation of his own being. All developments of natural history seemed to him only steps toward himself. The professor's opinion that all phases of development were still with us and around us gave Felix a clue to the stage like appearance of the world. He accepted gladly an invitation to visit Kuckuck in Lisbon.

When he met Dona Maria Pia Kuckuck and her daughter Susanna, called Zouzou, Felix was impressed by the beauty of the two women, who were in turn equally impressed by the handsome "Marquis." Determined to kiss Zouzou before his departure, but finding his time in Lisbon running short, Felix wrote a letter to "his parents," presenting his stay in Lisbon in such a favorable light that they agreed to the postponement of the scheduled trip to South America. Under the pretext of wanting to show some of his drawings to Zouzou, Felix met her secretly in Kuckuck's garden. The incident resulted in a kiss, which was suddenly interrupted by Dona Maria. Sternly she asked "the Marquis" to come into the house, where she reprimanded him for abusing her hospitality. Outspoken Dona Maria wanted to know why Felix could not appreciate maturity instead of asking satisfaction from childishness. When Dona Maria threw herself into his arms, he realized that his attempted seduction of the daughter had ended with his unforeseen conquest of the mother.

The Confidence Man: His Masquerade is a quiet but bitter castigation of mankind. Episodic in structure, it relentlessly reveals man's utter lack of faith in man and, at the same time, discloses the facility with which most men can be duped. This Melville's last major fiction, rivals Mark Twain's late works for gloom, pessimism, and misanthropy. However, Melville's career ending novellette, Billy Budd, Foretopman, written more than thirty years later, exhibits none of these harsh and cynical characteristics.

Aboard the steamboat Fidèle, in dock at St. Louis, a group of passengers stood reading a placard which offered a reward for the capture of an impostor from the East—a confidence man. A deaf-mute beggar joined the group and began displaying a slate on which he wrote several mottoes praising the virtue of charity. Jeered at by the crowd, the deaf-mute lay down and slept on the fore-castle as the steamboat pulled out for New Orleans.

A short time later Black Guinea, a crippled Negro, appeared on deck to beg for pennies, which he skillfully caught in his mouth. A man with a wooden leg broke up this cruel game by loudly accusing the Negro of fraud, but Black Guinea protested his innocence and, in reply to an Episcopal clergyman's request for references, described several persons on the boat, all of whom, along with Black Guinea himself and the deaf mute as well, were one and the same man—the confidence man. After the clergyman left to find one of these references, only a kindly country merchant gave Black Guinea alms, an act which had unfortunate consequences, since he dropped one of his business cards while he was fishing in his pocket for a coin.

To this merchant, Mr Roberts by name, the impostor introduced himself as John Ringman. Pretending that he had met Mr Roberts six years earlier, on a business matter, Ringman won his confidence and talked him out of a sum of money. To repay Mr Roberts, Ringman gave him a tip on some valuable stock which could be bought aboard ship from the president of the Black Rapids Coal Company.

Next, Ringman accosted a college student who was reading Tacitus. Before Ringman could make a pitch for money, the student left in embarrassment at a lecture Ringman was delivering on the decadence of Tacitus.

The confidence man appeared next as a solicitor of funds for the Seminole Widow and Orphan Society. In this disguise he was recognized as one of Black Guinea's references by the Episcopal clergyman. The clergyman gave his alms for Black Guinea and was prevailed upon to contribute to the Seminole Fund also. In the same disguise the impostor gulled a widow and a gentleman into donating to the fund. Somewhat reluctantly, the gentleman also contributed to a plan for the world wide consolidation of all charities.

Disguised as Mr Truman, the president of the Black Rapids Coal Company, the impostor met the student again. Ironically, since he prided himself on his cynicism and circumspection, the student insisted on buying some stock, despite the impostor's feigned reluctance to sell. The good merchant, Mr Roberts, was also pleased to purchase some of the shares which his friend Ringman had recommended. During the conversation which followed this transaction, Mr Roberts happened to mention the presence of a sickly old miser aboard ship and thus informed the confidence man of another victim.

The confidence man succeeded in gulling the miser twice—once by selling him some of the bogus stock and once, posing as an herb doctor, by selling him a supply of Omni Balsamic Reinvigorator, guaranteed, if taken with confidence, to cure a consumptive cough.

A Missouri frontiersman's scorn for herbs and natural healing transformed the herb doctor into a representative of an employment agency, the Philosophical Intelligence Office. This Missourian, named Pitch, had resolved to purchase machinery to work his farm rather than rely on another boy, having had thirty-five unpleasant experiences with as many boys. Through brilliantly specious rhetoric the impostor persuaded him to hire still another boy.

The impostor appeared to Pitch once more, this time disguised as Francis Goodman, a friendly world traveler and cosmopolitan. But Pitch, brooding over his own gullibility, was in no mood for fellowship. After trying unsuccessfully to dispel Pitch's misanthropic melancholia, the cosmopolitan moved on in search of more susceptible prey.

He was accosted by one Charles Noble, a garrulous passenger who, having overheard the colloquy with Pitch, was reminded of another bitter frontiersman, Colonel John Moredock, a notorious Indian hater. Goodman being agreeable, Noble proceeded to narrate a long tale of Moredock's vendetta against Indians and to expound the philosophy of Indian hating.

Needless to say, the confidence man was appalled by such a misanthropic tale. Finding that Noble shared his feeling, Goodman agreed to split a bottle of port with him. Over their port, the two found that they shared a high regard for wine, but their incipient friendship was strained by Goodman's suspicion that No ble was trying to get him drunk. Cordiality and noble sentiments prevailed, however, until Goodman asked Noble to prove his professed confidence in man kind by lending him fifty dollars. This startling request produced such a violent reaction that the friendship would have ended then and there had not Goodman pretended that he had been joking. Confidence restored, Goodman told the story of Charlemont, an aristocrat of singularly peculiar behavior, as a prelude to another request for a loan. Before Goodman could make his appeal, Noble abruptly retired.

A passenger who had been watching the two men warned Goodman to be ware of Noble's companionship. Goodman had difficulty in extracting a comprehensible reason for this warning because the passenger turned out to be Mark Winsome, a mystic philosopher of no plain, ordinary tongue. Finally, Winsome stated clearly that Noble was a confidence man. Of course the real confidence man expressed incredulity, whereupon Winsome withdrew, leaving behind a disciple, a young man named Egbert, to explain the Winsome mystic philosophy, which was in effect quite practical.

To explore the philosophy on a practical level, Goodman suggested that Egbert use it to answer a hypothetical request for a loan. Steadfastly and consistently Egbert rejected the plea and finally told a long story to illustrate the folly, the tragedy, of loans between friends. Disgusted by such complete cynicism, the confidence man retreated.

Still in the guise of the cosmopolitan, he visited the ship's barber shop. There he succeeded in cheating the barber out of the price of a shave but failed, ultimately, in persuading the barber to extend credit to his customers.

Later that night, in the gentleman's sleeping cabin, the confidence man found only one person still awake, an old man reading the Bible. Though he mouthed pious sentiments attesting his faith in mankind and God, the old man eagerly bought a traveler's lock and a money belt from a child peddler and accepted a counterfeit detector as a premium. Commenting that the two of them put equal trust in man and God, the confidence man led the old gentleman, who was now carrying a life preserver, off to bed.

Conquistador. In his truly fine poem Archibald MacLeish makes this word whistle and flash like a blade of Spanish steel. But there are no overblown heroics here. Avoiding the stale approach of the historian, of "this priest this Gómara with the school taught skip to his writing,"

MacLeish turns over the telling of his story to Bernal Díaz, an old man who in his youth was a soldier with Cortes and who confines his tale to "That which I have myself seen and the fighting."

The result, as Díaz rambles on with simple eloquence, becomes an im-

pressionistic, sensual record of the bravery and the brutality, the sickness of defeat and the tingle of triumph that are all a part of conquest

Diaz' narrative follows the exploits of the first Spanish conquerors of Mexico under the leadership of Cortes but the story is neither complete nor fully connected. Episodic and broken, it is what a veteran would remember when he is old and going blind. Wisely, MacLeish does not force Diaz into passing moral judgment on the Spaniards or the Indians, into pondering tricky questions on the rights of the conquerors and the conquered. Of the massacre of the natives at Cholula, Diaz says simply

They died slowly with much pain like serpents

Our hands were lame with the sword
when the thing was done

And who are ye to be judge of us ?

When Diaz does exercise judgment it is mainly to deride the men who were "not there" Vespucci, who gave his name to two continents, but who was unknown in Cuba and Mexico, Velásquez, who tried to restrain Cortes and his men, to block them, to take credit for their victories. Such touches make this truly Bernál Diaz' story, not MacLeish's, and by this sublimation of the author's personality to that of his narrator, MacLeish has given the story an absorbing reality. But it is, of course, MacLeish's poetic talent that turns Conquistador into one of the finest long poems of this century.

For his stanza form MacLeish has chosen a variation on terza rima and by skillful shifting of the rhythm he avoids monotony, by delicate use of assonance and consonance he creates a sensuous music that is felt as well as heard. Listen to (and feel) these stanzas describing the life of Cortés' men in a rare time of peace among the Indians

the scented hair

The green light through the leaves the slow awakening
How there were many and small birds in the air then

We were like those that in their lands
they say
The steers of the sun went up through the wave lit orchards Shaking the water drops and those gold naked

Girls before them at their dripping horns!
And they ate the sea doused figs with the salt taste
And all their time was of kine and of sea and of morning

This passage reveals the subtle, musical effects of his technique. In the first stanza there is the unobtrusive "scen ken then" of terminal assonance and the out right rhymes of "hair" and "air", in the second, "say-wave naked" and "orchards naked", and in the third, "horns morn," with an echo of the second stanza in "taste" and, as a kind of fillip, the internal "time kine" combination. Such ingenuity, while sustaining a clear thought, calls for the highest technical skill. All is so cleverly done that one must almost ponder the lines to realize the effects of imagery and tonal pattern.

Oddly enough, the major flaw in Conquistador is a result of MacLeish's decision to let the whole story be Diaz'. In achieving unity and reality and the balance between hardship and glory that is the soldier's lot, the poet has played down the overall drama and climaxes to the point of flatness. The death of Montezuma, for instance, becomes little more important than the death of a favorite war stallion. Here is the way Diaz describes it:

And the smoke coiled on the cold stones and we went by Dawn on the wall head there and Montezuma

Clad in the gold cloth gilded and he smiled

He climbed by the stair and smiling and they slew him

Even Cortes himself is presented as a shadowy figure, more a symbol of leadership than a man ("This is Cortés that took the famous land") Perhaps this is the way the soldier sees the great men perhaps it is only history and legend that lifts the leaders above the led

But Diaz, the narrator, is certainly no shadow He emerges from the poem as a full character, fiercely alive and tenderly human In his preface Diaz calls himself "an ignorant sick old man" but he takes pride that he fought in the battles, that he was there Disclaiming any desire for fame, he mourns, as death comes closer, that his youth is past that his companions are nearly all gone Yet he remembers that once

We were the lords of it all
Now time has taught us
Death has mastered us most sorrow and pain Sickness and evil days are our lives
lot

Now even the time of our youth has been taken
Now are our deeds words our lives chronicles Afterwards none will think of the night rain

By remembering the night rains, the mountains, the windy ditches, the taste of melons, Diaz elevates a story that might have been a dry chronicle of battles to the level of high poetry He is a professional soldier with a keen eye for military strategy, but he is also a sensualist, a man whose memory holds vivid

impressions of a strange land that was alternately a paradise and a hell He can catch the details of the fighting, of the drums rolling "like the thud in the ear of a man's heart", he can take satisfaction in the Spanish cannons that mow down scores of Indians as the link chain slashes their bellies But equally well he can describe a market in an Indian town the corn, the fish, the hides "smelling of oak" the sellers of "lettuces washed cool" and of henequen, the makers of rope and "of stone masks of the dead and of stone mirrors" The reader of Conquistador can see, hear, and feel with Diaz

When the wars are over, the conquest complete, Diaz disparages the colonists who come like lice to build their Spanish cities For him "the west is gone now" and Conquistador ends with his final dream

O day that brings the earth back bring again
That well swept town those towers and that island

THE CONSOLATIONS OF PHILOSOPHY

Type of work Philosophical prose and verse
Author Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius (c 480 524)
First transcribed 523

When Theodoric, Ostrogoth king of Italy, imprisoned his minister Boethius because he suspected him of plotting with the Emperor Justin The Elder, he inadvertently encouraged the writing of a masterpiece For Boethius was a philos

pher with the intellectual and spiritual resources of a Socrates, and until his death he used the time in prison not only in consoling himself by philosophical reflections but also by writing a book of prose and verse in which Philosophy, pictured as a fair lady, reconciles him to his condition. She consoles Boethius by giving him substantial amounts of Platonic philosophy but she manages to give her message a distinctive character which we may take as a reflection of the author's own philosophic temperament.

Philosophy's consolations metaphysically defended and poetically adorned amount to this message: God is blessedness, trust in Him.

The Consolations of Philosophy is important historically because it made Platonism an important element in the thought of the Middle Ages and it is important philosophically and as literature because it presents a calm and inspiring use of Plato's ideas. Also it secures for Boethius a place in the history of philosophy. It cannot be defended, however, as a Christian work unless one is willing to call Plato a Christian. Controversy continues over the question of whether Boethius was a Christian, and it is significant that although everyone knows and admits that The Consolations of Philosophy is his work, that knowledge by no means settles the question one way or the other, although it tends to support the negative case. Only the fact that Boethius is reputed to have written a number of tracts explaining and supporting certain theological points of Christian dogma leads anyone to suppose that Boethius was a Christian.

Like Dante's Vita Nuova (c. 1292) which may have been influenced by The Consolations of Philosophy, Boethius' work alternates prose and verse, but unlike the Vita Nuova the prose passages do not merely explain the circumstances under which the verses were written but contain the body of the work—a dialogue between Boethius and Philosophy.

The First Book begins with a verse in which Boethius complains about the coming of old age and sorrows. A woman with a grave appearance, a clear eye, and of indeterminate age and height appears to him and objects to the presence of the "tragical harlots" of poetry. It turns out that she is Philosophy and that she has come to Boethius to help him in his time of trouble. She reminds him that philosophers have often suffered because of criticizing wicked men. Socrates is but one of many who have been punished for speaking the truth.

Boethius then tells Philosophy of his political difficulties, and concludes by suggesting that wicked men often prosper while the innocent suffer. In a poem addressed to God, "Creator of the Sky," Boethius asks, "why should punishments/ Due to the guilty, light on innocents?" and goes on to complain that "now the highest place/ Giveth to naughty manners greatest grace,/ And wicked people vex/ Good men, and tread unjustly on their necks."

In this manner Boethius presents the problem of evil as the subject matter of his work. The answer, when it comes after several books of discussion, is that evil is nothing, all manner of fortune is good, adversity makes virtue possible, God knows what He is doing, and all is for the best.

Baldly stated, such an answer would satisfy no one, particularly a suffering man. But Boethius reached this answer only after leisurely, charming discourse on value, man's condition, the nature of God, and the uses of philosophy.

After Boethius has complained to Philosophy, Philosophy reminds him that he believes that God created all things, it would be odd if he had doubt about God's concern for the end of all things, including men. She continues, in a striking passage:

"But I would have thee answer me to this also: dost thou remember that thou art a man?" "Why should I not remember it?" quoth I. "Well, then, canst thou explicate what man is?"

 "Dost thou ask me if I know that I am a reasonable and mortal living creature?
 I know and confess myself to be so."
 To which she replied "Dost thou not know thyself to be anything else?"
 "Not anything."

"Now I know," quoth she, "another, and that perhaps the greatest cause of thy sickness thou hast forgotten what thou art."

In Book Two, Philosophy tells Boe-thus that Fortune is always changeable, that is her nature. Philosophy then determines that nothing is more precious to a man than himself, and nothing of himself is more important than his happiness.
 But in what does happiness consist? Not in wealth, for no matter how much a man has, he wants more material goods.
 But in what does happiness consist? Not in wealth, for no matter how much a man has, he wants more material goods
 fail to satisfy him, and covetous men endanger him. Not in power and honors, for they are given to the undeserving as well as to the deserving, and that spoils them for all men, furthermore, power and honor will not keep a man from giving way to lusts that can destroy him.
 Nor does happiness reside in fame, for a man who loves fame expects only glory in this life, yet after death he has nothing.

Philosophy agrees with Aristotle that all men love happiness, but the usual goods which men pursue neither consist in happiness nor bring happiness. Even pleasure is not happiness, for it enslaves a man and turns his attention away from what could make him happy. Philosophy decides that only the Sovereign God is true goodness, happiness, and blessedness.
 Anything else which is ever good, such as power, fame, and pleasure, is good because it is not in addition to, but part of, the blessedness which is God. The substance of God consists in goodness. This argument comprises the content of Book Three.

In the following book Philosophy argues that if nothing is more powerful than God and God is goodness then evil cannot be absolute and evil men cannot truly triumph. Philosophy agrees with Plato that "only wise men can do that which they desire", wicked men do what pleases them but not what they would do if they were to choose action capable of leading to happiness. The evil are punished by the fact of doing evil they deprive themselves of the good which would otherwise be theirs. Wickedness makes men into beasts: the violent are like wolves, the angry, like dogs, the treacherous, like the fox, the outrageous, like the lion, the fearful, like the deer, the slow and stupid, like the ass, the inconstant, like the birds, the lustful, like sows. "So that he who, leaving virtue, ceaseth to be a man, since he cannot be partaker of the divine condition, is turned into a beast."

In considering God's Providence, Philosophy tells Boethius, one is forced to the conclusion that evil "hath no place left for it at all." Therefore, "all manner of fortune is good." If it sometimes seems that the wicked prosper and the virtuous suffer, it is because men do not always realize the value of adversity, how adversity challenges man's spirit and makes him virtuous.

In Book Five Philosophy assures Boe-thus that man has free will even though everything is a manifestation of God's Providence. God's contemplation does not prevent the free exercise of man's reason and will. The necessity of doing well is one which man's spirit imposes on itself
 "since you live in the sight of your Judge who beholdeth all things."

Critique

The Copperhead is the story of the fortitude of one man in opposition to his neighbors. Although Harold Frederic deplores the irrationality of society in time of stress, the true significance of the theme lies in the thought that it is impossible properly to judge, much less to condemn, a man for his political views unless one comes to understand the personal motivations of the man himself. The story is seen through the eyes of a young boy who himself plays little part in the action. The local descriptions are vivid and a sense of realism is carried by the heavily flavored dialects and regional locutions of the farmers who live in the community of Four Corners.

The Story

Abner Beech was a stalwart, shaggy man, who had often been supervisor of his district. Jimmy, who was an orphan, went to live with him when he was six or seven years old. Abner was a town leader, a great reader, and he owned more books than most people did in Dearborn County, located in northern New York State.

For some reason, Abner Beech violently hated the Abolitionists. The first Abolitionist in Dearborn County, as far as Jimmy knew, was old Jee Hagadorn, but now nearly everyone except Abner Beech shared the old man's sentiments. Because the Anti-abolitionists were attacked from the pulpit every Sunday at church meeting, Abner and Jimmy finally stopped going to church. Then someone spread the rumor that Abner's milk had not been accepted at the communal cheese factory because he had put water into it. At that time Abner's household became real outcasts in Four Corners.

One day in August Abner came home early from the field. He was furious because he learned that Jeff, his only son, had been seen walking with Esther Hagadorn, the daughter of his enemy. Abner sent Jimmy to call Jeff home. When Jimmy found Jeff and Esther, the young man gave the boy his fishing pole and told him to tell Abner that he was going to Tecumseh to enlist in the Union Army. When Jimmy told Jeff's parents what Jeff had said, they took the news calmly. They had already guessed his intention, for on that same day an entire group of boys from the area had gone off to enlist.

Abner's hired man also enlisted, and Abner hired an Irish widower, Hurley, who had been doing odd jobs in the neighborhood. Hurley was also an Anti-abolitionist, the only one in the area besides Abner. It was understood in Abner's household that Jeff's name should never be mentioned, and Abner refused to show regret over the departure of his only son.

In late September, Hurley and Jimmy went to Octavius to buy some butter firkins. Abner refused to buy firkins from Jee Hagadorn, who lived close by. In Octavius Hurley and Jimmy learned of the terrible battle at Antietam, in which a number of the boys from Dearborn County had taken part. Hurley got into a fight when some of the citizens taunted him for being a Copperhead, a Northerner who sympathized with the Southern cause in the Civil War

On the way home from Octavius, Jimmy went to see Jee Hagadorn. Jimmy found Esther there, worrying about Jeff. Jee came home elated because Lincoln had signed the Emancipation Proclamation.

A fortnight later the Beech household learned that Jeff Beech and Byron Truax had been reported missing after a battle in the South.

The work on the farm continued. Warner Pitts, Abner's former hired man, came home on furlough as an officer. A hero to the townspeople, one day he called Abner a Copperhead. N1 Hagadorn, Jee's son, did not like Warner Pitts, and so he went to Abner's house to tell him that he was going south to try to find Jeff. Abner refused; however, to give N1 any money to help him on his journey.

The local citizens were beginning to feel that the North was not carrying on the war as vigorously as they expected. On election day, November 4, Jimmy accompanied Abner and Hurley to the polls. Abner voted proudly, but the inspector said that Hurley's naturalization papers were not in order and that he could not vote. When a fight started, another inspector then said that Hurley could vote. A few days later it was learned that the Abolitionists had lost in that congressional district. Abner was overjoyed, believing that this defeat would lead to peace and an end of what he called murder. To celebrate Janey, one of the hired girls, made a big bonfire.

The next day Jimmy was in bed with a cold. To the amazement of everyone, Esther Hagadorn came in and asked to speak to Abner. When Abner came home he was civil to Esther and asked her to stay to supper. Esther said that there was a rumor to the effect that Copperheads were spreading clothes that had smallpox in them and that the local citizens were fearful and angry. She said that Abner's bonfire to celebrate the voting results had made them even angrier and that they were planning to come for Abner that night. Esther then accepted Abner's invitation to remain and have supper with them.

The townspeople arrived to tar and feather Abner and Hurley and to ride them on a rail. Abner, however, stood firm, a loaded shotgun on his arm. Suddenly Jimmy realized that the house was afire. He fainted.

Jimmy regained consciousness later that night. It was snowing, and the house had been completely burned. With some of the furniture that they were able to rescue, Abner and his wife, M'rye, had improvised a home in the cold barn. Esther, still with them, had regained the friendship of M'rye, since they were both able to talk about Jeff again.

Jimmy, unable to sleep that night, overheard Esther talking to Abner. Abner said that he believed that the townspeople had started a fire for the tarring and feathering and that, because of the strong wind, his house had caught fire accidentally. Esther said that Abner was really liked and respected by the townspeople but that they could not be expected to behave reasonably because so many husbands and sons were now involved in the war.

At that point Jee Hagadorn arrived in search of his daughter. Abner pulled off Jee's wet boots and gave him some warm socks. They had breakfast in near silence. Suddenly N1 Hagadorn appeared. He told M'rye that Jeff had been only slightly hurt and was due home any day. M'rye suddenly ran out of the barn, where she found Jeff returned from the war after having lost his left arm.

While everyone was welcoming Jeff and offering condolences, an unexpected visitor arrived. He was Squire Avery, who wanted, on behalf of the townspeople, to apologize for the events of the previous night. Hoping to let bygones be bygones, he asked Abner to send milk to the cheese factory again. He also wanted to have a house raising bee for Abner's new house and to lend him money if he needed it. Abner, filled with the spirit of forgive ness, said that all of these kindnesses were nearly worth the house burning. He and M'rye expressed the hope that Jeff and Esther would marry.

The Countess de Charny is the concluding novel of a series dealing with historical personages and events before and during the period of the French Revolution. Other novels of the group are Memoirs of a Physician, The Queen's Necklace, and The Taking of the Bastille. Dumas drew much of his material for this novel from Michelet's History of the Revolution. The story, told in the Dumas manner, carries the conviction of the reader by means of dramatic scenes and rapid movement.

The Story

In the days following the fall of the Bastille, King Louis XVI and Queen Marie Antoinette were forcibly escorted to Paris by troops under the command of General Lafayette. With the king were his most trusted aides, Count Olivier de Charny, the Marquis de Favras, and a commoner but also a close and trusted friend of the king, Dr Gilbert. During the commotion of the king's return, an agent of the powerful and mysterious Cagliostro learned from the king's locksmith, Gamain, of the construction of a secret door in the quarters in Paris where the king was to be confined. He immediately reported this information to Cagliostro. It was suspected by Cagliostro that the secret door would be used in the future to allow the king's escape with his family.

Meanwhile young Sebastian Gilbert, disturbed by reports of riots in Paris, left his foster home in the country in order to seek his father, for whose safety he feared. In Paris, Sebastian met the Countess Andree de Charny, whom he immediately felt was his mother. She, in turn, recognized him as her own long lost son. What Sebastian did not know, however, was that he had been born out of wedlock when the countess, then known as Mademoiselle de Taverney, had been attacked by Dr Gilbert, at that time only a humble peasant, fifteen years before. Later, when she became the wife of Count de Charny and gained the favor of Queen Marie Antoinette, she procured from the queen a lettre de cachet and had Dr Gilbert locked in the Bastille where he stayed until it was captured by the rioting populace.

Years had brought a philosophic calm to Dr Gilbert and he now sought to expiate his early crime by doing deeds of charity to all who would accept his services

Sebastian, sensing his mother's hatred for his own father, ran away and was run over by a carriage in the streets of Paris soon after leaving the countess apartment Dr Gilbert, arriving soon after in search of his son, quickly traced the boy to a small house where Sebastian had been taken after the accident Dr Gilbert administered to him and he recovered

Count de Charny, knowing nothing of his wife's early misfortune, could not understand why their relationship had remained so distant throughout their married life the countess had been fearful that her husband would discover the story of her earlier life Now, however, the count had little time to think of his own affairs because of the rapid movements of events and the dangers facing the king and his family

Soon after the royal family's arrival in Paris, King Louis summoned de Charny and asked him to go on a mission to the Marquis de Bouille and procure his aid in securing troops to cover the king's escape Dr Gilbert, meanwhile tried to convince King Louis to put his trust in Honore Mirabeau, who was then the man of the hour and held the respect of the French people The king's only chance was to agree with Mirabeau and sign the revolutionary principles Although the king listened to Dr Gilbert's advice he still decided to bide his time until more favorable circumstances arose

In the meantime the National Assembly grew more restless Many people were brought to trial, among them the Marquis de Favras, whose execution was practically certain His sole chance of reprieve was offered to him by Cagliostro, who guaranteed him a sure escape Favras declined, however, and in the end went nobly to his death

popularity began to wane, however, when one of Cagliostro's agents distributed pamphlets accusing Mirabeau of betraying the revolutionary cause A short time later Mirabeau, who had been suffering from a lung condition, died On his deathbed he managed to scrawl a message to the king, urging him to flee while time still remained The king and his family immediately began preparations for their flight

On the night before the royal party was to leave Cagliostro paid Dr Gilbert a visit He told Dr Gilbert that he knew of the king's plans for escape and that he was willing to offer assistance in order to assure that King Louis and his family would have a safe journey Dr Gilbert, who was quite fatalistic, declined Cagliostro's offer, he felt that what must be would be

The night of departure arrived The king and his family escaped through the secret door and thus were able to elude the guards stationed around their quarters Accompanying the royal family were Count de Charny and M de Malden another trusted nobleman dedicated to the king's cause The flight had been carefully planned Long before, arrangements had been made to have fresh horses waiting for the king's carriage at regular stations along the route, and at a bridge near Someville the Marquis de Choiseul was waiting with a company of dragoons to accompany the king on his journey

Sudden difficulties developed when the king's carriage broke down and caused a delay of four hours Meanwhile, at Someville, the marquis' troops were being threatened by the local populace and there was imminent danger of the arrival of nationalist troops After waiting as long as he could, the marquis was finally forced to retire with his dragoons When the royal family finally did reach Someville, the king was recognized by a revolutionary patriot, Jean Drouet, who immediately fled to inform nationalist troops quartered not too far away De

Charny, exchanging his tired horse for a fresh one immediately set out in pursuit of Drouet. He finally caught up with him only to discover that neither of his pistols was loaded when he fired at Drouet. The informant escaped in the woods and finally made contact with the nationalist troops. A short time later the troops arrived in Someville, where the king was being detained by the villagers.

In order to avoid bloodshed, King Louis agreed to an armed escort back to Paris. On their arriving in the city the king and his family were threatened by large groups of people. De Charny, trying to defend the king, attempted single handedly to fight a hostile mob and barely escaped with his life.

Although de Charny had throughout his career, devoted his chief energies to the defense of the monarchy, his wife had always been in his thoughts. After his escape and in the presence of the royal family, Dr. Gilbert disclosed to the count his wife's secret of her illegitimate child. The doctor explained that only her great love for de Charny had kept her from revealing her shame and expressing her true feelings for her husband. De Charny immediately returned to Andree and the two were happily reunited.

Critique

Before the two world wars had shaken the institutions of the world to the breaking point, the English country house was symbolic of many of the strongest traditions of the aristocracy. In this novel we see what happens when one such house is threatened with disrepute and, perhaps, eventual destruction because of the careless attitude of one of its sons. Galsworthy also gives a vivid account of the prejudices and feelings of English society, including the pettiness of some of its members. Everything, however, remains indestructible and, through the deft handling of one of its more insignificant members, society comes away without even a blemish.

The Story

In the fall of 1891, Horace Pendyce invited several people to Worsted Skeynes, his country estate, for a hunt. Little had been changed at Worsted Skeynes since the time of Mr. Pendyce's great-grandfather. Mr. Pendyce, as head of the house, naturally took a conservative political stand and expected each member of his family to follow suit.

Included in the party for the hunt was George Pendyce, the oldest son of

Horace and Margery Pendyce, who now spent most of his time in London and who had recently become interested enough in racing to buy his own horse and have him trained for that sport. There was also Mrs Helen Bellew, a very attractive young woman who had separated from her husband simply because they had grown tired of one another and who, it was being rumored, now encouraged the attentions of George. Needless to say, in the English country society of that time separation of married couples was still frowned upon and for a lady in such a position to favor at all the attentions of a gentleman was for her to invite criticism. Unfortunately, at a dance given by Mrs Pendyce during the week of the hunt, the young couple were seen to kiss each other passionately. The observer was the Reverend Hussell Barter, rector of the parish of Worsted Skeynes and another member of the party.

Soon after the week of the hunt Gregory Vigil, cousin of Mrs Pendyce and guardian of Mrs Bellew, who was himself in love with his beautiful ward, decided that Helen's situation was intolerable and had gone on quite long enough. After consulting Mrs Pendyce on the matter, he approached his lawyer, Mr Paramor, on the subject of divorce. Paramor advised against it, however, on the grounds that there must be some very tangible reason for the lady's wanting a divorce and also because of the fact that such an act was always extremely public and painful, even for the one bringing the action. Helen Bellew was subject to certain charges unknown to her guardian, because of her growing relationship with George Pendyce.

When Mr Vigil decided to go on with the action, Mrs Pendyce took up the matter with the rector, without, however, suspecting in the least his strong feelings against both divorce and Mrs Bellew. Mr Barter objected, of course, because of what he considered an immoral act which he himself had witnessed. In his mind it was the husband, Captain Bellew, who had been wronged, and he felt it his Christian duty to make that gentleman aware of the action that was about to be taken against him. Consequently, Captain Bellew began proceedings before Gregory Vigil had had time to do so on behalf of Mrs Bellew.

In the meantime George had fallen in love with Mrs Bellew to the extent that he felt he could not live without her, and he was willing to allow his name and reputation to be dirtied in the divorce courts in order that he might then marry the woman. Besides he had also fallen very heavily into debt through gambling on the horses. This combination of circumstances proved too much for the conservative Mr Pendyce, no Pendyce had ever been a gambler and certainly none had ever been involved in a divorce suit. When George had finally lost all his money and was forced to sell his horse to pay his debts, and when the papers had been served naming him corespondent in the case of Bellew vs Bellew, Mr Pendyce resolved to take action. Rather than see the estate and heritage of the family fall into the hands of one so irresponsible, he decided to disinherit George, unless his son would promise never to see the woman again. If George would agree to do this, Mr Pendyce had Captain Bellew's word that he would drop the divorce proceedings. But George refused.

Mrs Pendyce, however, would not consent to her husband's action. Because of a very tender and somewhat sympathetic feeling for her firstborn child, she threatened to leave Mr Pendyce if he carried out his decision. She was as good as her word. Having a small income of her own, she felt that she could keep herself and George with some measure of comfort if not with the luxury they had known at Worsted Skeynes. Her first steps were to go to London, find George, and attempt to get him to fulfill his father's demands. When this effort failed, she went to see Helen Bellew to see if she would give up George. By this time Mrs Bellew was as tired of George as she pre-vously had been of her husband, and she was quite willing—in fact, she desired—never to see George again.

Meanwhile, Mr Pendyce was highly upset by his wife's leaving him such an act was so very much out of keeping with the tradition in which he lived. He was, therefore, quite relieved to see her when she returned to their home. However, Horace Pendyce was far too proud a man to write to Captain Bellew and acknowledge that his son had been discarded in the same way that the captain himself had been. Thus the danger of divorce proceedings, with the subsequent harm to the family reputation, was as great as ever. Again it was Mrs Pendyce, only an insignificant part of the social system as Mr Pendyce thought of it, who was able to solve the problem. She took it upon herself to visit Captain Bellew and ask him to drop proceedings. Because he had instituted the whole action as a kind of self defense and because he was so much impressed by a real lady, he agreed to do so. So the Pendyce name, the country house and the whole system of society were again preserved.

Critique

Pietro Aretino's biting satire earned him the title "The Scourge of Princes." No one, no institution, in sixteenth century Europe was immune to his barbs—not even the Papacy. In The Courtesan (La Cortegiana) he is settling an old score. Driven from the Papal court in fear of his life (upon which an attempt was actually made by the Papal favorite Giberti in 1525), Aretino long nursed a grudge against the headquarters of the Holy See. The knaves, fools, and lechers who constitute the personae of this drama are supposed to be typical of the courtiers who fawned upon the Medici Popes and of their own minions who in turn fawned upon them, duping them whenever they could. But in spite of his personal grievance, Aretino's satire here is not personal. He is ridiculing the kind of pretentiousness that exists in any age. This universality, plus the unabashed ribaldry of the action, makes The Courtesan a perennially entertaining piece.

The Story

Messer Maco, a wealthy Siennese fop and a fool, came to Rome with the intention of becoming a cardinal. Upon his arrival he met Maestro Andrea who informed him that he would first have to be a courtier. Maco then announced his desire to become a courtier and Andrea obligingly promised to transform him into one

Signor Parabolano, learning that Maco was in town, ordered his groom, Rosso, to have all the lampreys he could find sent to Maco as a gift of welcome. When Parabolano left, Rosso made fun of his master's love affairs to the other servants. Valerio, Parabolano's faithful chamberlain, overheard him and ran him off. Rosso swindled a fisherman out of his lampreys by posing as a servant of the Pope. When discovered, he convinced the authorities that the fisherman was mad.

Maco received his first lesson in being a courtier. He was instructed in being, among other things, a blasphemer, a gambler, an adulator, a slanderer, an ingrate, a whore chaser, an ass, and a nymph.

Next, Rosso visited Alvgia, a procuress. Rosso, having overheard Parabolano talking in his sleep, had thereby learned that his master was in love with the matron Livia. If, he told Alvgia, he could successfully pander to his master's lust, he would be secure in his favor and could also be revenged on Valerio, Parabolano's chamberlain. Alvgia agreed to help the groom.

Meanwhile, Maco had fallen in love with Camilla, a courtesan who was being kept by a Spanish lord. Andrea feared that this new interest would interrupt his fleecing of Maco, but Maco was now all the more determined to become a courtier. He was still impatient about Camilla, however, and disguised himself as a groom in order to gain access to her house. To hinder him, Andrea and Maco's own groom cried out that the sheriff was after him for illegal entry into Rome. Afraid to appear in his own clothes, Maco ran off, still in his disguise as a servant.

Rosso and Alvgia were having their problems, too. Although Parabolano had agreed to allow Rosso to secure the services of the procuress for him, Livia proved unapproachable. The two then devised the following plan. Rosso was to tell Parabolano that Livia was willing to meet him, but that, being proper and shy, she would do so only in the profoundest dark, he must promise not to embarrass her with any light whatsoever. Once assured that Parabolano would not be able to see his mistress, Alvgia would substitute the baker's young wife, Togna, for the virtuous Livia. Parabolano, his lust now almost consuming him, was willing to agree to any stipulations. He was willing, even, to believe the calumnies of his groom and put his chamberlain, Valerio, in disgrace.

Maco, hiding in Parabolano's house from the supposed sheriff, finally mustered enough courage to emerge for the final courtier-making process. He was placed in a vat which, according to Andrea, was a courtier mold. There he was thoroughly steamed. Once recovered, he headed for Camilla's house as a full-fledged courtier. Andrea and Maco's groom pretended to be Spaniards storming the house. Maco leaped from the window, terrified, and fled in his underwear.

His embarrassment was followed by Parabolano's. Togna had planned to steal away to her assignation in her husband's clothes. Suspicious of her design, the old baker feigned drunken sleep while he watched her put on his garments and steal away. He then dressed in her clothes and followed her to the house of the procuress.

Parabolano discovered the ruse, however, once he was alone with Togna. At first he was enraged, but Valerio, embittered and determined to leave Rome and the fickleness of courtiers, arrived in time to calm him down. Admitting that, blinded by lust, he had allowed himself to be led around like a fool, Parabolano restored Valerio to favor and begged his forgiveness. Valerio advised him to admit the whole escapade openly and to treat it as a joke so that, by owning up to his own folly, he would be safe from having his enemies use it against him.

As Parabolano was beginning to see the humor in the situation, the baker Arcolano added to it by appearing, dressed in his wife's clothes. He too was enraged, but Parabolano convinced him that he had no designs on his wife. The two Togna and Arcolano, were forced to kiss and make up. Then, in keeping with the comic ending that Parabolano insisted upon, everyone was forgiven—even the conniving Rosso, after he had returned a diamond which Parabolano had given him to help seduce Livia. He was a Greek, Parabolano observed, and was only acting according to his nature.

Finally Maco appeared, seeking help from the 'Spaniards'. When their true identity was revealed, Maco was shown what a fool he really was. He, in turn, was forced to forgive Andrea.

Critique

This play is a rather trivial compound of Jacobean comic commonplaces, it is perhaps one of the least happy of the Beaumont and Fletcher collaborations. The main plot and the subplot explore different aspects of love, but they are so tenuously related that neither reinforces the other, and a virtual act of violence is required to bring them together at the end. Not only is the plotting slovenly, but also the characters are so imperfectly drawn as to be almost completely unbelievable. Antonio, the coxcomb, is so poorly developed that his cuckolding seems more of a shabby trick played upon him than a just punishment for his foolishness, and Mercury appears more the betrayer of a genuine, though ridiculous, friendship than one who takes legitimate advantage of a fool. In spite of the dramatists' attempt to pass Maria off as a woman of wit and sophistication, her actions are little more than sordid. The young lovers of the subplot fare little better. Ricardo is fairly successful as the contrite youth who has lost his sweetheart through his own weakness, but Viola forgives him in the end not so much because she loves him as to extricate herself from an impossible situation. The minor characters are drawn directly out of the Elizabethan comic tradition, and nothing more is done with them than the tradition demanded. Nevertheless, the play seems to have been successful in its own time, perhaps because skilled actors were able to carry off the comic situations with farcical effect.

Although carefully guarded by her father, Viola, a beautiful maid of sixteen, met and fell in love with handsome young Ricardo. Deciding to elope, they agreed to meet on a convenient street corner after Viola had provided herself with gold and jewels from her father's house. They had just reached this decision when Mercury and Antonio, two travelers home from an extended journey, appeared on the scene. Mercury, thoroughly sick of Antonio, tried to take his leave as graciously as he could so that he could proceed to his own home. Antonio, however, held him with protests—two travelers who had endured so much together could not part so casually—Mercury must visit for a few days. Overwhelmed by Antonio's extravagant courtesy, Mercury reluctantly accompanied him. At Antonio's house they found Maria, his handsome wife, entertaining at a dance a group of fashionable young people whom Ricardo and Viola had just joined. Before she was made known to him, Mercury was captivated by Maria's beauty, when he spoke with her he was further inflamed by her grace and wit. As the guests left and he prepared to go to his rooms, Mercury tried to still an irresistible desire to cuckold his ridiculous friend.

It now lacked only an hour until Ricardo's meeting with Viola. To pass the time, the young gallant went with a party of his friends to a nearby tavern, where one toast led to another so quickly that Ricardo became thoroughly intoxicated. About the time Viola fearfully left her father's house, throwing the key back through the window as a final gesture of farewell, Ricardo began to talk of seeking out wenches and perhaps beating up the watch as a culmination to the evening's sport. Leaving the tavern, Ricardo and his party reeled along the street, when they passed Viola, her lover in his blind drunkenness thought her to be a strumpet and attempted to throw her down in the gutter. Viola barely escaped as the watch came to take the revelers in tow.

Meanwhile, Mercury realized that the only way for him to overcome his desire for Maria was to separate himself from her. When he tried to leave secretly, Antonio discovered him and would not hear of his going. Pressed to desperation, Mercury revealed the truth, thinking that reason would cause Antonio to encourage him to leave. But to Antonio a wife was nothing in comparison with a friend, if Mercury wanted his wife, Antonio would woo her for him and thus gain immortalty as the truest friend in history. Dumbfounded, Mercury got rid of his host only on the condition that he would seduce Maria with Antonio's approval.

Shocked, frightened, and too ashamed to return home, Viola by this time had fled to the outskirts of the city. There she fell in with a rude tinker and his trull, who robbed her and left her tied to a tree. She was discovered by Valerio, a country gentleman, who released her and agreed to help her by giving her a position as a maid. As they rode off together, he began to alter the terms of his proposal, she was not to be a maid after all, but his mistress. When Viola indignantly declined, Valerio left her and rode on.

It was now morning. In the city Ricardo, awaking, remembered the events of the night before and was overwhelmed with remorse for his actions. With the encouragement of Viola's father, he enlisted his friends to help him find her again.

Antonio, meanwhile, had attempted to further Mercury's suit by writing a letter reviling himself, signing Mercury's name, and delivering it to Maria in the disguise of an Irish footman. Maria, penetrating the disguise, decided to answer trick with trick. She had Antonio beaten and locked up, then she visited Mercury. To him she reported that Antonio was missing and doubtless murdered, and, pretending great grief, she requested that he take her to some place of retirement. Mercury suggested his mother's house in the country and the two departed, Maria still vowing secretly that she would be revenged on her husband for his foolishness. Learning that they had left the city, Antonio revealed himself to the servants who had kept him prisoner and declared that he would leave the two uninterrupted for a time so that Mercury could win his suit.

Having been abandoned by Valerio, Viola had fallen in with two sympathetic milkmaids employed by Mercury's mother; they took her to their mistress to seek work as a domestic servant. That honest but acerbic woman took Viola into the household, but her position grew more and more uncertain as she revealed her ineptitude for domestic tasks. Attention was diverted from her, however, by the arrival of Mercury and Maria. While Mercury told his mother of his travels, Maria retired to her chamber. There Antonio soon appeared, this time transparently disguised as a post rider. Had he commanded his wife to return home, she would have done so, instead, he presented her with another ridiculously awkward letter in which he again advised her to favor Mercury. Maria, feeling that if he insisted on being such an utter ass she had little choice but to do as he wished, sent him to bring Mercury to her.

Ricardo's search had by this time led him to Valerio, who, after hearing the unhappy lover's story, allowed himself to be persuaded to help look for Viola. As the two rode through the countryside near the place where Valerio had left the maiden, they came upon her as she was going out to milk. When Ricardo abjectly threw himself upon his knees, confessed his faults and begged forgiveness, Viola, who still loved him, yielded to his pleas. Meanwhile, Antonio's cousin, believing his kinsman murdered and Maria and Mercury probably guilty because of what seemed their precipitate flight from the city, arrived at the house of Mercury's mother with a warrant and a justice of the peace. As Mercury and Maria were about to be arrested, Antonio revealed himself, rather to the discomfiture of the justice, who had eagerly anticipated a hanging. Maria and Mercury, whose ardor for each other had cooled after their night together, pretended great joy at seeing Antonio alive. All celebrated at a banquet which Ricardo and Viola also attended.

THE CRISIS

Author Thomas Paine (1737-1809)

First published 1776-1783

In the series of sixteen essays now known as The Crisis, Thomas Paine, called by Benjamin Franklin "an ingenious worthy young man," emerged as the ablest propagandist of the cause of liberty during the American Revolution. The first Crisis essay appeared during the darkest days of December, 1776, after Washington's forces had retreated from Fort Mifflin down through New Jersey and into Pennsylvania. Not only the army but the Continental Congress had been forced to flee before the advancing forces of General Howe. Many people believed that conditions had become so bad that Washington's army could be liquidated and the revolt suppressed before the end of 1776.

Paine, who had attached himself to the Continental Army as a civilian aide, was free to mix among the officers and enlisted men during the retreat, and he was well aware of the dire situation in which the new nation found itself. In the midst of those troubled times the military situation received another blow by the plotting of the Conway Cabal, which threatened to remove Washington from the post of commander in chief and place the army under the direction of General Gates. It was under these conditions that Thomas Paine, America's first great propagandist, entered the struggle as a writer to defend the honor of Washington and to advance the cause of the Revolution among the people. The first and best known of the sixteen pamphlets appeared on December 19, 1776, it was signed "Common Sense."

The characteristics and style of Paine's writings may well be compared to those of Rousseau and Marx, for like them, he could electrify his audience with the written word Also, he possessed the gift of using key words and phrases which had a magnetic effect upon those who read him Nor have the words of Thomas Paine been forgotten When the United States faced the great crisis of World War II, Franklin D Roosevelt constantly turned to the words of Paine to express his thoughts The two opening sentences of The Crisis offer excellent examples of Paine's ability to use key phrases and catch words

These are times that try men's souls
The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country but he that stands it NOW, deserves the love and thanks of men and women

Paine in an effort to bolster the sagging morale of the Americans made light of British successes, declaring that Howe was ravaging the countryside as a brigand and not as a successful invader making a lasting conquest The withdrawal of Washington was considered by Paine to be a strategic retreat and the promise of victory, not disaster, was imminent He was positive that final victory could be achieved, but he declared that a greater effort was needed, that "those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom, must, like men, undergo the fatigues of supporting it" In his opinion, a regular army was essential since the militia was unequal to the task at hand He added to the hatred for the Tories by describing them in the most uncomplimentary manner in an effort to effect an irreconcilable breach between this group and the patriots He defined Tories as being cowards with 'servile, slavish, self interested fear' and added that the Tories have endeavored to insure their property with the enemy by forfeiting their reputation with us from which may be justly inferred, that their governing passion is advance

Some students of the American Revolution are of the opinion that catch phrases such as "summer soldier" and "sunshine patriot" were important in igniting the spark which enabled Washington to cross the Delaware River and fall upon the British forces in a limited offensive at Trenton and Princeton before going into winter quarters

As conditions began to improve, Paine pointed out the hopeless position of the British by stating that General Howe's condition and ours are very different

He has everybody to fight we have only his one army to cope with and which wastes away at every engagement we can not only reinforce but can redouble our numbers, he is cut off from all supplies and must sooner or later inevitably fall into our hands

Continuing his argument, Paine wrote that "if Britain cannot conquer us, it proves that she is neither able to govern nor protect us" Any victories for the British were interpreted as defeats because "it is distressing to see an enemy advancing into a country but it is the only place in which we can beat them, and in which we have always beaten them, whenever they have made the attempt" The losses of Philadelphia and Charleston were considered unimportant, those cities could be liberated in a matter of hours should the inhabitants decide to rise up against the enemy

With the British armies growing weaker, in his opinion, Paine constantly urged the people to make sacrifices and to become active in their support of the movement for liberty "The nearer any disease approaches a crisis, the nearer it is to a cure Danger and deliverance make their advances together, and it is only the last push, in which one or the other takes the lead" The essays, since they were intended for propaganda purposes, by necessity had to be written in a simple, clear, and forceful style which could be completely understood by all who read them or heard them read They were read to the pitifully small army, they were posted on trees and in taverns in the hope that they would inspire all who read them to a more strenuous effort for the cause of liberty. An example of the simple and direct approach utilized by Paine is shown in the following passage:

Our support and success depend on such a variety of men and circumstances, that every one who does but wish well is of some use. There are men who have a strange aversion to arms, yet have hearts to risk every shilling in the cause or in support of those who have better talents for defending it. Nature in the arrangement of mankind has fitted some for every service in life: were all soldiers all would starve and go naked and were none soldiers all would be slaves. As disaffection to independence is the badge of a Tory so affection to it is the mark of a Whig and the different services of the Whigs, down from those who nobly contribute every thing to those who have nothing to render but their wishes, tend all to the same centre though with different degrees of merit and ability. The larger we make the circle the more we shall harmonize and the stronger we shall be. All we want to shut out is disaffection, and that excluded we must accept from each other such duties as we are best fitted to bestow. A narrow system of politics, like a narrow system of religion is calculated only to sour the temper, and be at variance with mankind. All we want to know in America is simply this, who is for independence, and who is not? Those who are for it will support it, and the remainder will undoubtedly see the reasonableness of paying the charges while those who oppose or seek to betray it must expect the more rigid fate of the jail and the gibbet.

The true value of the essays to the reader of the present generation is to clear up the misconception of earlier historians who were of the belief that the Revolution had the almost universal support of the population. Also, the essays serve as a chief chronicle of events as they were occurring. It must be remembered, however, that Paine wrote favorably toward the American cause and that the true picture may not have been presented in every case.

Paine saw much of the actual fighting and perhaps understood the war more clearly than anyone else who wrote as the events occurred. He was a master at summing up the situation and then in interpreting it as he would have liked it to have been. As an interpreter of changing events, he must be ranked among the outstanding interpreters of any period of history.

During the years of the Revolution, Thomas Paine was a widely read and highly influential propagandist. It was after the French Revolution, in which he participated, that he came to be considered a radical and a dangerous revolutionary. For a more complete understanding of the American Revolution one should read The Crisis pamphlets in their entirety.

CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON

Author Immanuel Kant (1724-1804)
First published 1781

Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is a masterpiece in metaphysics designed to answer the question, "How are synthetic a priori judgments possible?" Since a synthetic judgment is one whose predicate is not contained in the subject, and an a priori judgment is one whose truth can be known independently of experience,

Kant's question meant, in effect, "How can there be statements such that the idea of the subject does not involve the idea of the predicate and which, nevertheless, must be true and can be known to be true without recourse to experience?"

To make the question clearer, Kant

offered examples of analytic and synthetic judgments. The statement that "All bodies are extended" is offered as an analytic judgment, since it would be impossible to think of a body—that is, of a physical object—that was not spread out in space, and the statement "All bodies are heavy" is offered as a synthetic judgment, since Kant believed that it is possible to conceive of something as a body without supposing that it has weight.

Perhaps even clearer examples are possible. The judgment that "All red apples are apples" is surely analytic, since it would be impossible to conceive of something as being red and as being an apple without supposing it to be an apple, the predicate is, in this sense, included in the subject. But the judgment "All apples are red" is surely synthetic, since it is possible to think of something as being an apple without supposing it to be red, in fact some apples are green. Synthetic judgments can be false, but analytic judgments are never false.

A priori knowledge is knowledge "absolutely independent of all experience," and a posteriori knowledge is empirical knowledge, that is, knowledge possible only through experience. We can know a priori that all red apples are apples (and that they are red) but to know that a particular apple has a worm in it is some thing that must be known a posteriori.

The question of how synthetic a priori judgments are possible is, then, a question concerning judgments that must be true—since they are a priori and can be known to be true without reference to experience—even though, as synthetic, their predicates are not conceived in thinking of their subjects.

As an example of a synthetic a priori judgment Kant offers, "Everything which happens has its cause." He argues that he can think of something as happening without considering whether it has a cause: the judgment is, therefore, not analytic. Yet he supposes that it is necessarily the case that everything that happens has a cause, even though his experience is not sufficient to support his claim. The judgment must be a priori. How are such synthetic a priori judgments possible?

One difficulty arises at this point. Critics of Kant have argued that Kant's examples are not satisfactory. The judgment that everything that happens has a cause is regarded as being either an analytic, not synthetic, a priori judgment (every event being a cause relative to an immediately subsequent event, and an effect relative to an immediately precedent event), or as being a synthetic a posteriori, not a priori, judgment (leaving open the possibility that some events may be uncaused). A great many critics have maintained that Kant's examples are bound to be unsatisfactory for the obvious reason that no synthetic a priori judgments are possible. (The argument is that unless the predicate is involved in the subject, the truth of the judgment is a matter of fact, to be determined only by reference to experience.)

Kant's answer to the problem concerning the possibility of synthetic a priori judgments was that pure reason—that is, the faculty of arriving at a priori knowledge—is possible because the human way of knowing determines, to a considerable extent, the character of what is known. Whenever human beings perceive physical objects, they perceive them in time and space: time and space are what Kant calls "modes of intuition," that is, ways of apprehending the objects of sensation. Since human beings must perceive objects in time and space, the judgment that an object is in time must be a priori but, provided the element of time is no part of the conception of the object, the judgment is also synthetic. It is some what as if we were considering a world in which all human beings are compelled to wear green glasses. The judgment that everything seen is somewhat green would be a priori (since nothing could be seen except by means of the green glasses), but it would also be synthetic (since be-

In Kant's terminology, a transcendental philosophy is one concerned not so much with objects as with the mode of a a priori knowledge, and a critique of pure reason is the science of the sources and limits of that which contains the principles by which we know a priori. Space and time are the forms of pure intuition, that is, modes of sensing objects. The science of all principles of a a priori sensibility, that is, of those principles that make a a priori intuitions (sensations) possible, Kant calls the transcendental aesthetic.

But human beings do more than merely sense or perceive objects, they also think about them. The study of how a a priori concepts, as distinguished from intuitions, are possible is called transcendental logic. Transcendental logic is divided into transcendental analytic, dealing with the principles of the understanding without which no object can be thought, and transcendental dialectic, showing the error of applying the principles of pure thought to objects considered in themselves.

Using Aristotle's term, Kant calls the pure concepts of the understanding categories. The categories are of quantity (unity, plurality, totality), of quality (reality, negation, limitation), of relation (substance and accident, cause and effect, reciprocity between agent and patient), and of modality (possibility, existence, nonexistence, necessity, contingency). According to Kant, everything which is thought is considered according to these categories. It is not a truth about things in themselves that they are one or many, positive or negative, but that all things fall into these categories because the understanding is so constituted that it can think in no other way.

Kant maintained that there are three subjective sources of the knowledge of objects: sense, imagination, and apperception. By its categories the mind imposes a unity on the manifold of intuition, what would be a mere sequence of appearances, were the mind not involved, makes sense as the appearance of objects.

The principles of pure understanding fall into four classes: axioms of intuition, anticipations of perception, analogies of experience, and postulates of empirical thought in general.

The principle of the axioms of intuition is that "All intuitions are extensive magnitudes," proved by reference to the claim that all intuitions are conditioned by the spatial and temporal mode of intuition.

The principle by which all perception is anticipated is that "the real that is an object of sensation has intensive magnitude, that is, a degree." It would not be possible for an object to influence the senses to no degree, hence various objects have different degrees of influence on the senses.

The principle of the analogies of experience is that "Experience is possible only through the representation of a necessary connection of perceptions." Our experience would be meaningless to us were it not ordered by the supposition that perceptions are of causally related substances which are mutually interacting.

Kant's postulates of empirical thought in general relate the possibility of things to their satisfying the formal conditions of intuition and of concepts, the actuality of things to their satisfying the material conditions of sensation, and the necessity of things to their being determined "in accordance with universal conditions of experience" in their connection with the actual.

A distinction which is central in Kant's philosophy is the distinction between the phenomenal and the noumenal. The phenomenal world is the world of appearances, the manifold of sensation as formed spatially and temporally and understood by use of the categories. The noumenal world is the world beyond appearance, the unknown and unknowable, the world of "things in themselves"

In the attempt to unify experience, the reason constructs certain ideas—of a soul, of the world, of God. But these ideas are transcendental in that they are illegitimately derived from a consideration of the conditions of reason, and to rely on them leads to difficulties which Kant's "Transcendental Dialectic" was designed to expose. The "Paralogisms of Pure Reason" are fallacious syllogisms for which the reason has transcendental grounds, that is, the reason makes sense out of its operations by supposing what, on logical grounds, cannot be admitted.

The "Antinomies of Pure Reason" are pairs of contradictory propositions, all capable of proof provided the arguments involve illegitimate applications of the forms and concepts of experience to matters beyond experience.

Kant concludes the Critique of Pure Reason with the suggestion that the ideas of God, freedom, and immortality arise in the attempt to make moral obligation intelligible. This point was developed at greater length in his Metaphysics of Morals (1785) and his Critique of Practical Reason (1788).

Critique

This novel traces the development and refinement of a woman's ambition. Undine Spragg is a heartless creature whose striking beauty has led her to believe that the sole aim of society is to provide diversion and security for its women. However deeply Edith Wharton may incriminate the heroine, there is an even greater incrimination of the society that produced her, for Undine is the purest exponent of a world motivated by the desire for power and status. The well-constructed story is carried along by a direct, unornamented prose style.

The Story

Undine Spragg, who came from Apex City with her parents, had been in New York for two years without being accepted in society. Her opportunity came at last when she was invited to the dinner given by Laura Fairford, whose brother, Ralph Marvell, took an interest in Undine.

Ralph, although his family was prominently established in social circles, had little money. Moreover, he was an independent thinker who disliked the superficiality of important New York figures like Peter Van Degen, the wealthy husband of Ralph's cousin, Clare Dagonet, with whom Ralph had once been in love

About two months after their meeting Undine became engaged to Ralph. One night they went to see a play. Undine was shocked to find herself sitting next to Elmer Moffatt, a figure in her past whom she did not want to recognize in public. She promised to meet him privately in Central Park the next day. When they met, Moffatt, a bluntly spoken vulgarian, told Undine that she must help him in his business deals after she married Ralph.

Moffatt also went to see Undine's father and asked him to join in a business deal. Moffatt threatened to make Undine's past public if Mr. Spragg refused.

Ralph and Undine were married and Ralph was happy until he realized that Undine cared less for his company than for the social world. Mr. Spragg, having made the business deal with Moffatt, had thus been able to give Undine a big wedding. Ralph soon began to realize the ruthlessness of Undine's desire for money. Her unhappiness and resentment were increased when she learned that she was pregnant.

In the next several years Moffatt became a significant financial figure in New York. Ralph, in an attempt to support Undine's extravagance, went to work in a business to which he was ill suited. Undine, meanwhile, kept up a busy schedule of social engagements. She had also accepted some expensive gifts from Peter Van Degen, who was romantically interested in her, before Peter left to spend the season in Europe.

One day Undine saw Moffatt, who wanted to meet Ralph in order to make a disreputable business deal. The business deal succeeded and Undine went to Paris to meet Peter. Before long she had spent all her money. She then met the Comte Raymond de Chelles, a French aristocrat whom she thought of marrying. In the face of this competition Peter frankly told Undine of his desire for her and said that if she would stay with him he could give her everything she wanted. At this point Undine received a telegram announcing that Ralph was critically ill with pneumonia and asking her to return to New York immediately. Undine decided to stay in Paris.

Ralph recovered and, after four years of marriage, Undine returned to the Dagonet household with his son Paul. He began to work hard at the office for Paul's sake and on a novel which he had begun.

Undine, after an uncontested divorce from Ralph, lived with Peter Van Degen for two months. Peter, however, was disillusioned when he learned that Undine had not gone to see Ralph when he was critically ill, he left her without getting the promised divorce from his wife Clare.

Ralph, meanwhile, was concerned only with his son and his book. Then he learned that Undine was engaged to Comte Raymond de Chelles and badly needed money to have her marriage to Ralph annulled by the Church. Undine agreed to waive her rights to the boy if Ralph would send her one hundred thousand dollars to pay for her annulment. Ralph borrowed half of the needed sum and went to Moffatt to make another business deal. As Undine's deadline approached, with the deal not yet concluded, Ralph went to see Moffatt, who told him that the matter was going more slowly than expected and that it would take a year to go through. Moffatt told Ralph that he himself was once married to Undine, back in Apex City, but that Undine's parents had forced the young couple to get a divorce. After hearing this story Ralph went home and committed suicide.

Undine, now in possession of her son, married Raymond de Chelles. She was very happy in Paris, even though Raymond was strict about her social life. After three months they moved to the family estate at Saint Desert to live quietly and modestly. When Raymond began to ignore her, Undine became bored and angry at her husband's family for not making allowances for her customary extravagance

One day she invited a dealer from Paris to appraise some of the priceless Chelles tapestries. When the dealer arrived, the prospective American buyer with him turned out to be Moffatt, now one of the richest men in New York. Over the next several weeks Undine saw a great deal of her former husband. When the time came for Moffatt to return to New York, Undine invited him to have an affair with her. Moffatt told her that he wanted marriage or nothing.

Undine went to Reno, where she divorced Raymond and married Moffatt on the same day. Moffatt gave Undine everything she wanted, but she realized that in many personal ways he compared unfavorably with her other husbands. The Moffatts settled in a mansion in Paris to satisfy Undine's social ambitions and her husband's taste for worldly display. When Undine learned that an old society acquaintance, Jim Driscoll, had been appointed ambassador to England, she decided that she would like to be the wife of an ambassador. Moffatt told her bluntly that that was the one thing she could never have because she was a divorced woman. Still dissatisfied, Undine was certain that the one thing she was really meant for was to be an ambassador's wife.

Critique

By purely aesthetic standards, the Cyclops cannot be considered a valuable or important play, but it otherwise has a twofold interest as the only complete satyr play preserved from ancient Greece and as a dramatization of an episode from Homer's Odyssey. Euripides has kept the main line of Homer's tale, but for the sake of enhanced humor has added the character of old Silenus and, of course, the Chorus of Satyrs. Furthermore, the exigencies of stage presentation have made it necessary for him to change Homer's ingenious escape device to a mere slipping through the rocks past the blind Cyclops. The light tone of the play must have been a welcome relief to the Greek audience, for it followed three somber tragedies presented in succession.

The Story

As he raked the ground before the cave of his master, the Cyclops, old Silenus lamented the day he was shipwrecked on the rock of Aetna and taken into captivity by the monstrous, one-eyed offspring of Poseidon, god of the sea. About Silenus gamboled his children, the Chorus of Satyrs, who prayed with their father to Bacchus for deliverance. Suddenly Silenus spied a ship and the approach of a group of sailors obviously seeking supplies. Odysseus and his companions approached, introduced themselves as the conquerors of Troy, driven from their homeward journey by tempestuous winds and desperately in need of food and water. Silenus warned them of the cannibalistic Cyclops' impending return, urged them to make haste and then began to bargain with them over the supplies. Spying a skin of wine, the precious liquid of Bacchus which he had not tasted for years, Silenus begged for a drink. After one sip he felt his feet urging him to dance. He offered them all the lambs and cheese they needed in exchange for one skin of wine.

As the exchange was taking place, the giant Cyclops suddenly returned, ravenously hungry. The wretched Silenus made himself appear to have been terribly beaten and accused Odysseus and his men of plundering the Cyclops' property. Odysseus denied the false charge, but although he was supported by the leader of the Chorus of Satyrs, the Cyclops seized two of the sailors, took them into his cave, and made a meal of them. Horrified Odysseus was then urged by the satyrs to employ his famed cleverness, so effective at Troy, in finding some means of escape.

After some discussion, Odysseus hit upon a subtle plan: first they would make the Cyclops drunk with wine, then, while he lay in a stupor, they would cut down an olive tree, sharpen it, set it afire, and plunge it into the Cyclops' eye. After that escape would be easy.

When the Cyclops emerged from his cave, Odysseus offered him the wine, and the giant and Silenus proceeded to get hilariously drunk. So pleased was the monster with the effects of the Bacchic fluid that Silenus without much trouble persuaded him not to share it with his fellow giants but to drink it all up by himself. The grateful Cyclops asked Odysseus his name (to which the clever warrior replied "No man") and promised that he would be the last to be eaten. Soon the Cyclops found the earth and sky whirling together and his lusts mounting. He seized the unhappy Silenus and dragged him into the cave to have his pleasure with him.

As the Cyclops lay in a stupor, Odysseus urged the satyrs to help him fulfill the plan they had agreed upon, but the cowardly satyrs refused and Odysseus was forced to take his own men for the task. Soon the agonized Cyclops, shouting that "no man" had blinded him, came bellowing out of the cave. The chorus mocked and jeered him for this ridiculous charge and gave him false directions for capturing the escaping Greeks. The berserk giant thrashed about and cracked his skull against the rocks. When the escaping Odysseus taunted him with his true name, the Cyclops groaned that an oracle had predicted that Odysseus would blind him on his way home from Troy, but he told also that the clever one would pay for his deed by tossing about on Poseidon's seas for many years. The satyrs hastened to join the escape so that they could once more become the proper servants of Bacchus in a land where grapes grew.

Critique

Dangerous Acquaintances (Les Liaisons Dangereuses) is the only novel of a French artillery officer turned writer. It is a slow-paced but fascinating story in which Laclos proved himself a master of the epistolary form popularized by Samuel Richardson and other novelists of the eighteenth century. The letters are so skillfully interplayed and the characterizations so scrupulously presented that the reader willingly accepts the letters as real and the characters as people rather than as tools for telling a story. The illusion is furthered by Laclos' use of frequent foot notes explaining details in the letters. On its publication the novel achieved a succès de scandale which has caused the book to be stigmatized as a pornographic work. In actuality, the writer employed a theme of sexual intrigue in order to dissect the decadent society of his age and to lay bare its underlying tensions and antagonisms, so that it stands in sharp contrast to contemporary erotic romances which threw an atmosphere of glamor about a subject Laclos revealed in all its starkness. Interestingly, examples of the Freudian concepts of sex appear throughout the novel.

The Story

When Cécile de Volanges was fifteen years old, her mother removed her from a convent in preparation for the girl's marriage to the Comte de Gercourt, a match already arranged by Madame de Volanges but without her daughter's knowledge. Shortly after her departure from the convent Cécile began an exchange of letters with Sophie Carnay, her close friend. Except for trips to shops for the purchase of an elaborate wardrobe, Cécile had few contacts with her fashionable mother. The little she knew about the plans for her future she learned from her maid.

Knowing of the match, the Marquise de Merteuil, an unscrupulous woman, saw in the proposed marriage an opportunity to be revenged on Gercourt, who some time before had deserted her for a woman of greater virtue. In her wounded vanity she schemed to have the Vicomte de Valmont, a libertine as unscrupulous as she, effect a liaison between Cécile and the Chevalier Danceny. Such an affair, circulated by court gossip after Cécile and Gercourt were married, would make the husband a laughing stock of the fashionable world. To complete her plan for revenge, the marquise also wanted Valmont to seduce Madame de Tourvel, the wife of a judge. Madame de Tourvel was the woman for whom Gercourt had abandoned the Marquise de Merteuil. As a reward for carrying out these malicious designs she promised to reinstate Valmont as her own lover.

Valmont was able to arrange a meeting between Cécile and Danceny. Although she was attracted to the young man, Cécile hesitated at first to reply to his letters. Her final consent to write to him, even to speak of love, was concealed from Madame de Volanges.

Valmont, meanwhile, had turned his attention to Madame de Tourvel. A woman of virtue, she tried to reject the vicomte's suit because she was aware of his sinister reputation. In spite of her decision she nevertheless found herself attracted to him, and in time she agreed to write to him but not to see him. She stipulated also that Valmont was not to mention the subject of love or to suggest intimacy. Eventually Valmont and Madame de Tourvel became friends. Aware of her indiscretion even in friendship, she finally told Valmont that he must go away, and he accepted her decision.

In the meantime, although she wrote him letters in which she passionately declared her love, Cécile was steadfast in her refusal to see Danceny. With love Cécile had grown more mature. She still wrote to Sophie Carnay, but not as frankly as before. Instead, she turned to the Marquise de Merteuil, whom she saw as a more experienced woman, for advice. In turn the marquise, impatient with the slow progress of the affair between Cécile and Danceny, informed Madame de Volanges of the matter, with the result that the mother, in an angry interview with her daughter, demanded that Cécile forfeit Danceny's letters. The marquise's plan produced the effect she had anticipated, Cécile and Danceny declared themselves more in love than ever.

Hoping to end her daughter's attachment to Danceny, Madame de Volanges took Cécile to the country to visit Madame de Rosemonde, Valmont's ailing aunt. Valmont soon followed, on the Marquise de Merteuil's instructions, to keep alive the affair between Cécile and the young chevalier and to arrange for Danceny's secret arrival. Then Valmont, bored with rustic life, decided to take Cécile for himself. Under the pretext of making it safer for him to deliver Danceny's letters, he persuaded her to give him the key to her room. At the first opportunity that arose Valmont seduced her. At first the girl was angered and shocked by his passion, but before long she was surrendering herself to him willingly. At the same time Valmont was still continuing his attentions to Madame de Tourvel. Deciding that persistence accomplished nothing, he began to ignore her. Madame de Tourvel then wrote of fering her friendship.

Cécile, deep in her affair with Valmont, wrote asking the Marquise de Merteuil's advice on how to treat Danceny. Madame de Volanges, not knowing the true situation, also wrote the marquise and said that she had considered breaking off the match with Gercourt. Her daughter's happiness, she declared, was perhaps worth more than an advantageous marriage. In reply, the marquise earnestly cautioned Madame de Volanges on a mother's duty to guide a daughter and to provide for her future.

Madame de Tourvel, also a guest of Valmont's aunt, gave that gallant the opportunity to seduce her. Although tempted, he took greater pleasure in seeing her virtue humbled. After his refusal and Madame de Tourvel's own moral scruples had forced her to flee in shame, she wrote Madame de Rosemonde a letter in which she apologized for her abrupt departure and explained fully her emotional straits. Madame de Rosemonde's reply was filled with noble sentiments and encouragement for her friend.

Valmont was surprised to find himself deflated by Madame de Tourvel's departure. His ego suffered another blow when Cécile locked him out of her room.

The marquise, more impatient than ever with Valmont's slow progress, decided to work her revenge through Danceny. Her first step was to captivate the young chevalier. An easy prey, he nevertheless continued to write impassioned letters to Cécile.

Valmont then decided to possess Madame de Tourvel. Her initial hesitation, surrender, and complete abandon he described in a triumphant letter to the Marquise de Merteuil. His account closed with the announcement that he was coming at once to claim the reward she had promised him. But the marquise managed to put off his importunate claim by reproving him about his handling of his affair with Madame de Tourvel. The difference between this and his other affairs, she said, was that he had become emotionally involved, his previous conquests had been smoothly and successfully accomplished because he had regarded them only as arrangements of convenience, not relationships of feeling. The irony of her attitude was that she was still in love with Valmont and had not counted on losing him, even for a short time. She had lost control of the strings by which she had dangled Valmont to satisfy her desire for vengeance.

Valmont, meanwhile, was trying to free himself of emotional involvements with Cecile and Danceny. Cécile had miscarried his child, Danceny's devotion no longer amused him. Although he made every effort to win the favor of the marquise, she held herself aloof, and after a quarrel she capriciously turned from him to Danceny and made that young man a slave to her charms and will.

Both Valmont and the marquise were eventually defeated in this duel of egoistic and sexual rivalry. Danceny, having learned of Valmont's dealings with Cécile, challenged the vicomte to a duel and mortally wounded him. As he was dying, Valmont gave the chevalier his entire correspondence with the marquise. Her malice exposed, she faced social ruin. After an attack of smallpox which left her disfigured for life, she fled to Holland. Madame de Tourvel, already mentally upset because of the treatment she had received from Valmont, died of grief at his death. Cécile entered a convent. Danceny gave the incriminating letters to Madame de Rosemonde and, vowing celibacy, entered the order of the Knights of Malta. Madame de Rosemonde sealed the letters which had brought disaster or death to all who had been involved with so dangerous an acquaintance as the Marquise de Merteuil.

Critique

Daniel Deronda shifts from a novel depicting the difficulties and romances of a group of people in English society to a treatment of anti-Semitism in Victorian England. The character Daniel Deronda, the ward of Sir Hugo Mallinger, provides a bridge between the two portions of the book. With all its heavy evidence against the evil of anti-Semitism, the novel does not become an essay, for throughout the work George Eliot maintains sharp observation of the follies and delusions of Victorian life, as well as a keen sense of moral discrimination between her characters. Like Middlemarch, this novel is distinguished by realistic appraisals of people in all levels of society from the august and benevolent Sir Hugo Mallinger to Ezra Cohen, the crafty yet generous shopkeeper in the East End. If the novel does not show the consistency of theme or careful construction of George Eliot at her best, it still propagandizes skillfully for worthy causes and creates a vivid, clear, and varied scheme of life.

The Story

Gwendolen Harleth, a strikingly beautiful young woman, was gambling at Leubronn. Playing with a cold, emotionless style, she had been winning consistently. Her attention was suddenly caught by the stare of a dark, handsome gentleman whom she did not know and who seemed to be reproving her. When her luck changed, and she lost all her money, she returned to her room to find a letter from her mother requesting her immediate return to England. Before she left, Gwendolen decided that she would have one more fling at the gaming tables. She sold her turquoise necklace for the money to play roulette, but before she could get to the tables the necklace was repurchased and returned to her with an anonymous note. Certain that the unknown man was her benefactor, she felt that she could not very well return to the roulette table. She went back to England as soon as she could. Her mother had recalled her because the family had lost all their money through unwise business speculations.

Gwendolen, a high spirited, willful, accomplished, and intelligent girl, was Mrs

Davilow's only child by her first marriage, and her favorite. By her second marriage—Mr Davilow was also dead—she had four colorless, spiritless daughters. About a year before, she had moved to Offen-dene to be near her sister and brother-in-law, the prosperous, socially acceptable Gascoignes and to see what she could do about arranging a profitable marriage for her oldest daughter. Gwendolen's beauty and manner had impressed all the surrounding gentry, but her first victim was her cousin, affable Rex Gascoigne. Although he had been willing to give up his career at Oxford for Gwendolen, his family refused to countenance so unwise a move. Rex, broken in spirit, was sent away temporarily but Gwendolen remained unmoved by the whole affair.

Soon afterward the county became excited over the visit of Mallinger Grandcourt, the somewhat aloof, unmarried heir to Diplo and several other large properties owned by Sir Hugo Mallinger. All the young ladies were eager to get Grandcourt to notice them, but it was Gwendolen, apparently indifferent and coy in conversation with the well-mannered but monosyllabic Grandcourt, who had most success. For several weeks, Grandcourt courted Gwendolen, yet neither forced to any crisis the issue of possible marriage. Gwendolen's mother, uncle, and aunt urged her to try to capture Grandcourt. Just when it seemed that Grandcourt would propose and Gwendolen would accept, Mrs Lydia Glasher appeared, brought to the scene by the scheming of Grandcourt's companion, Lush, to tell Gwendolen that she was the mother of four of Grandcourt's illegitimate children and that she had left her husband to live with Grandcourt. She begged Gwendolen not to accept Grandcourt so that she might have the chance to secure him as the rightful father of her children. Gwendolen, promising not to stand in Mrs Glasher's way, had gone immediately to join friends at Leubronn.

Before he came to Leubronn, Daniel Deronda, the man whom Gwendolen had encountered in the gambling casino, had been Sir Hugo Mallinger's ward. He did not know his parents, but Sir Hugo had always treated him well. Sir Hugo, who had married late in life, had only daughters. Although he lavished a great deal of expense and affection on Deronda, his property was to go to his nephew, Mallinger Grandcourt. At Cambridge, Deronda had been extremely popular. There, too, he had earned the undying gratitude of a poor student named Hans Meyrick, whom Deronda helped to win a scholarship at the expense of his own studies. One day, after leaving Cambridge, while in a boat on the river, Deronda saved a pale and frightened young woman, Mirah Lapidoth, from committing suicide. She told him that she was a Jewess, returned after years of wandering with a brutal and blasphemous father, to look for her lost and fondly remembered mother and brother in London. Deronda took her to Mrs. Meyrick's home. There Mrs. Meyrick and her daughters nursed the penniless Mirah back to health.

When Gwendolen returned to Offendene, she learned that her family would be forced to move to a small cottage and that she would have to become a governess. The idea oppressed her so strongly that when she saw Grandcourt, who had been pursuing her on the Continent, she agreed at once to marry him, in spite of her promise to Mrs. Glasher. Her mother, aunt, and uncle knew nothing of Mrs. Glasher, Grandcourt knew only that she had spoken to Gwendolen, knowledge that he kept to himself.

After their marriage, Grandcourt soon turned out to be a mean, domineering, demanding man. He had set out to break Gwendolen's spirit, and he did. In the meantime, at several house parties, Gwendolen had met Daniel Deronda and found herself much attracted to him. At a New Year's party at Sir Hugo Mallinger's, Gwendolen, despite her husband's disapproval and biting reprisals, had spoken to Deronda frequently. When she told Deronda her whole story and confessed her guilt in breaking her promise to Mrs. Glasher, Deronda suggested that she show her repentance by living a less selfish life, caring for and helping others less fortunate than she. Gwendolen, realizing the folly of her marriage to Grandcourt and wishing to find some measure of happiness and peace, decided to follow the course Deronda had proposed.

Meanwhile, Deronda was attempting to secure Mirah's future and, if possible, to find her family. Mirah had been an actress and had some talent for singing. Deronda arranged an interview for her with Herr Klesmer, a German Jewish musician with many connections, who could get Mirah started on a career. Herr Klesmer was very much impressed with Mirah's singing. He had known Gwendolen at Offendene and, in his honesty, had refused to help her when she also asked for singing engagements, he had thought her without sufficient talent and had given her ego its first blow. Herr Klesmer had also married Miss Arrowpoint, the most talented and attractive girl, save Gwendolen, in the vicinity of Offendene.

Still trying to find Mirah's family, Deronda went wandering in the London East End. There he became friendly with the family of Ezra Cohen, a shopkeeper of craft and generosity. For a time, on the basis of some slight evidence, Deronda believed that the man might be Mirah's brother. There also, through Ezra's family, he met Mordecai, a feeble and learned man who immediately felt a great kinship with Deronda. Mordecai took Deronda to a meeting of his club, a group of men who discussed scholarly, political, and theological topics far removed from the commercial interests of Ezra.

Deronda was delighted when he finally learned that Mordecai was really Mirah's brother. This discovery helped Deronda himself to acknowledge and accept his own spiritual and literal kinship with the Jews. The boy of unknown origin, able to move successfully in the high society of England, had found his real home in London's East End.

DE RERUM NATURA

Type of work Didactic epic

Author Lucretius (Titus Lucretius Carus, c. 98 B.C. - 55 B.C.)

First transcribed First century B.C.

The De rerum natura (On the Nature of Things) is justly renowned as the greatest poetic monument of Epicurean philosophy. It is outstanding both as a scientific explanation of the poet's atomic theory and as a fine poem. Vergil himself was much influenced by Lucretius' dactylic hexameter verse, and echoes passages of the De rerum natura in the Georgics, a didactic epic modeled on Lucretius' poem, and in the Aeneid.

Lucretius, following his master Epicurus' doctrine, believed that fear of the gods and fear of death were the greatest obstacles to peace of mind, the object of Epicurean philosophy. He felt that he could dispel these unfounded terrors by explaining the workings of the universe and showing that phenomena interpreted as signs from the deities were simply natural happenings. His scientific speculations were based on Democritus' atomic theory and Epicurus' interpretation of it. Lucretius outlined the fundamental laws of this system in the first book of his poem.

According to Lucretius, everything is composed of small "first bodies," tiny particles made up of a few "minima" or "least parts" which cannot be separated. These "first bodies," atoms, are solid, indestructible, and of infinite number. They are mixed with void to make objects of greater hardness or softness, strength or weakness.

Lucretius "proves" these assertions by calling upon the reader's reason and his observation of nature, pointing out absurdities that might come about if his point were not true. For example, he substantiates his statement that nothing can be created from nothing by saying, "For if things came to being from nothing, every kind might be born from all things, nought would need a seed. First men might arise from the sea, and from the land the race of scaly creatures, and birds burst forth from the sky." These proofs, which may fill fifty or one hundred lines of poetry, are often unconvincing, but they reveal the author's knowledge of nature and his imaginative gifts.

The universe is infinite in the Epicurean system. Lucretius would ask a man who believed it finite, "If one were to run on to the end and throw a flying dart, would you have it that that dart goes on whither it is sped and flies afar, or do you think that something can check and bar its way?" He ridicules the Stoic theory that all things press toward a center, for the universe, being infinite, can have no center. Lucretius is, of course, denying the law of gravity. He often contradicts what science has since proved true, but he is remarkably accurate for his time.

Book II opens with a poetic description of the pleasure of standing apart from the confusion and conflicts of life. "Nothing is more gladdening than to dwell in the calm high places, firmly embattled on the heights by the teaching of the wise, whence you can look down on others, and see them wandering hither and thither." Lucretius is providing this teaching by continuing his discussion of atoms, which he says move continuously downward like dust particles in a sunbeam. They have a form of free will and can swerve to unite with each other to form objects. Lucretius adds that if the atoms could not will motion for themselves, there would be no explanation for the ability of animals to move voluntarily.

The poet outlines other properties of atoms in the latter part of the second book: they are colorless, insensible, and of a variety of shapes which determine properties of the objects the atoms compose Sweet honey contains round, smooth particles, bitter wormwood, hooked atoms

While Lucretius scorns superstitious fear of the gods, he worships the creative force of nature, personified as Venus in the invocation to Book I Nature controls the unending cycle of creation and destruction There are gods, but they dwell in their tranquil homes in space, unconcerned for the fate of men

A passage in praise of Epicurus precedes Book III, the book of the soul Lucretius says that fear of death arises from superstitions about the soul's afterlife in Hades This fear is foolish, for the soul is, like the body, mortal The poet describes the soul as the life force in the body, composed of very fine particles which disperse into the air when the body dies Since man will neither know nor feel anything when his soul has dissolved, fear of death is unnecessary

A man should not regret leaving life, even if it has been full and rich He should die as "a guest sated with the banquet of life and with calm mind embrace a rest that knows no care" If existence has been painful, then an end to it should be welcome

The introductory lines of Book IV express Lucretius' desire to make philosophy more palatable to his readers by presenting it in poetry His task is a new one "I traverse the distant haunts of the Pierides (the Muses), never trodden before by the foot of man"

The poet begins this book on sensation with an explanation of idols, the films of atoms which float from the surfaces of objects and make sense perception possible Men see because idols touch their eyes, taste the bitter salt air because idols of hooked atoms reach their tongues Idols become blunted when they travel a long distance, causing men to see far off square towers as round

fraction and perspective on men's reason, not their senses, for accuracy of sense perception is an important part of his theory 'Unless they are true, all reason, too, becomes false'

A second eulogy of Epicurus introduces the fifth book for some readers the most interesting of all In it Lucretius discusses the creation of the world and the development of human civilization Earth was created by a chance conjunction of atoms, which squeezed out sun, moon, and stars as they gathered together to form land The world, which is constantly disintegrating and being rebuilt, is still young, for human history does not go back beyond the Theban and Trojan wars

The poet gives several explanations for the motion of stars, the causes of night, and eclipses Since proof can come only from the senses, any theory which does not contradict perception is possible

Lucretius presents the curious idea that the first animals were born from wombs rooted in the earth Monsters were created, but only strong animals and those useful to man could survive A delightful picture of primitive man, a hardy creature living on nuts and berries and living in caves, follows Lucretius describes the process of civilization as men united for protection, learned to talk, use metals, weave, and wage war Problems arose for them with the discovery of wealth and property, breeding envy and discord It was at this point that Epicurus taught men the highest good, to free them from their cares

The sixth book continues the explanation of natural phenomena which inspired men to fear the gods thunder, lightning, clouds, rain, earthquakes Lucretius rambles over a great many subjects, giving several explanations for many of them He concludes the poem with a vivid description of the plague of Athens, modeled on Thucydides' account

COLONEL LULA, owner of Santa Fe plantation
CAPTAIN VICTORINO CARNEIRO DA CUNHA a humane lawyer
LIEUTENANT MAURICIO of the army

Dead Fires (Fogo morto), the tenth novel by Lins do Rego, marks his return to the themes of his original Sugar Cane Cycle, after four weak experiments in other fields. The author, descendant of an aristocratic planter family settled for years in Northeast Brazil, was educated for the law, but friendship with Brazil's great sociologist, Gilberto Freyre, showed him the rich literary inspiration in Brazil's ingenhos, or sugar centers, and turned him to fiction writing. Beginning with the novel Plantation Lad, Lins do Rego went on with Daffy Boy, Black Boy, Richard, Old Plantation, and The Sugar Refinery, all dealing with the same characters. In 1943, after four lesser novels based on other themes, came Dead Fires, his masterpiece, in which some of the characters from the earlier novels reappear. The novel is marked by improved technique, a greater use of dialogue, less morbidity and better character portrayal.

Some critics see in Victorino, the penniless, abused lawyer, a Brazilian Don Quixote, sure of what is right, hating bandits, cruel soldiers, and haughty plantation owners alike, and fighting all in justice, regardless of the cost to him. Like the Spanish don, Victorino was an aristocrat, related by blood to many of the important families of the region, but censuring their use of power because of his feeling for the common man. There is also a parallel with Don Quixote in the way Victorino was first ridiculed and then admired.

The main character, the crippled and ugly saddlemaker José Amaro, was a failure who tried to hide his sense of inferiority and cowardice behind a biting tongue and a scornful attitude toward everybody. He insisted that nobody owned him, or, as he expressed it more vividly, that nobody could scream at him. His only friends were the kindly Negro hunter Leandro, who occasionally left part of his bag at José's door, and white Victorino, sunk so low that even the moleques, the black boys, mocked him in the streets, calling after him "Papa Rabo."

José's attitude toward the bandit, Captain Antônio Silvino, arose from the admiration of a coward for a man daring enough to brave the power of the plantation owners. The imagination of the saddlemaker built Silvino into a kind of Robin Hood, siding with the poor against the grasping landlords, especially at the moment when the bandit attacked the town of Pilar and sacked the strongbox of the prefect, Quinca Napoleon. Afterward he invited the villagers to pillage the house José was grateful because the bandit came to his defense when he was ordered evicted from the house his father and he had occupied for half a century. However, Silvino's threats of interference stiffened the determination of José's landlord.

Not until the end was José disillusioned and the bandit's self-interest revealed. Attracted by rumors that Colonel

Lula still possessed the gold inherited from his father in law, Silvino came after it, threatening torture unless the hiding place was revealed. In reality, the wealth was not at the plantation. Lula, vanquished by circumstances and about to abandon his estate for the big city had sent the money ahead. An attack of convulsions momentarily saved the land owner from torture, the protests of Vic torino brought him further respite, but it was the arrival of Colonel Paulino that drove off the bandit. Until he realized Silvino's cruelty, José Amaro made sandals for him and his men, spied on his pursuers for him, and even got food and provisions to him when Lieutenant Maurício and his soldiers were on his trail.

José's feelings toward the wealthy plantation owners were determined by their attitude toward him. The novelist introduces two of them as representative of the landed gentry of the nineteenth century in Northeastern Brazil, men who derived their titles from their social and political positions.

With Colonel José Paulino, whose family had long owned the Santa Clara plantation, José Amaro was continually at odds because, as the wealthy man rode past the saddlemaker's house in his family carriage, he would only nod condescendingly. At the beginning of the novel, when Laurentino, the house painter, paused to talk on a May afternoon, while on his way to help the colonel beautify his manor house for the wedding of his daughter, Jose from his doorway said angrily that he would never work for a man he hated as much as he hated Colonel Paulino.

His attitude toward the other big sugar planter, Colonel Lula Cesar de Holanda Chacon, supposedly modeled on a cousin of the author's grandfather, was less bitter. He finally agreed to go to the Santa Fe plantation to repair the family carriage, whose history is related in the second part of the novel.

During the Revolution of 1848, Captain Tomás Cabral de Malo arrived with his cattle, his slaves, and his family in Parahyba (or Paraíba). He took possession of the Santa Fe plantation, adjoining Santa Clara, bought additional land from the Indians, and planted cotton. About then a penniless cousin, Lula, turned up and began courting the plantation owner's daughter.

Having won the captain's permission, Lula took her away on a honeymoon from which they returned with a pretentious carriage, practically useless in that roadless region. The rest of Lula's progress, as told in Dead Fires, makes him anything but admirable. At Captain Tomas' death, he fought the widow for control until her death. Then, in complete possession of the plantation and sugar refinery, he revealed his avaricious and cruel nature. José overlooked the past of his landlord, however, because Lula occasionally exchanged a word with him.

Jose's family is introduced early in the story. When Laurentino stopped to talk, the saddlemaker invited him for supper with his wife and their thirty year old daughter. The girl had never married because she insisted that she did not want to, but she nearly drove the old man frantic because she spent her days weeping. Eventually, in his exasperation he beat her until he dropped unconscious from that time on his wife thought only of ways to get herself and her daughter safely away. Jose had no other children. Lacking a son to carry on at his death, he had no incentive to enlarge his leather business or attract new customers.

Lins do Rêgo is continually making thrifty use of minor episodes, not only to carry forward the story but to reveal character. For example, while working at Colonel Lula's plantation, Jose revealed his trait of showing contempt for those he tries to impress and by his actions he so roused the enmity of the Negro Floripes, the Santa Fe overseer, that from then on he worked against José and hastened his tragedy. It was Floripes' lie, the report that Jose had promised aid to Vic torino's candidate against the politician backed by Lula, that persuaded the land owner that his tenant was ungrateful, and so José was ordered to leave the cabin occupied by his family for many years

The kindness of the hunter in leaving a rabbit at José's door revealed the old man's nausea at the sight of blood while the blood started a rumor that José was a werewolf. This rumor was crystallized into belief when he was found unconscious beside the river, where, in reality, he had collapsed trying to warn the bandits of the coming of soldiers.

In telling the story, Lins do Rego divides his narrative into three parts, with the second one, "The Santa Fe Plantation," a flashback of half a century, covering the rise to power of Lula.

When Isabel, daughter of Emperor Pedro, freed Brazil's last slaves in 1888, Lula was left without anyone to run the plantation or the refinery, for his Negroes were quick to get away from a master who used to beat them until he fell down in convulsions. In contrast, Colonel Paulino's field hands, who had been treated kindly, stayed on even after the liberation, and so he was able to lend his cousin by marriage enough laborers to help with the work. But still the hearth fires of Santa Fe burned lower and the plantation was doomed. Neighbors brought suits against Lula that were settled only because Colonel Paulino intervened. And Lula could find no one willing to marry his daughter.

José's fortunes also declined. Disillusioned about the outlaws, he found the soldiers of Lieutenant Mauricio even more cruel. Coming to protect the villagers, Lieutenant Mauricio beat blind Torcuato as a spy, arrested José and mistreated Victorino, who had won the admiration of his fellow citizens by facing the domineering officer with a writ of habeas corpus in order to free the saddle maker.

Freedom was meaningless now to old José. His family had left him, and he had no friends. He committed suicide in his empty house, where his Negro friend, Pajarito, found his body. Two cycles had ended. When Pajarito looked out the window, smoke was billowing from the chimneys of the Santa Clara sugar refinery, but he saw no activity at Santa Fe—where the fires were dead.

Critique

The Death of Ivan Ilyich, a masterpiece of Tolstoy's later period, was written after he had published his most famous novels. Its theme is related to his own struggle against an obsessive fear of death and the conclusion that he had wasted his life, a struggle which culminated for him in a spiritual rebirth. The story itself is a supreme imaginative creation, however deep its roots in the author's own experience. Tolstoy presents, with frankness, simplicity, and kindness, an ordinary man confronted by the irrevocable fact of death. Here is one of the finest examples in literature of the portrayal of the particular—in this case the life and death of Ivan Ilyich—with such realistic understanding that it acquires universal significance

The Story

During a break in a hearing, a group of lawyers gathered informally. One, Peter Ivanovitch, interrupted the good natured arguing of the others with the news that Ivan Ilyich, a colleague they greatly respected, was dead. Unwittingly, each thought first of what this death meant to his own chances of promotion, and each could not help feeling relief that Ivan Ilyich and not himself had died.

That afternoon Peter Ivanovitch visited the dead man's home, where the funeral was to be held. Although he met a playful colleague, Schwartz, he attempted to behave as correctly as possible under such sorrowful circumstances, as if observing the proper protocol would enable him to have the proper feelings. He respectfully looked at the corpse he talked with Ivan's widow, Praskovya Fedorovna. But he was continually distracted during his talk by an unruly spring in the hassock on which he sat. As he struggled to keep his decorum Praskovya spoke only of her own exhaustion and suffering. Peter, suddenly terrified by their mutual hypocrisy, longed to leave, and the widow, having gathered from him information about her pension, was glad to end the conversation. At the funeral Peter also saw Ivan's daughter and her fiancé, who were angrily glum, and Ivan's little son, who was tear stained but naughty. Only the servant boy, Gerasim, spoke cheerfully, for only he could accept death as natural. Leaving, Peter hurried to his nightly card game.

Ivan Ilyich had been the second and most successful of the three sons of a superfluous bureaucrat. An intelligent and popular boy, he seemed able to mold his life into a perfect pattern. As secretary to a provincial governor after completing law school, and later as an examining magistrate, he was the very model of conscientiousness mingled with good humor. He managed the decorum of his official position as well as the ease of his social one. Only marriage, although socially correct, did not conform to his ideas of decorum, his wife, not content to fulfill the role he had chosen for her, became demanding and quarrelsome. As a result, he increasingly shut himself off from his family (for he now had two children), finding the order and peace he needed in his judiciary affairs.

In 1880, however, he was shattered by the loss of two promotions. In desperation he went to St. Petersburg, where a chance meeting led to his obtaining a miraculously good appointment. In the city he found precisely the house he had always wanted and he worked to furnish it just to his taste. Even a fall and a resulting bruise on his side did not dampen his enthusiasm. He and his wife were delighted with their new home, which they felt to be aristocratic, although it looked like all homes of those who wished to appear well bred. To Ivan, life was at last as it should be: smooth, pleasant, and ordered according to an unwavering routine. His life was properly divided into the official and the personal, and the two halves were always kept dextrously apart.

Then Ivan began to notice an increasing discomfort in his left side. At last he consulted a specialist, but the examination left him frightened and helpless, for although he understood the doctor's objective attitude as akin to his own official one, he felt that it had given his pain an awesome significance. For a time he fancied he grew better from following prescriptions and learning all he could about his illness, but renewed attacks terrified him. Gradually Ivan found all his life colored by the pain. Card games became trivial, friends seemed only to speculate on how long he would live. When Ivan's brother-in-law came for a visit, his shocked look told Ivan how much illness had changed him, and he suddenly realized that he faced not illness but death itself. Through deepening terror and despair, Ivan shrank from this truth. Other men died, not he. Desperately he erected screens against the pain and the knowledge of death it brought, but it lurked behind court duties or quarrels with his family. The knowledge that it had begun with the bruise on his side only made his condition harder to bear.

As Ivan grew steadily worse, drugs failed to help him. But the clean strength and honesty of a peasant boy, Gerasim, nourished him, for he felt that his family were hypocrites who chose to pretend that he was not dying. Death to them was not part of that same decorum he too had once revered and was therefore hidden as unpleasant and shameful. Only Gerasim could understand his pain because only he admitted that death was real and natural.

Ivan retreated increasingly into his private anguish. He hated his knowing doctors, his plump, chiding wife, his daughter and her new fiancé. Lamenting, he longed to have his old, happy life again. But only memories of childhood revealed true happiness. Unwillingly he returned again and again to this knowledge as he continued questioning the reasons for his torment. If he had always lived correctly, why was this happening to him? What if he had been wrong? Suddenly he knew that the faint urges he had consciously stilled in order to do as people thought proper had been the true urges. And since he had not known the truth about life, he also had not known the truth about death. His anguish increased as he thought of the irrevocable choice he had made.

His wife brought the priest, whose sacrament eased him until her presence reminded him of the deception his life had been. He screamed to her to leave him, and he continued screaming as he struggled against death, unable to relinquish the illusion that his life had been good. Then the struggle ceased, and he knew that although his life had not been right, it no longer mattered. Opening his eyes, he saw his wife and son weeping by his bedside. Aware of them for the first time, he felt sorry for them. As he tried to ask their forgiveness, everything became clear to him. He must not hurt them, he must set them free and free himself from his sufferings. The pain and fear of death were no longer there. In stead there was only light and joy.

interest the vivid imagery and uncanny presentation of both the real world and the fever ridden, hallucinated, yet visionary world of the dying Virgil, the beauty of language and of the rhythmic sentences, the depth of the writer's attempts to explore metaphysical truth. Using a simple plot as a basis, Broch presents a symphony in four movements. Although the mood of the whole is meditative and elegiac, the style of each movement establishes its tempo, from the pages long sentences of the second movement to the antiphonal bursts of conversation in the third. In each movement, symbols incidents, and phrases are echoed and transformed, so that the meaning of the novel becomes clear to the reader only as the mystic knowledge which approaching death brings becomes clear to the poet.

The Story

The imperial fleet returned from Greece to Brundisium, bearing with it the Emperor Augustus and his poet, Virgil, who lay dying. Augustus had sought Virgil and brought him back from the peace and calm philosophy in Athens to the shouting Roman throngs — to the mob with its frightening latent capacity for brutality, its fickle adoration of its leaders. Yet these were the Romans whom Virgil had glorified, the nobles he had seen on shipboard greedily eating and gaming were their leaders, dapper, sham majestic Augustus was their emperor.

Fever-ridden, the poet heard a boy's song as the ship entered the harbor. Later, as he was carried from the ship, a beautiful boy appeared from nowhere to lead his litter away from the tumult surrounding the emperor, through narrow streets crowded with garbage ripening into decay, streets full of the miseries of the flesh where women jeered at him for being rich and weak. The women's insults made him aware of his own sham divinity and of the futility of his life. Dying, he at last saw clearly what hypocrisy his life had been, like the shining,

At the palace he was taken to his chambers. The boy Lysanias, remained with him as night fell. In the depths of a violent attack Virgil recognized his own lack of love. As he lay, conscious of his dying body and the infested night, he knew that, like the Augustus worshipping masses, he had followed the wrong gods, that in his devotion to poetry he had from the beginning given up the service of life for that of death, that it was too late for him to be fulfilled, for even the Aeneid lay unperfected. Some recurrence of vigor drove him to the window. Looking into the night, he knew that not his poem alone remained to be fulfilled, some knowledge still lay ahead for him to achieve. For the necessity of the soul is to discover itself, since through self-discovery it finds the universe — the landscape of the soul is that of all creation. One must learn, not through the stars, but through man.

Interrupting his thoughts, two men and a woman came through the streets quarreling and shouting good-natured obscenities, guffawing their bawdiness with that male laughter whose matter of factness annihilates rather than derides. This laughter, juxtaposed against the beautiful night, revealed something of the nature of beauty itself. Beauty is the opponent of knowledge, because it is remote, infinite, and therefore seemingly eternal, it is pursued wrongly for its own sake. The same nonhuman laughter is hidden in it. The artist who pursues beauty plunges into loneliness and self-idolatry because he chooses beauty rather than life, his work becomes adornment rather than revelation. This path Virgil had chosen — beauty's cold egotism instead of love's warm life which is true creativity. Thus he had died long before, even before his renunciation of the lovely Plotia, whom he now remembered.

The need for contrition because of his refusal of love, a refusal of the pledge given to each man with his life, overwhelmed him. The fever rose within him, bringing strangely prophetic visions of Rome in ruins with wolves howling, of giant birds droning. As reality returned, he knew that for his own salvation he had to do one thing: burn the Aeneid.

Lysanias read to him as he drifted into a calm dream, shining with a knowledge of all past earthly happenings and a vision of something to come. Not yet, but soon would come one in whom creation, love, immortality would be united, one who would bear salvation like a single star, whose voice he seemed to hear bidding him open his eyes to love, for he was called to enter the Creation. As the fever left him and dawn broke, he momentarily doubted the voice. Then came the vision of an angel and, at last, undisturbed sleep.

Virgil awoke to find two old friends come to cheer him. Their bluff reassurances changed to incredulity when they heard he planned to burn the Aeneid. Their arguments against his own conviction that his book lacked reality because he himself lacked love were blurred by his fevered perception. Lysanias, whose existence seemed questionable to his friends, appeared with a Near Eastern slave to reaffirm that Virgil was the guide, although not the savior. Plotia came and called him on to an exchange of mutual love and the destruction of his work: the renunciation of beauty for love. Suddenly he and Plotia were exposed and power thundered around him.

Augustus had come to ask Virgil not to burn the Aeneid. In the ensuing interview, Virgil's rising delirium made him not only supernaturally aware of truth but also confused as to reality: the invisible Plotia guarded the manuscript, the invisible Lysanias lurked nearby, the room sometimes became a landscape. Augustus insisted that the poem was the property of the Romans, for whom it had been written. Virgil tried to explain that poetry is the knowledge of death, for only through death can one understand life, that unlike Aeschylus, whose knowledge had forced him to poetry, he, Virgil, had sought knowledge through writing poetry and had therefore found nothing.

Then Augustus and the slave seemed to be talking, and Augustus was the symbol of the state he had created, which was order and sobriety and humanity's supreme eternal reality. The slave, awaiting the birth of the supreme ancestor's son, was steadfastness and the freedom of community. The truth of the state must be united to the metaphysical by an individual act of truth, must be made human to realize perfection. Such a savior will come, whose sacrificial death will be the supreme symbol of humility and charity. Still Virgil insisted that he must sacrifice his work because he had not sacrificed his life, that destroying a thing which lacked perception redeemed both himself and the Romans.

Augustus, growing angry, accused Virgil of envy, and in a moment of love Virgil gave him the poem, agreeing not to destroy it. He asked, however, that his slaves might go free after his death. As he talked of his will to his friends, renewed attacks of fever brought him more and more strange hallucinations. He called for help and found he could at last say the word for his own salvation.

After he had finished dictating his will, it seemed to him that he was once more on a boat, one smaller than that which had brought him into the harbor the day before, rowed by his friend Plotus and guided by Lysanias. About him were many people he knew. Gradually all disappeared as he floated into the night, the boy became first a seraph whose ring glowed like a star, then Plotia, who led him into the day again. Reaching shore, they entered a garden where, somehow, he knew that she had become the boy and the slave and that he had become all of them, then he was also the animals and plants, then the mountains, and finally the universe, contained in a small white core of unity—and nothing. Then he was commanded to turn around, and the nothing became everything again, Finally he was received into the word created by the word in the circle of time itself

Critique

While Gustav Freytag's novels exhibit certain aspects of romanticism, they also contain a greater, more influential element of realism. The combination has sometimes been compared to the work of Freytag's distinguished British contemporary, Charles Dickens. Freytag, a great champion of the German middle class, believed that Germans as a whole were better, more honorable, more stable people than other Europeans and that in the sober, industrious middle class lay the future greatness of his country. With the nobility Freytag had little patience, portraying them, as he did in Debit and Credit, as a group with little talent, little common sense, and an empty sense of honor. Of all Freytag's work, both in drama and fiction, Debit and Credit has received the highest praise as an example of the combination of the romance and the realistic social novel.

The Story

Upon the death of his father, an accountant, Anton Wohlfart, a very young man, traveled to the capital of his province in eastern Germany. In the city he found employment in the mercantile establishment of T O Schroter, an industrious and honorable German business man. During his journey, Wohlfart encountered two people who were later to play an important part in his life. He wandered accidentally onto the estate of Baron von Rothsattel, whose beautiful daughter Lenore made a lasting impression on the boy. He also met Veitel Itzig, a young Jew who had been a former schoolmate, making his way to the city to seek his fortune.

Being an industrious and intelligent young man, as well as personable, Anton Wohlfart soon made a place for himself among his fellow workers and in the esteem of his employer. Among the other clerks in the firm was Fritz von Fink, a young Americanized German whose sense of industry and honor had been warped by a stay in New York City. Von Fink became a close friend of Wohlfart's despite the differences in their social standing and the escapades into which von Fink led Wohlfart, sometimes to the latter's embarrassment and chagrin.

In the meantime Baron von Rothsattel, who had little talent for managing his estates or business, was led to accept the advice of Hirsch Ehrenthal, an unscrupulous Jewish usurer and businessman who plotted the baron's financial ruin so that he might buy up his estates at a fraction of their value Ehrenthal, who had persuaded the baron to mortgage his estates in order to purchase lands in Poland and to build a factory to extract sugar from beets, depended on the baron's lack of business acumen to ruin him, with a little help from Ehrenthal on the way. Ehrenthal did not realize at the time that Itzig, whom he had taken into his employ, was also plotting to acquire the baron's estates by a dishonest manipulation of documents and the knowledge he had of Ehrenthal's affairs. Itzig was coached in his scheme by a drunken lawyer who also hoped to make some profit from the nobleman's ruin.

Fritz von Fink finally decided to return to America to take over the affairs of a wealthy uncle who had recently died. Before he left, he proposed marriage to Sabine Schroter, Wohlfart's employer's sister, but the young woman refused the nobleman's offer. Shortly after his departure, revolt broke out in the nearby provinces of Poland. In order to prevent business losses and reestablish his affairs there, Schroter bravely entered Poland, accompanied by Wohlfart. During their stay, Wohlfart saved his employer's life, winning his and his sister's gratitude. Because of his employer's trust, Wohlfart was left in Poland for many months as the firm's agent, to reorganize the business of the company. He returned to Germany to be honored by his employer and given a position of considerable responsibility. During his stay in Poland he had met Eugene von Rothsattel, the baron's son, who proved to be a gallant but impractical young man. Because of his admiration for the young nobleman and his romantic regard for Lenore von Rothsattel, Wohlfart had lent a large sum of money to Eugene.

As time passed the financial affairs of Baron von Rothsattel became worse and worse, falling deeper into debt, the nobleman gave personal notes and mortgages to Ehrenthal and the other usurers who were his accomplices. When the baron thought himself on the edge of ruin, a ray of hope appeared in the person of Ehrenthal's son, an upright and noble hearted young man who tried to persuade his father to give up dishonest gains and let the baron keep his family estates. The young man was ill, however, and he died before he was able to influence his father's actions. On the night of his death a casket filled with important documents was stolen from Ehrenthal's office by Itzig's accomplice.

The baron, desperate, attempted suicide. He failed in this, but the blast of the pistol blinded him. In desperation, Lenore von Rothsattel appealed to Wohlfart to become her father's agent. After much soul searching, the young man agreed, although his departure from Schroter's firm made his employer angry and opened a breach between the two men. Schroter felt that the nobility, who constantly proved their inability to manage their affairs, should be allowed to ruin themselves and so lose their place of influence in German culture.

Wohlfart journeyed again to Poland, this time to try to salvage the estate which the baron had acquired in that country. He found the estate in run down condition and the Poles decidedly incompetent and unfriendly. With the help of loyal German settlers in the area, Wohlfart managed to bring some order to the farms of the estate, to which the baron, his wife, and his daughter moved, knowing that the family estates in Germany were lost. After many months Wohlfart managed to put the baron's affairs in order, however, his efforts were lost on the baron, who had a misplaced sense of rank. Only Wohlfart's regard for Lenore kept him in the position of responsibility after he had been repeatedly insulted.

When the revolutions of 1848 broke out, the troubles spread to the Polish provinces in which the von Rothsattel estate was located. Fortunately, Fritz von Fink appeared and under his leadership the estate was defended from the rebel depredations until help from a military force arrived on the scene. During this period von Fink and Lenore discovered their love for each other. When danger was past, the baron's resentment against Wohlfart exploded, and the young man was dismissed. The baroness, who realized what the young man had sacrificed for her family, spoke to him of her gratitude and asked him to try to straighten out their affairs with the usurers.

Returning to his home city, Wohlfart found a cordial welcome from his former employer's sister, but a rather cool one from Schroter himself. Schroter feared that living with the nobility had spoiled the young man, and he still resented the fact that Wohlfart had left his firm. Through his own efforts and those of a detective, Wohlfart began to trace down the plots which had ruined Baron von Rothsattel. He was informed that Ehrenthal was not the real villain, and soon it appeared that Itzig had been the true culprit in the affair. When the broken-down lawyer who had been Itzig's mentor learned of the investigations, he went to Itzig for money and a chance to leave Germany; he was the one who had stolen the baron's documents and he feared arrest. Itzig, driven by panic, drowned his accomplice. Just at the hour he was to marry Ehrental's daughter, a beautiful woman and the usurer's only heir, Itzig was told that the authorities were ready to arrest him. In his attempt to escape, Itzig himself was drowned at the place where he had murdered his accomplice. The documents were recovered, however, and the fortune and honor of Baron von Rothsattel were redeemed.

Having recovered the fortune of the baron's family and overcome his sentimental regard for Lenore, Wohlfart decided to leave the city, for he believed that he had no future in the firm of T. O. Schroter. Before he left, however, he went to see Sabine Schroter, his employer's sister, and the two young people confessed to each other that they were in love. The girl took the young man to her brother, who amazed Wohlfart by his warmth. Sabine revealed to Wohlfart that he was to marry her and become a partner in the firm, if that was his wish.

A DEFENSE OF THE CONSTITUTIONS OF GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Type of work Political treatise
Author John Adams (1735-1826)
First published 1787-1788

This sprawling work consists of John Adams' selections from writings on republican governments ranging from ancient Greece to America of the 1780's, material interspersed with his own maxims and observations on historical characters and events. He excused his faulty arrangement and style on the grounds of "hasty," fourteen-month compilation, prompted by news of Shays' Rebellion in Massachusetts and moves toward revising the constitution of the American union. Some regard the work as possibly the most complete examination into the philosophy and institutions of republicanism by any American.

Adams' purposes were several: to rebut the French philosophe Turgot's charge that Americans showed themselves slavish followers of England in their state constitutions, most of which, like that of Adams for Massachusetts, provided for constitutional checks and balances, to show such governments superior to "simple" ones which centralized authority in an omnipotent, unicameral legislature, like those advocated by Turgot and instituted in Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin, and to prove by comparing his toric forms of republics that their ruin proceeded from improper division of power.

Adams was convinced that, regardless of all differences, governments "move by unalterable rules." He declared his repugnance for absolutism, whether monarchical or egalitarian, basing his argument on the practical grounds that neither gave "full scope to all the faculties of man," enlisted the talents of all citizens, or checked administrative abuses. Instead, he saw absolutisms sowing future suspicion which pitted against one another family and family, rich and poor, educated and ignorant, the gifted and the dull. He espoused a "mixture" of the advantages of democracy, aristocracy, and monarchy. Although his statement of the favorable aspects of aristocracies and monarchies was turned against him by political rivals later on, the Defense contains as many strictures against these two forms of government as against democracy. Alleging that "there can be no free government without a democratical branch in the constitution," Adams even said America would be better off to risk civil war arising from improper balance of power in a democratic republic than to establish an absolute monarchy.

Sure that sovereignty was derived from a majority of the mass of people and that a representative branch of the legislature should be organized on democratic principles, Adams feared to trust without restraint all power to the masses. As a check on the representative house, he advocated a senate in terms which have seldom been duplicated. It would be not only a forum where property interests might be defended against leveling tendencies of the representatives, but also an honorable place whither demagogues might be banished by election to render their ambition safe to and their abilities conserved for an empire of liberty. Adams' advocacy of coordinate but independent executive, judicial, and legislative branches of government causes no surprise. He advocated a single executive in order for it to be censorable for administrative abuse. By these forms, he contended, America would realize a practical government of laws and not of men.

Less hopeful of mankind and distrustful of a supposed passion for democracy, Adams denied Turgot's assertion that "a love of democracy is the love of equality," saying that "every man hates to have a superior [and] no man is willing to have an equal," that "democracy signifies nothing more or less than a nation of people without any government at all, and before any constitution is instituted." Adams deemed "reason, conscience, a regard for justice, and a sense of duty and moral obligation" the only defenses against "desire for fame, and the applause, gratitude, and rewards of the public" as well as "the real friends of equality." He was so confident of the beneficent effects of a republic of mixed characteristics that he averred it would make honest men of knaves from having one rogue to watch another.

Believing that "God and nature" ordained inequalities of wealth, birth, and ability among men, Adams declared there was a natural aristocracy. Not dangerous in itself, he believed it would transform an omnipotent unicameral legislature into an oligarchy or monarchy, destroying "all equality and liberty, with the consent and acclamation of the people themselves." Believing man more selfish than public spirited, he would no more trust all of an omnipotent, unicameral legislature than any one man's ambition for gold or power or acclaim. Unless "the rich and the proud" and the representatives of the masses were thrown into separate, coequal assemblies, each could do mischief and neither check the other or an executive.

He declared that "conviction," not "habit," caused Americans to retain their English inheritance of preserving governmental equilibrium by division of powers between executives, two house legislatures, and a separate judiciary. Only in such institutions did he find hope for avoiding the hypocrisy, superstition, flattery, and corruption which had overtaken earlier republics. Advancing from the individual states to the federal government, Adams dismissed the continental congresses under the Articles of Confederation as "only a diplomatic assembly," necessitating that the states themselves have balanced governments to check the anstocratical traits of the congressmen "Mixing the authority of the one, the few, and the many confusedly into one assembly," said he, created a train of events which would proceed from aristocratical wrangling over offices to "division, faction, sedition, and rebellion." He observed political parties in every country, controlled only by monarchical armies or by "a balance in the constitution."

Thinking virtue "too precarious a foundation for liberty," he declared that governments needed power to compel "all orders, ranks, and parties" to "prefer the public good before their own," but that power was surest if based on "reverence and obedience to the laws."

With enthusiasm for the proposed federal constitution, Adams hailed the old confederation as inadequate and the new frame of government, so similar to Adams' own views, to be the "greatest single effort of national deliberation that the world has ever seen."

Deirdre of the Sorrows, Synge's last play, was never performed until after his death. The play deals with the Irish legendary past, dramatizing an account of the beautiful Irish heroine who preferred death along with her lover to life as the wife of the king. The play is full of this romantic dedication, fully developed in Synge's rich Irish idiom. The language of the Irish peasant is given both power and dignity as it is shaped into the tragic movement of the play. And the play is not without touches of humane characterization. The king is not simply the cruel ruler; he is also a sad and lonely man who deeply regrets the deaths he has caused. Naisi is not simply the martyred hero, but also the husband who rants that his wife has caused him to be a softer man and allowed him to desert the ways of his brothers and his companions in arms. The play contains both the rich warmth of Synge's local and distinctively Irish characterizations and the romantic quality of the legendary.

devil, and that if two persons drank of it, they would share the same thoughts and desires but secretly wish to destroy each other

On St Anthony's Day Medardus preached a sermon about the elixir While he was talking he saw in the audience a painter whom he had once seen at the Convent of the Holy Lime Tree The sight disturbed him so much that he began to rave like a madman Later, in an attempt to regain his full senses, he drank some of the elixir

One day, during the confessional a beautiful woman, in appearance exactly like a painting of St Rosalia, told Medardus that she loved him, and then left Medardus determined to run away to find her Before he could escape from the convent, however, Prior Leonardus sent him on an errand to Rome

On the way to Rome Medardus saw an officer leaning over a precipice When Medardus tried to save him, the officer fell over the ledge Just then a page appeared and told Medardus that his disguise was very good Medardus, hardly knowing what he did, went to the nearby castle, where he met an old man, Reinhold, who seemed to be expecting him Reinhold told him that Baron von F——, the owner of the castle, had a son, Hermogen, and a daughter, Aurelia, by an Italian wife who later died The baron had then married Euphemia, a sinister woman who was carrying on an affair with Count Victorin, an ex-suitor The count was in the habit of disguising himself in order to gain entrance to the castle

Medardus became convinced that he was Victorin When he saw that Aurelia was the mysterious lady who looked like St Rosalia, he felt that fate was guiding him He tried to approach Aurelia, but she ran away Because Hermogen had witnessed the incident, Medardus killed him As Medardus fled from the castle, he heard that Euphemia was dying of a poison she had intended for him Taking refuge in the woods, Medardus cut off his beard and changed into clothes that Victorin's page had brought him

When Medardus arrived in Frankenburg, he recognized the painter who had disturbed his sermon on St Anthony's Day After he had tried to kill the man with a stiletto, Medardus was rescued from an angry mob by Pietro Belcampo, an odd hairdresser

At the forest house of the Prince von Rosenthurm, Medardus met a monk who looked like him and who drank some of his elixir Medardus later went to the castle, where the court physician showed him a picture of a person who again looked just like him The man was Francesco, who, together with a strange painter, had been brought to the court by the prince's brother, the Duke of Neuenburg The duke had become engaged to an Italian countess and married her but on their wedding night the duke had been found murdered by a stiletto wound The bride claimed, however, that the groom had come to the bridal chamber without a light, consummated the marriage, and left The painter, accused of the murder, escaped, and the countess went to live in a distant castle

Francesco was engaged to the sister of the princess During the marriage ceremony the painter reappeared Francesco, trying to kill the painter with a stiletto, fainted The next day he left, still unwed It was later learned that the Italian countess had given birth to a son named Victorin Francesco's intended bride left to become the abbess at Kreuzbeig

Hearing these tales, Medardus realized that Francesco must be his father At a party that night Medardus was astonished to see that the princess was accompanied by Aurelia When Aurelia recognized him, he was charged with the murder of Hermogen and imprisoned Later he was released because his double, a mad monk who greatly resembled him, had confessed to the crime Medardus also learned that he and Victorin were step brothers

Medardus became engaged to Aurelia

On the day that he was to marry her he saw the mad monk being taken to the scaffold. Suddenly Medardus began to rave. In his frenzy he stabbed Aurelia, rescued the monk from the cart, and escaped into the woods. When he regained consciousness he found himself, dressed as a monk, in an Italian madhouse. He had been taken there by Belcampo, the hairdresser, who said that he had found Medardus in the woods, naked, with a monk's robe lying beside him.

Medardus went next to a Capuchin convent near Rome. While there, he learned that Aurelia was alive. He also saw a strange book that a mysterious painter left at the convent. It contained sketches of paintings Medardus had seen at the Convent of the Holy Lime Tree and the history of the artist. He was Francesco, a painter who had drunk of St. Anthony's elixir.

Among his works, according to the account, was a painting of the martyrdom of St. Rosalia. One day he had met a woman who looked just like the painting. They married, but his wife died soon after their son was born. Then Francesco, accused of sorcery, fled with his child, whom he nourished on the elixir. From Francesco's son the family branched out and included the Princess von Rosenthurm, the abbess, the first Baroness von F——, Euphemia, and Victorin.

Medardus, now repenting his past, punished himself so much that he became known to the Pope, who spoke of making the monk his confessor. Having incurred the antagonism of the papal confessor in this manner, Medardus, realizing that his life was in danger, left Rome.

He returned to the Cistercian monastery and saw Prior Leonardus, who said that Victorin had come there, claimed to be Medardus, and then disappeared. By piecing together the strange sequences of events, Medardus and Leonardus realized that Medardus and Victorin, two brothers who had drunk of the elixir, had tried to destroy each other.

Leonardus also told Medardus that Aurelia was to become a nun that day, taking the conventual name of Rosalia. This news so disturbed Medardus that while Aurelia was taking her vows he had an impulse to stab her, but after an inward struggle he conquered his demon and had peace in his soul. Suddenly there was a disturbance in the church. Medardus' double, dressed in rags, ran to the altar, shouted that Aurelia was his intended bride, stabbed her in the heart, and escaped. Medardus rushed to Aurelia's side. Close by he saw the mysterious painter, who said that Medardus' trials would soon end. Aurelia regained consciousness, told Medardus that he and she were destined to expiate the guilt of their family, and then died. The people in the church, having seen the painter emerge from a picture over the altar, believed that a miracle had occurred; they regarded Aurelia, now called Rosalia, as a saint.

Medardus, having fully recovered, could clearly tell truth from falsehood, and from Leonardus and the abbess he received forgiveness for his past deeds. Leonardus then asked him to commit his life story to writing. Having completed this task, he was awaiting the time when he would join Aurelia in Heaven.

Father Spindion, the librarian of the Capuchin monastery at Königswald, appended a note to Medardus' manuscript. He wrote that one night, hearing strange sounds from Medardus' cell, he investigated and saw a tall man who said that the hour of fulfillment would come soon. Then Medardus died, one year to the minute from the time of Aurelia's death. Father Spindion added that the painting of St. Rosalia, which the monastery had acquired, bore, on the day of Medardus' funeral, a wreath of roses. The wreath had been put there by Pietro Belcampo, who later joined the order and became Brother Peter.

To understand a religious play like The Devotion of the Cross, one must always keep in mind that Spain was, and still is, a deeply religious nation, and that Calderón most truly expressed its feelings and ideas in the seventeenth century. The most popular of Spanish playwrights after the death of Lope de Vega in 1635, he wrote both secular and religious dramas until he took holy orders in 1651. From that time until his death he wrote only religious plays, including two Corpus Christi plays a year. The Devotion of the Cross is one of his early works. Since the characters and the setting are Italian, some critics assign it to the period when he was a soldier in Italy. Another version called The Cross in the Sepulchre has been found in a rare "suelta," or play printed separately, undated but signed "Ivan de Alarcón." Its discoverer believes that Calderón used it as a basis for his improved version. Valbuena Prat, on the other hand, wonders whether it may be a later version of Calderón's play, done by a less skilled dramatist. Another version of it, assigned—as was practically every other unclaimed play during the Golden Age—to Lope de Vega, can be found in a collection dated 1634. All that is definite is that Calderón claimed it under its present title in his Primera Parte of 1636. The plot is less complicated than is usual in Calderón's work.

The Story

Two rustics, Gil and Menga, were looking for a lost donkey when they spied two men preparing to fight a duel. One was Lisardo, angry that anyone as low born as Eusebio should aspire to marry his sister Julia.

Eusebio explained by telling a miraculous story. He had been one of two infants abandoned beneath a wayside cross. Taken home by a shepherd, the famished baby bit the breast of his foster mother, who threw the child into a well where his rescuers found him floating safely with arms crossed. Later the house in which he was living burned, but the fire broke out on the Day of the Cross, and once more he survived unharmed. More recently, in a shipwreck, he had floated to safety on a raft of two crossed planks. He explained that since he had obviously acquired nobility by devotion to the cross, he deserved the girl. Lisardo denied the claim and they fought. Again nothing could harm Eusebio. As Lisardo lay dying of his wound, he begged in the name of the cross for Eusebio to save him. The amazed peasants reported that they had seen Eusebio pick up his dying enemy and carry him to a convent.

Back in Siena, Julia was fearful of her father's discovery of letters she had received from Eusebio. When her lover appeared, wanting to take her away with him before she learned about her brother's death, her father's arrival forced him to hide and listen to Curcio as he voiced his long held suspicions of his wife's infidelity. Curcio was interrupted by the arrival of four peasants carrying the body of Lisardo Julia, grieving, ordered the killer out of her life forever.

Eusebio, broken hearted, turned bandit and through his cruelty rose to command a troop of outlaws. Only captives mentioning the cross escaped death at his hands. One day a bullet creased prisoner was brought in carrying a volume titled Miracles of the Cross. He was Father Alberto, and in gratitude for having his life spared the priest promised Eusebio that he would be on hand to hear the bandit's last confession.

News arrived that Lisardo's father, having put Julia into a convent, was pursuing Eusebio with soldiers. Scorning danger, Eusebio let his passion for Julia take him to the convent, where he found the girl in bed. Before he could take her, he saw on her breast the same sign of the cross that was on his own skin. The mark told him that she had been the other child left beside the cross, his sister and so he ran away. Julia, who had tried to fight him off in her cell, now pursued him in masculine attire, she did not know why he refused to love her.

When the soldiers overtook him, Curcio wounded Eusebio fatally. Then the cross on the young man's body revealed to Curcio that he had slain his own son exposed with his twin sister because of the father's baseless suspicions of his wife's unfaithfulness.

With his dying breath, Eusebio called for Father Alberto. Four shepherds arrived to bury his body. The priest also appeared as he had promised. He explained that because of God's pleasure in Eusebio's devotion to the cross, his soul had been left in his body long enough for him to make his confession and be re deemed.

Le Sage is chiefly remembered today for his long picaresque novel, Gil Blas (1715 1735), but his early publication of Le Diable boiteux (Asmodeus, or, The Devil on Two Sticks), with its extensive revision and enlargement in 1725, created far more excitement in his own day and is still an interesting example of the early realistic novel of manners. As he did in most of his prose fiction, Le Sage worked from a Spanish original in this work, borrowing his title and some of the early incidents from El Diablo Cojuelo (1641), by Luis Vélez de Guevara. Once started, however, Le Sage drew further and further away from his Spanish beginnings and thereby entertained his contemporaries by introducing a wealth of anecdotes and reminiscences, portraits and sketches of some of the most prominent of Parisian personages, under the guise of Spanish names. His satire is trenchant and ironical, though never gross or vulgar. Le Sage saw humanity with a sharp and critical eye, and he was particularly successful in his witty portrayals of authors, actors, lawyers, the social world, and "persons of quality." Like most picaresque fiction, the novel is loosely plotted, within a central narrative concerning the fortunes of Don Cleophas, a young Spanish cavalier. Le Sage introduced scores of other tales, ranging from brief summaries of a few sentences to short stories running for several pages or chapters. But the major plot remains in evidence throughout the book, and the author concludes his tale with a suitably romantic ending.

The Story

On a dark October night in Madrid, Don Cleophas Leandro Perez Zambullo, a student of Alcalá, was in dreadful trouble. While visiting Donna Thomasa, his innamorata, in her apartment, three or four hired bravos set upon him, and when he lost his sword in the ensuing struggle, he was forced to take flight over the rooftops of the neighboring houses. Spying a light in a garret, he entered through a window and discovered an empty room furnished with all manner of a magician's strange gear. As he was taking stock of the place, he heard a sigh. Soon he realized that he was being addressed by a demon in a bottle. To the student's questionings the spirit replied that he was neither Lucifer, Uriel, Beelzebub, Leviathan, Belphegor, nor Ashtaroath, but Asmodeus, the Devil on Two Sticks, who always befriended hapless lovers.

Welcoming the help of this creature, Cleophas broke the vial, and out tumbled a monstrous dwarf, with the legs of a goat, a stature of less than three feet, and a grotesque and grimacing face. Half concealed by extraordinary clothing and a curiously embroidered white satin cloak were the two crutches on which the dwarf hobbled about.

Since Cleophas was eager to escape his pursuers and Asmodeus wished to avoid his captor, the magician, the two did not linger in the attic. Cleophas grasped the edge of the demon's cloak, and off they flew into the sky over Madrid. For the remainder of their association together, Asmodeus entertained his companion with views of all that was happening in the city, explaining the circumstances and characteristics of those into whose houses they looked.

At first they peered into the houses immediately beneath them. Asmodeus showed Cleophas some ridiculous views of a coquette and her artifices, a noble man, a poet, and an alchemist. At last they came to a mansion where cavaliers and their ladies were celebrating a wedding. The demon proceeded to tell the story of the Count de Belflor and Leonora de Cespedes.

The Count de Belflor, a gallant of the court, fell in love with Leonora de Cespedes and wished to make her his mistress. By guile, the gift of a well-filled purse, and the promise of another thousand pistoles when he had accomplished his design, he secured the aid of her duenna, Marcella, who at last prevailed on the girl to admit the young nobleman to her chamber at night. One morning, as the count was making a hasty departure, for the dawn was breaking, he slipped and fell while descending the silken ladder lowered from Leonora's bedchamber, and the noise awakened Don Luis de Cespedes, her father, who slept in the room above. Uncovering the truth and affronted by this stain upon his family honor, the old don confronted his daughter's lover. The count offered to provide for Don Pedro, the son of the insulted father, but refused to marry the daughter, giving as his false excuse a marriage which the king had already arranged for the young courtier.

Later, after reading a reproachful letter written by Leonora, the count was moved to repentance. About the same time Don Pedro played truant from his studies at Alcalá to pay court to an unknown young beauty whom he was meeting in secret. In a street brawl his life was saved by the count, who happened to be passing by

The count asked the young man to go with him to act as a watchman and guard while Belflor had an interview with Leonora. The truth being revealed when Don Luis confronted his son, the count asked for the hand of Leonora and bestowed that of his sister, Donna Eugenia, on his new friend and brother. Don Pedro was overjoyed when he in turn discovered that his secret love was the sister of the Count de Belflor. The two couples were married, and Cleophas, guided by the demon, witnessed the festivities of their double wedding. Only Marcella, the treacherous duenna, had no part in the mirth. Don Luis sent her to a nunnery where she could spend her ill gotten pistoles and prayers to win pardon for her wickedness.

Directing Cleophas' attention to other homes in the city, Asmodeus showed him the plight of an impoverished marquis, a plagiarizing author, a procurer of young men for rich widows, and a printer of anti religious books. At Cleophas' request, the dwarf secured revenge for his mortal companion on the faithless Donna Thomasa. As she was entertaining the assassins she had hired to attack Cleophas, Asmodeus put the men into a jealous rage over her and set them to fighting. So great was the disturbance they caused that neighbors summoned the police, who on their arrival found two of the men slain. The assassins were thrown into the city dungeon and Donna Thomasa was eventually sentenced to be transported to the colonies. Thus proud Cleophas had his revenge.

Next, Asmodeus revealed the circumstances of the wretches in the nearby prison and madhouse. Poisoners, assassins, servants falsely accused and servants deserving imprisonment, a dishonest surgeon, and others were all displayed in their cells. At the madhouse, Cleophas saw political and religious fanatics, as well as those maddened by jealousy, grief, and the ingratitude of their relatives. Asmodeus also took the opportunity of showing Cleophas other people who should have been confined in an insane asylum, for their brains were addled by avarice, egotism, and the uncontrollable pangs of love.

Suddenly from their vantage point above the city, the two glimpsed a raging fire in a house beneath them. To every one's horror, the beautiful Donna Seraphina, daughter of Don Pedro de Escalano, was trapped in an upstairs room. Asmodeus, at the entreaties of Cleophas, assumed the shape and appearance of the young student and brought the girl out of the burning building safely. After the rescue Asmodeus told Cleophas that he had suddenly decided upon a grand design: the young man was ultimately to marry the lovely Donna Seraphina, whose noble father already believed himself deeply indebted to the handsome young cavalier.

Asmodeus continued this strange tour of Madrid with portrayals of the unrevealed secrets of those buried in the tombs of a churchyard and with glimpses of bedside death scenes of true grief, avarice, jealousy, and self seeking. For contrast, he then told Cleophas a long and circumstantial tale of true friendship and love.

Having slain his false wife's lover, Don Juan de Zarata, a gallant of Toledo, fled to Valencia. Near the outskirts of that city he stopped a duel between Don Alvaro Ponzo and Don Fabricio de Mendoza, rivals for the hand of the beautiful young widow, Donna Theodora de Cifuentes. On the advice of Don Juan, the lady was allowed to choose between her suitors, her choice was Don Fabricio. Through that meeting the young Toledan and Don Fabricio became inseparable companions. The latter, however, could not understand his friend's seeming indifference to the charms of Donna Theodora. What he did not suspect was that the Toledan had been greatly attracted to the lady and she to him, but that out of regard for friendship Don Juan made every effort to repress his passion. Unhappy in her own unrealized love for Don Juan, the lady finally decided to return to her estate at Villareal. When the Toldan confessed the truth to Don Fabricio, that gentleman was so moved by Don Juan's delicacy of feeling that he vowed no rivalry in love could ever part them.

Meanwhile, Donna Theodora had been kidnapped by Don Alvaro's ruffians and put on a vessel bound for Sardinia. Don Fabricio and Don Juan set out in pursuit, but the ship on which they sailed was overtaken by Tunisian pirates and the two were made prisoners. Separated in their captivity, they were in despair. Don Juan, sold to the Dey of Algiers, was made a gardener. At length the dey, impressed by the bearing and courtesy of his Christian slave, made him his confidant. The dey had in his harem a Spanish lady whose grief appeared inconsolable, he asked Don Juan to speak to her as a countryman and assure her of her master's tender regard. To Don Juan's surprise, the lady proved to be Donna Theodora, also taken captive when her abductors were killed by Algerian pirates.

From that time on Don Juan planned to deliver Donna Theodora from her captivity, and at last, aided by an unknown accomplice, they made their escape. Their unknown benefactor turned out to be Don Fabricio, who had been rescued aboard a French privateer. Mistaking Don Juan for the false Don Alvaro, Don Fabricio stabbed his friend and then, discovering his error, plunged his sword into his own breast. The condition of Don Fabricio grew worse and he died soon after the arrival of the fugitives in Spain. Torn between their mutual love and grief for their friend, Donna Theodora and Don Juan were at last free to marry. A short time later Don Juan was mortally injured in a fall from his horse. Half mad with grief, Donna Theodora would soon follow him to the grave.

At length the sleeping city awoke. Protesting that he was not weary, Cleophas urged the little demon to let him see more. Asmodeus directed his glance to the activities in the streets of beggars, artisans, a miser, a philosopher. Then they came upon the throngs of people gathering for the king's levee: faithless and forgetful noblemen, those seeking their own good fortune, gamblers, an honest magistrate, and others awaited their turn to appear before the king. But Cleophas could not be shown into the king's presence, since the royal cabinet, as Asmodeus carelessly explained, was under the exclusive control of other devils.

For diversion, Asmodeus took Cleophas to see the arrival of ransomed slaves at the Monastery of Mercy. Each captive had his own fears and hopes to realize, and Asmodeus recounted the past and future of scores of these wretches. A few met with happy circumstances upon gaining their freedom, but most of them found grief, loneliness, and disappointment for their reward.

At that point Asmodeus became aware that his master, the magician, had missed him, and he departed swiftly after making the student promise that he would never reveal to mortal ears all that he had seen and overheard that night.

Returned to his own apartment, Cleophas sank into a deep slumber that lasted a day and a night. When he awoke, he went to call on Donna Seraphina, where he was welcomed by the grateful Don Pedro, her father. During a later visit in the house where he was now an honored guest, Cleophas confessed that it was not he who had rescued the girl from the flames. Although overcome by astonishment, Don Pedro waved the explanation aside. After all, it was at Cleophas' insistence that Donna Seraphina had been brought from the blazing house unharmed. A few weeks later the wedding of Donna Seraphina and Cleophas was celebrated with much magnificence, and the happy bridegroom never had occasion to regret the night of freedom he had provided for the devil on two sticks.

The French literary scene of the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries was blessed with the corrective vigorous activity of two writers endowed with unsurpassed wit and common sense—Molière and Boileau. It was an age that desperately needed the scourge of satire. Life and letters were thoroughly corrupt, the topmost level of society rode like a gaudy, grinning monkey on the back of the miserable, millipedic populace, and the amusements of the idle betrayed clearly their innocent or deliberate unawareness of reality and the bizarre lengths to which they were willing to go in their futile attempt to conquer an enormous boredom.

One of their most fantastic solitary diversions was the writing and reading of romantic novels that often ran to a dozen or more volumes. Beginning with Honoré d'Urfé's Astree (1607-1627), this papier maché fantasy went through a tortuous evolution in de Gomberville's La Carithee (1621) and Polexandre (1629-1637), Jean Desmarets' Ariane (1623), La Calprenède's Cassandre (1642-1650), Cléopâtre (1647-1658), and Faramond (1661-1670), and, finally, reached an apogee in the four romances of Mademoiselle Madeleine de Scudéry, darling of the famous Hôtel de Rambouillet salon before establishing her own popular Saturday nights. These novels probably constitute the most valueless literature of all time. Mlle de Scudéry insisted that the language of her characters (like that of the dramatists Racine and Corneille) reproduce exactly the language of society, a carefully cultivated, artificial speech striving for novelty and preciousness and inevitably tumbling into absurdity. It is precisely this affectation that Molière made such hilarious fun of in his farce, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659), but apparently the institution was so well established and so satisfying to its practitioners that not even the blows of the great Molière could strike it down. Boileau soon joined his friend in the attack, composing in 1664 his Dialogue des héros de roman, which he enjoyed reciting with great zest and elaborate mimicry to his friends. However, as he says in the preface to his first published version, he was unwilling to publish or even to circulate his satire in manuscript while Mlle de Scudéry was still alive, "since she was after all a woman of considerable merit and honor even if her writing did not reflect those attributes." Even after her death, the satire would probably not have appeared in print with Boileau's blessing had not a pirated version been published anonymously in Prussia in 1687. Boileau's devoted young friend Brossette, who discovered and reported the piracy to him in 1704, urged him to add this to the nine satires which had already contributed to his fame. Although Madame de Lafayette had established a basis for a change to the modern novel of sentiment with La Princesse de Cleves in 1678, there was still a large target of fantasy romance for Boileau's Dialogue, since romantic literary faddism had spread not only across France but in England as well. Addison recommended Faramond and Cassandre to the readers of the Spectator Papers, multi-volume translations found a fascinated public, imitations (such as Aphra Behn's The Young King) rolled off the presses, and stage adaptations like Dryden's Almanzor and Alma hude (1670-1672) hastened the vogue of neo-classic tragedy.

It is impossible to present in a short space any satisfactory vision of the enormous tedium of the seventeenth-century French romances. Even Desmaret's Ariane, remarkable for its unusual brevity, runs to well over a thousand pages. Shepherds, guided by gods and goddesses, make fleshless love in stilted prose and verse, characters from Greek, Roman, and Celtic tradition roam across fairy wonderlands in pursuit of or in escape from monsters or powerful enemies in disguise. Elaborate allegorical dreams, involuted love letters, intensely polite conversations, portraits in enameled prose, and grandiose heraldry and tournaments pad out complex, disorganized plot lines that make Italian opera classically simple by comparison. Boileau declared himself unable to stomach "their precious affectation of language, frivolous and pointless conversations, flattering portraits at every turn, of obviously mediocre persons, endless verbiage about love leading nowhere." But the leading practitioner of that romantic nonsense, Mlle de Scudéry, gained an astonishing international fame—gifts from the Queen of Sweden, membership in the Italian academy, homage from English writers, as well as pensions from Cardinal Mazarin and the King of France.

Witty and polished conversation in writing as well as in society was a favorite seventeenth-century art, witness Mlle de Scudéry's own ten volumes of model Conversations. For this reason Boileau, like many another critic of his day, adopted the dialogue. "I have taken as a point of departure in this attack on the novel the manner of Lucian" (the greatest of the second-century Sophists, who also used humor and buffoonery to attack manners and ideas of his time). Although Boileau says that this is "the least frivolous work to issue from my pen," the Dialogue is hilarious good fun. Like Lucian, he sets his scene in Hades. Minos comes running frantically to Pluto with a report that hell has suddenly become populated with idiots afflicted with a "fury to talk a certain language they call gallantry."

"One even assured me that this pestilent gallantry had infected all the infernal countries and even the Elysian fields so that the heroes and above all, the heroines who live there today are the most foolish people in the world, thanks to certain authors who have taught them that fine language and have made them bashful lovers."

As Pluto resolves to examine these strange people, Rhadamanthus arrives with the news that the fiercest criminals in Hades—Prometheus, Tantalus, Ixion, and Sisyphus—have revolted. While preparations are being made for war, Diogenes arrives to contribute his walking stick to the arsenal. He warns Pluto not to expect much help from the newly arrived heroes. "They are a troop of mad men. I've never seen anything so effeminate and gallant!" But Pluto, eager for heroic aid, summons them. He is delighted when the first hero turns out to be the great Cyrus, the Persian warrior-king who had conquered the Medes and ravaged more than half the world. But his delight quickly turns to dismay when he learns that Cyrus has adopted the [Scudérian] name of Artimim and is engaged in an eternal quest to find his kidnapped princess, though he fears that even if he finds her she will not return to him because he is so unworthy "Chase away this rain bucket, this great sobber!" cries Pluto as he turns to welcome Tamyris, savage queen of the Massagetes who had plunged the great Cyrus' head into a bucket of human blood Tamyris, however, is now distraught because she has lost the madrigal which she had composed to woo Cyrus Next comes Horatius Cocles, the Roman warrior who alone had held off an entire army at the bridge He is now a shepherd troubadour singing a song he had made from an echo for Clelie "The nut! the nut!" cries Pluto, dismissing him, "to amuse himself with such trifles he must have entirely lost his senses!"

The mad parade continues Clelie, once the audacious hero of Titus Livius, is now completely absorbed with the map of Tendre Land, tracing the path from Constant Love along Inclination River, through Billet Doux and Sincerity to New Amity Lucretia, who once killed to defend her chastity, now babbles of love, and Brutus, savior of Rome against the Tarquins, also prattles of love Diogenes tries unsuccessfully to explain to Pluto

"Lucretia who is in love with and loved by Brutus says to him in transposed words 'How sweet it would be to love if one loved always! But alas, there are no eternal loves' And Brutus answers 'Permit me to love, marvel of our days You will see that one can have eternal loves'"

To which Pluto shouts, "By these bagatelles I recognize that they're possessed with infinite folly Chase them away!" Then Mlle de Scudery herself arrives in the person of Sapho, once a famous Lesbian, now a poser of elaborate parlor game questions on friendship "Define for me what a tender heart is, what tenderness in friendship, tenderness in love, tenderness of inclination, and tenderness of passion" As indignant Pluto is about to send for the Fury Tisiphone, the "impertinent wench" subjects him to a ridiculous, flattering character sketch of that deadly harriidan

At last, after several more of these impossible heroes of the novel have passed in review, Mercury (one of the most frequently invoked gods of the romance) arrives to denounce them all as fakers He has brought with him a Frenchman who identifies them as the common bourgeoisie of his quarter Pluto wrathfully summons all the demons and furies of hell to skin alive these chimerical heroes "The last act of the comedy is over!" he cries as the heroes call in vain upon the authors who created them

Thus Boileau, whose epitaph rightly names him the "not unequal rival of Horace," redeemed the reputation of the French mind for common sense, clarity, and wit from one of the greatest threats in France's literary history

The Platonic Dialogues rank with the extant works of Aristotle as the most important collection of philosophical works so far produced in the Western world. Although Plato's influence is partly due to the fact that his works have survived, unlike many writings of earlier Greek philosophers, and also to the fact that at various times in the history of the Christian church his ideas have been utilized in one form or another in the process of constructing a Christian theology—although Aristotle's influence in this respect has been greater—the principal cause of his past and present effect on human thought is the quality of his work.

The distinctive character of Platonic thought finds adequate expression in the dialogue form. Although Plato, like all philosophers, had his favored perspectives from which he interpreted and, consequently, saw the world, he realized better than most philosophers that philosophy is more an activity of the mind than the product of an investigation. This is not to say that philosophy does not, in some legitimate sense, illuminate the world; it means that in the process of making sense out of experience the philosopher is restless: no one way of clarifying an idea or a view is entirely satisfactory, and there is always much to be said for some alternative mode of explanation. When distinctive Platonic conceptions finally become clear, they do so against a background of penetrating discussion by means of which alternative ideas are explored for their own values and made to complement the conception which Plato finally endorses. As an instrument for presenting the critical point counterpoint of ideas, the dialogue is ideal, and as a character in control of the general course and quality of the discussion, Socrates is unsurpassed.

Socrates was Plato's teacher, and it was probably out of respect for Socrates the man and philosopher that Plato first considered using him as the central disputant in his dialogues. Reflection must have enforced his decision, for Socrates was important more for his method than for his fixed ideas, more for his value as a philosophical irritant than as a source of enduring wisdom. The Socratic method is often described as a question-answer method designed to bring out the contradictions and omissions in the philosophical views of others, but it is better understood as a clever technique for so playing upon the ambiguities of claims as to lead others into changing their use of terms and, hence, into apparent inconsistency.

The question concerning the extent to which Plato uses the dialogues to record the ideas of Socrates and the extent to which he uses Socrates as a proponent of his own ideas will probably never be conclusively answered. The question is, of course, historical, philosophically speaking, it makes no difference whose ideas find their way into the dialogues. A fairly safe assumption is that Socrates emphasized the importance of philosophical problems of value, knowledge, and philosophy itself. He probably did argue that it is important to know oneself, that the admission of one's own ignorance is a kind of wisdom possessed by few men, and that virtue is knowledge.

Certainly Socrates must have had a devotion to his calling as philosopher and critic: no man who regarded philosophy as a game would have remained in Athens to face the charge that by philosophy he had corrupted the youth of Athens, nor would he have refused a chance to escape after having been condemned to death. The courage and integrity of Socrates are recorded with poignant power in the

Apology the dialogue in which Socrates defends himself and philosophy against the charges brought against him, the Crito, in which Socrates refuses to escape from prison and the Phaedo, in which Socrates discusses the immortality of the soul before he drinks the hemlock poison and dies

Of the ideas presented in the dialogues, perhaps none is more important than Plato's theory of Ideas or Forms. This idea is most clearly expressed in the Republic (q v), the dialogue in which the problem of discovering the nature of justice in man is resolved by considering the nature of justice in the state. Plato distinguished between particular things, the objects we experience in our daily living, and the characters that things have or could have. Goodness, truth, beauty, and other universal characters—properties that can affect a number of individual objects—are eternal, changeless, beautiful, and the source of all knowledge. Although some critics have claimed that Plato was speaking metaphorically when he talked, through Socrates, about the reality of the Forms, speaking as if they enjoyed a separate existence, the dialogues leave the impression that Plato considered the Forms (Ideas) to be actually existing, in some sense peculiar to themselves, as universals or prototypes which things may or may not exemplify.

If one reviews, however inadequately, the range of questions and tentative answers to be found in the dialogues, a bare inkling of Plato's power as a philosopher is then realized. But the dialogues must be read before the depth of Plato's speculative mind and the skill of his dialectic can be appreciated. Furthermore, only a reading of the dialogues can convey Plato's charm, wit, and range of sympathy. Whether the final result may be in good part attributed to Socrates as Plato's inspiring teacher is not important. Socrates as the subject and Plato as the writer (and philosopher—in all probability more creative than Socrates) combine to leave us with an unforgettable image of the Hellenistic mind.

Although many of the dialogues concern themselves with more than one question, and although definitive answers are infrequent so that discussions centering about a certain subject may crop up in a number of different dialogues, it may be helpful to indicate the central problems and conclusions of the dialogues.

Charmides centers about the question, "What is temperance?" After criticizing a number of answers, and without finally answering the question, Socrates emphasizes the point that temperance involves knowledge. Lysis and Laches consider, respectively, the questions, "What is friendship?" and "What is courage?" The former discussion brings out the difficulty of the question and of resolving conflicts of values; the latter distinguishes courage from a mere facing of danger and makes the point that courage, as one of the virtues, is a kind of knowledge involving willingness to act for the good. The Ion exhibits Socratic irony at work on a rhapsode who is proud of his skill in the recitation of poetry. Socrates argues that poetry is the result of inspiration, a kind of divine madness. In the Protagoras Socrates identifies virtue and knowledge, insisting that no one chooses evil except through ignorance. One of a number of attacks of the Sophistical art of fighting with words is contained in the Euthydemus.

In the Meno the philosopher Socrates and his companions wonder whether virtue can be taught. The doctrine that ideas are implanted in the soul before birth is demonstrated by leading a slave boy into making the correct answers to some problems in geometry. At first it seems that since virtue is a good and goodness is knowledge, virtue can be taught. But since there are no teachers of virtue, it cannot be taught, and, in any case, since virtue involves right opinion, it is not teachable.

"What is piety?" is the question of the

Euthyphro Euthyphro's idea that piety is whatever is pleasing to the gods is shown to be inadequate

The Apology is the most effective portrait of Socrates in a practical situation. No moment in his life had graver consequences than the trial resulting from the charge that he had corrupted the youth of Athens by his teachings, yet Socrates continued to be himself, to argue dialectically, and to reaffirm his love of wisdom and virtue. He pictured himself as a gadfly, stinging the Athenians out of their intellectual arrogance. He argued that he would not corrupt anyone voluntarily, for to corrupt those about him would be to create evil that might harm him.

Socrates is shown as a respecter of the law in the Crito, he refuses to escape after having been pronounced guilty. In the Phaedo he argues that the philosopher seeks death because his whole aim in life is to separate the soul from the body. He argues for the immortality of the soul by saying that opposites are generated from opposites, therefore, life is generated from death. Also, the soul is by its very nature the principle of life, hence, it cannot itself die.

The dialogue Greater Hippias does not settle the question, "What is beauty?" but it does show, as Socrates points out, that "All that is beautiful is difficult."

The subject of love is considered from various philosophic perspectives in the Symposium, culminating in the conception of the highest love as the love of the good, the beautiful, and the true.

Gorgias begins with a discussion of the art of rhetoric, and proceeds to the development of the familiar Socratic ideas that it is better to suffer evil than to do it, and it is better to be punished for evil doing than to escape punishment.

The Parmenides is a fascinating technical argument concerning various logical puzzles about the one and the many. It contains some criticism of Plato's theory of Ideas. Plato's increasing interest in problems of philosophic method is shown by the Cratylus, which contains a discussion of language beginning with the question whether there are true and false names. Socrates is not dogmatic about the implications of using names, but he does insist that any theory of language allow men to continue to speak of their knowledge of realities.

The Phaedrus is another discourse on love. It contains the famous myth of the soul conceived as a charioteer and winged steeds. In the Theaetetus Socrates examines the proposal by Theaetetus that knowledge is sense perception. He rejects this idea as well as the notion that knowledge is true opinion.

The Sophist is a careful study of sophistical method with emphasis on the problem of Being and Not being. In the Statesman Plato continues the study of the state he initiated in the Republic, introducing the idea—later stressed by Aristotle—that virtue is a mean.

Socrates argues in the Philebus that neither pleasure nor wisdom is in itself the highest good, since pleasure that is not known is worthless and wisdom that is not pleasant is not worth having, only a combination is wholly satisfactory.

A rare excursion into physics and a philosophical consideration of the nature of the universe are found in the Timaeus. Here Plato writes of God, creation, the elements, the soul, gravitation, and many other matters.

The Critias, an unfinished dialogue, presents the story of an ancient and mythical war between Athens and Atlantis, and with the Laws, the longest of the dialogues, Plato ranges over most of the areas touched on in his other dialogues, but with an added religious content. Soul is the source of life, motion, and moral action, and there is an evil soul in the universe with which God must deal.

An intimate of people in high places, John Evelyn was able to observe at first hand many of the significant events and developments of his time. To his observation, he brought a mind remarkable in a turbulent era for its calmness, balance, and acuity. His diary is a contribution of exceptional value to our understanding of seventeenth-century England.

Evelyn, the son of a large landowner, was a royalist and an Anglican. He served briefly in the army of Charles I, but, after the king's retreat in 1641, he resigned, believing that further service would mean financial ruin for himself and would little aid the royalist cause. Finding it difficult to maintain a neutral position, he left England in 1643 for the Continent, where he spent most of the next nine years traveling and studying European culture. After his return to England in 1652, he occupied himself with gardening and with improving his estate. He refused a position under Cromwell and maintained secret correspondence with Charles II. From the Restoration until his death in 1706, he enjoyed the favor of the crown and held several important minor positions in the government.

Evelyn lived in an era of unrest and calamity. Three times he saw the existing English government overthrown; he observed the Dutch war from the vantage point of an official position; he remained in London during the plague of 1665, he watched the progress of the Great Fire from its start to its engulfment of the city; he noted with disapproval the licentiousness of the court of Charles II; he attended the spectacular trials of the men accused of complicity in the Popish Plot. In religion, he witnessed the shifting fortunes of the various sects; in politics, he saw the rise and the fall of a multitude of favorites.

The diary, in addition to providing an inside view of these major events, reveals the ordinary conditions of existence in the seventeenth century. Life was filled with hazards. On voyages, pirates were frequently a threat; Evelyn himself barely escaping them on one occasion. For travel on the Continent, an armed escort was often necessary for protection against highwaymen. Within a brief period, Evelyn was robbed three times, and once in England, he was robbed and bound, and narrowly missed being killed. Also in the seventeenth century, many barbarous practices were still sanctioned by law. Evelyn tells of beheadings that required several blows of the ax, of men put on the rack to elicit confessions, of the public display of bodies that had been hanged, then drawn, and quartered. The plague, smallpox, and other diseases constantly reminded men of their mortality. Evelyn made frequent references in his diary to death among his friends and his children, seven of whom never reached adulthood.

Amid the public tumult and private insecurity, Evelyn was throughout a truly civilized man. While many were dominated by the emotions that religious and political controversy aroused, he retained his sanity. Of a compassionate nature, he deplored acts of cruelty, and expressed his opposition to many accepted practices, such as the harsh treatment of criminals and the baiting of animals. During the Dutch war he served as commissioner for the care of the sick, wounded, and prisoners of war. He was not deterred from his duties by the plague or by the frustrating difficulties involved in securing funds.

At a time when apostasy was common place, Evelyn remained firm in his religious and political convictions. His life was guided first, by his belief in the Church of England and, secondly, by his belief in the monarchy. A large part of the diary is concerned with church affairs, ranging from discussions of major issues to records of fasting days. A devoutly religious man, he based his conduct upon his conception of the Christian ideal, and accepted blessings and misfortunes alike as the will of God. Although he feared rival sects—the Jesuits, in particular—and believed that certain laws were necessary to protect the Church of England, he was a generally tolerant man and opposed punitive laws against Catholics and Nonconformists.

As a monarchist, he felt that the execution of Charles I was the blackest spot on English history. He regarded the Restoration as the greatest blessing God could bestow, and he continued to celebrate its anniversary even after King James II was deposed in 1688. Initially, he had misgivings about the Glorious Revolution, but, probably because of its preservation of the Church of England, he came to approve of it.

However unwavering he may have been in his royalist sympathies, he was no absolutist, nor did he hesitate to criticize the actions of royalty. When the king overstepped his traditional authority—as Charles II did, for example, in revoking the charter of London, and as James II did in dispensing with the Test Act—Evelyn was firm in his objections. He frequently protested against the profligacy of the court, and once, after having observed some disabled soldiers, he wrote "What confusion and mischief do the avance, anger, and ambition of Princes, cause in the world!"

Evelyn apparently could have aspired to higher positions than he attained, but he enjoyed his "private condition" and cared not for "the extreme slavery and subjection that courtiers live in." There was in him none of the sycophant. Generally he avoided offices that might beget a clash between his personal interests and his principles. In one position which did create such a conflict, he followed his principles. As a commissioner of the Privy Seal, he twice refused, against the wishes of James II, to license the illegal sale of Catholic literature.

His independent nature can also be seen in his loyalty to friends. When Samuel Pepys was placed in the Tower on suspicion of treason, Evelyn immediately went to see him. He was the last person to visit Clarendon before that deposed official fled England to escape the wrath of Parliament and king. Many others found in Evelyn a friend who was unmoved by the tergiversations of courtly favor.

Despite the heavy demands of private business and public service, Evelyn found time to acquire a vast amount of knowledge. His range of interests was prodigious, with the novel as well as the important attracting his attention. Amid more weighty topics, such subjects as fire eating and knife swallowing are soberly discussed in the diary. Much of his intellectual curiosity, however, was directed toward practical matters. His concern with the depletion of forests in England led him to write Sylva (1664), a highly significant book on afforestation. His knowledge of gardening was considerable, and his gardens at Sayes Court attracted thousands of visitors. The smoke nuisance in London was attacked by Evelyn as early as 1661. After the Great Fire he drew up plans for rebuilding the city. His publications include works on government, education, English customs, horticulture, science, chalcography, and architecture.

Evelyn was also active in promoting the work of others. He was closely associated with England's creative leaders, men such as Robert Boyle and Christopher Wren. A patron of the arts, he introduced Grinling Gibbons to the notice of Charles II, and he persuaded the Duke of Norfolk to present the Arundel marbles to Oxford University. His most productive efforts of this kind were those connected with the Royal Society, of which he was an original promoter and, for many years, an active member.

Unlike the other great diarist of the seventeenth century, Samuel Pepys, Evelyn had little talent for bringing warm, personal touches to his writing. In reading the objective, factual presentation of the earlier part of the diary—with its absence of feeling and with little, even, of personal opinion—one wishes that more of John Evelyn were in the work. In the later part of the diary there is greater freedom of expression. Never, however, is Evelyn able truly to share his emotional experiences with the reader. He was a man of reason, and his writing is formal, dignified, and cerebral.

The Diary of Samuel Pepys is a unique document in the annals of English literature—perhaps of all literature. There are other fascinating day to day accounts of interesting and momentous times, and some of these were written by men of genius, but there is only one other autobiographical collection—the recently discovered journals of James Boswell—which combines fascinating subject matter and genius of composition with the intriguing detective story discovery that is associated with the Diary of Pepys.

The author of the greatest of all biographies must bow to this lesser Samuel in one respect. Boswell, as his editors admit, was writing for posterity; Pepys was not. Pepys' Diary was written for himself only, apparently for the sole purpose of allowing its author to savor once more, at the end of each day, the experiences of the preceding twenty-four hours. There is no evidence of revision of any kind, and it was written in a shorthand which protected it from posterity for over a hundred years after its author's failing eyesight had forced him reluctantly to give it up

Pepys' method of composition gives the Diary an immediacy that makes Boswell's Journals appear sedulously organized. And the protective coloration of the shorthand allows for admissions of personal animosities and revelations of scandalous behavior that otherwise would not be found in the confessions of a responsible public official. Also, the point that Pepys was a responsible public official is the last factor that contributes to the importance of his work. Boswell was the scion of an important Scottish family and a member of the Scottish bar, but (aside from his Corsican experience) the only history he was involved in was literary history. Pepys was involved with the history of a nation at a very important time.

The Diary is important in a number of ways. First, it is of great value as a document of the Restoration period. No writer of a historical novel based on the history of the time could possibly create a character familiar with as many important events as was that opportunistic busy body, Samuel Pepys. One of the most influential figures in bringing about the return of the Stuarts in 1660 was the former Cromwellian, Sir Edward Montague, who was assisted by his able cousin and protégé, Samuel Pepys. It was Sir Edward who commanded the fleet that sailed from Holland and returned triumphantly with the king. On board the flagship, kissing the king's hand, firing a cannon to salute the new monarch (and burning an eye in the process), commenting on the plainness of the queen, taking charge of the king's dog in the landing at Dover was again, Samuel Pepys. Later, made Clerk of the Acts of the Navy Board because of his assistance to the Stuarts (Sir Edward Montague was made Earl of Sandwich), he remained at his post in London and wrote down his observations of the terrible plague from which most members of his class fled in panic. It was Pepys, again, who did his best to keep the English Navy afloat during the Dutch Wars, and Pepys who defended the Navy in a brilliant speech before Parliament in the investigation that followed (1668). Earlier (September 2, 1666), when the great fire of London broke out, it was Pepys who rushed to the king to inform him of the catastrophe and to suggest the blowing up of houses to prevent the spread of the fire. Pepys, who had a part in all these events, tells of them in a straightforward, unself-conscious account unvarnished by fear of what his contemporaries would have thought or of what posterity would think.

Along with vivid pictures of the major events of Restoration history are day to day accounts of the less earthshaking but equally revealing activities in the life of the London that Pepys shared, accounts that make the Diary a document of social, cultural, and artistic history as well. Here Pepys' concern with—his actual delight in—detail brings a particular world of the past to life. We see the crowded, unsanitary, and often impassable London streets. At times, during trips to Pepys' father's house in Brampton or during excursions to the country, we catch glimpses of rural existence in the days of Charles II. We see life in the houses of the well to do and the noble and, occasionally, at court. On a more mundane scale, there is Pepys' concern with clothes (his father was a tailor and he reflects a professional knowledge) and his greater concern with managing his own household. Unfortunately for revelations on this score, Pepys had no children, but his problems in household management included his handling of the affairs of his rather shiftless parents, brothers, and sister, the maintenance of a staff of servants that grew as his own wealth increased, and domestic supervision of his beautiful but erratic—sometimes docile, sometimes temperamental—young wife. In regard to the arts, there is a wealth of material on the theater and on music. Pepys was an inveterate playgoer. Though his frequent attendance bothered his basically Puritan conscience and though he made intermittent vows to refrain, it is seldom that many entries go by in which some play that he has seen is not commented on. So frequent are these comments, in fact, that the Diary is an invaluable source of information to the student of Restoration drama. It is equally valuable to the specialist in the history of music. Pepys was not only an accomplished musician but also a composer, and the delight in music which he expresses gives an insight into a particularly musical age.

Nor was artistic beauty the only kind that captivated the practical and mercenary Pepys. Since he was equally attracted to beauty in its carnal manifestations, his pursuit of beauty in feminine form and his diligent (but finally unsuccessful) attempts to hide these pursuits from his wife provide an insight into the mores of the Restoration period. These accounts of the diarist's philanderings—honest, but hidden by the elaborate code—are a part of the personal revelation that the work provides.

In spite of its importance as historical and social document, the Diary is, on its most intriguing level, the portrait of a man, a self-portrait drawn in strong and certain lines with no detail, however uncomplimentary, however compromising omitted. That it is the portrait of a man active in the affairs of his day adds to its interest, but the main value comes from its unstinting wealth of circumstantial detail. Yet the detail and the man cannot be separated: the love of detail and the love of life that inspired the keeper of the Diary make up the essence of the man himself. The Diary is a celebration of the things of this world and a portrait of the man who praised them.

THE DIVAN

Author: Hāfiz (Shams ud dīn Mohammed, c. 1320 c. 1388)

First transcribed: c. 1350

The Divan of Hafiz is one of the glories of Persian literature in its Golden Age and a classic of Eastern literature. Hafiz was the pen name of Shams ud dīn Mohammed, a Persian who early in life turned to the serious study of philosophy, poetry, and theology. The pen name he adopted means "a man who remembers," a title normally bestowed upon persons who have committed the Koran to memory. In Hafiz' case the title was not unwarranted, for he was a dervish who taught the Koran in an academy founded by his patron, the Vizier Haji Kiwām ud dīn.

The Divan is the best known of Hāfiz' works. In addition, he wrote in various other patterns common to Persian poetry. The Divan itself is a collection of short poems, lyric in quality, in the form known as ghazals. In the original Persian these poems consist of from five to sixteen couplets (called bays), and the particular poetical form has been compared to the ode and the sonnet in English language poetry because of the lyric qualities, the length, and the subject matter. One curious feature of Hāfiz' ghazals is that the last two lines normally contain the poet's name. The first line of each ghazal introduces the rhyme, which is repeated in every other succeeding line within the poem.

Although relatively little known in the Western world, Hāfiz' Divan has remained the most popular poetry ever written in his native land. It has even been considered oracular, and Persians sometimes consult it by opening the book and placing a finger on a chance passage, hoping to have an answer thereby to whatever question has arisen. Such a procedure, or a variation of it, was supposedly done at the death of the poet. Because of exception taken to some of his poems, his corpse was at first denied the usual burial rites. To settle the question, some of his ghazals were written on slips of paper and placed in an urn, one to be drawn out by a child. According to legend, the verse drawn by chance from the urn said that Hāfiz should be given appropriate funeral rites, as he would enter Paradise, thus the question was settled.

Through the centuries there has been debate over whether his poetry should be taken literally or symbolically, with those who want to see in the Divan a serious work by a great Persian philosopher and student of the Koran taking one side of the question, those who wish to see in the work a fine expression of a warmly alive human being taking the other. Western readers who cannot see anything religious in these superficially hedonistic poems should call to mind the religious expression, veiled in imagery though it is, of such poetry as that of John Donne and Richard Crashaw in England and Edward Taylor in America.

Whether one may wish to take it literally or on a symbolic level, the imagery of Hāfiz' poetry is warm, human, even passionate. There is no escaping, even in translation, the sincerity of the poet. Like most Eastern poetry, the imagery may even seem lush to Western readers, as in the following example:

The east wind at the dawn of day brought a perfume from the tresses of my beloved, which immediately cast my foolish heart into fresh agitation.

I imagined that I had uprooted that flower from the garden of my heart for every blossom which sprang up from its suffering bore only the fruits of pain.

From fear of the attacks of her love, I set my heart free with bloody strife my heart dropped gout of blood which marked my footsteps.

I beheld from her terrace how the glory of the moon veiled itself in confusion, before the face of that dazzling sun.

In his poems Hāfiz praises love between man and woman, and he praises also the beauty of women, their eyes, their lips, their hair, their features, their forms. He also sings of wine and men, as in these lines:

O Cupbearer! bring the joy of youth,
bring cup after cup of red wine.
Bring medicine for the disease of love, bring wine, which is the balm of old and young.

Do not grieve for the revolution of time, that it wheeled thus and not thus. Touch the lute in peace.

Wisdom is very wearisome, bring for its neck the noose of wine.

When the rose goes, say, "Go gladly," and drink wine, red like the rose.

If the moan of the turtle does no remain, what matter? Bring music in the jug of wine.

Whether one can interpret this praise of wine as symbolic of spiritual substance is open to question. That there is passion, grace, and charm in the lines is, however, undeniable. The same is true of the following, also typical of Hāfiz:

O interpreter of dreams! give good tidings because last night the sun seemed to be my ally in the joy of the morning sleep.

At the hour when Hāfiz was writing this troubled verse, the bird of his heart had fallen into the snare of love.

An interesting legend about one of Hāfiz' poems in the Divan has come down through the ages. In the poem he offered willingly to exchange both the rich cities of Bokhara and Samarkand for the mole on the cheek of his beloved. When the great conqueror Tamerlane learned of the poem and had an opportunity, he sent for the poet and rebuked him, saying that Hāfiz should not have offered to give away what did not lay in his power to bestow. Not entirely subdued, even in the presence of the great Tamerlane,

Hafiz is supposed to have replied that it was through such generosity that he came to the attention of the mighty conqueror. Over and over again in the Divan another city is mentioned, his own native city of Shiraz, which he loved greatly ("Hail, Shiraz! incomparable site! O Lord, preserve it from every disaster!") From the fame of Hafiz and his poems, Shiraz came to be a symbol of poetic inspiration among poets who followed him.

The reader of the Divan will find himself making comparisons between Hafiz' lyrics and those of Omar Khayyám, an earlier Persian poet and one whose work is more widely known among English speaking readers through the adaptation by Edward FitzGerald. The works of the two poets have much in common. The apparent hedonism, the similar imagery, and the same flowing mellifluousness are found in the work of both men. The obvious difference is the superficial one of form, Omar Khayyám having written in quatrains, as the word "Rubáiyat" indicates, Hafiz in the form of the ghazal. But a more important difference lies in the attitudes expressed in the poems. Hafiz is the more serious of the two, despite an apparent hedonism. There is a greater inclination on the part of Hafiz to be religious, to place his faith in Allah and his wisdom, inscrutable as the poet may find it. One result is that it is easier to think of Hafiz growing old gracefully than of Omar Khayyam facing inevitable old age with equanimity.

DIVINE LOVE AND WISDOM

Type of work Theosophical treatise

Author Emanuel Swedenborg (1688-1772)

First published 1763

During the earlier part of his life Emanuel Swedenborg established for himself a lasting reputation as a man of science, doing research in many scientific fields, including physics, astronomy, mathematics, engineering, and human anatomy. His research in several of these fields culminated in important publications which showed him well in advance of his time. His work in anatomy, for example, anticipated some of the theories of modern physiology, including those involving the functions of the ductless glands.

With respect to his later writings in religion and theosophy Swedenborg's reputation is a mixed one. Between 1743 and 1745 he suffered a mental and religious crisis which changed his life and his work. During the crisis, according to his own report, he underwent mystical experiences during which he was given access to the spiritual world, enjoying visions of that world, hearing and taking part in celestial conversations, and receiving divine instruction. In 1745, during a third great spiritual experience, reported Swedenborg, he witnessed the second advent of Christ and was instructed to establish a "New Church." From his visions and the instructions he purportedly received grew Swedenborg's theosophical writings, written in Latin. Although he wrote voluminously on his doctrines, Swedenborg did not himself found a sect, for he believed that members of any church could follow his doctrines. Later his followers did constitute the Church of the New Jerusalem, or New Church.

Like all theosophical writings, those of Swedenborg depend for their importance on how seriously one is willing to take the author's reports of divine inspiration and revelation. If acceptance is granted by the reader, then the writings assume tremendous, even cosmic, significance, for Swedenborg did not attempt to disguise or conceal the supernatural source of his doctrines. He stated as actual fact that his doctrines were the results of visions.

granted to him by God, and he calmly and routinely noted certain facts and points either overheard in conversations among the angels or witnessed during the times he was transported spiritually to heaven. He regarded his mission seriously, sincerely believing that he had been commanded to interpret the spiritual world and explicate the Bible's true spiritual intent to mankind.

Swedenborg's most important theosophical work is the Divine Love and Wisdom, in which he stated his system most comprehensively and succinctly. The premises of his doctrine are that God is Man (or God Man) and that God is Love. He reported that the conception of God as Man is held in all the heavens, the reason he vouchsafed being that heaven as a whole and in every part resembles the human form, and the Divine itself, together with the angels (who are also human in form) constitutes heaven. Swedenborg added that all angels and other heavenly spirits are men in perfect form. The essence or being of God, according to Swedenborgian doctrine, is love, an infinite love which mankind knows only as existing and not through an acquaintance with its nature, inasmuch as mankind is, without God, held to the natural world.

For Swedenborg, the manifestation of God and His infinite love is a sun, in the spiritual world a living sun. That spiritual sun corresponds in heaven to the "dead" sun of the natural world, and is the source of spiritual life. The sun of the natural world, according to Swedenborg, is the source of life in nature, which is but a receptacle of life, not a source. Just as the spiritual sun and the natural sun are distinct but analogous in part and whole, so are heaven and earth distinct but analogous. Swedenborg warned, however, that space and time are concepts only of the natural world and are not to be found in the structure of the infinite and perfect realm of heaven. In heaven, according to the cosmology expounded in Divine Love and Wisdom, are three uncreated, distinct, and eternal degrees, corresponding to which in the natural world there are three finite degrees. Swedenborg did not describe in Divine Love and Wisdom how these degrees exist, but only stated that they are love, wisdom, and use, or to put it another way, end, cause, and effect. The three degrees exist, said Swedenborg, in every man at birth, although as a creature of the natural world the human being is unaware of them. As the degrees are opened successively to the individual, so is God in man and man in God, according to the doctrine. Light from the spiritual sun flows into man as he shuns evil, meaning that he can gain in wisdom, but the "heat" of the spiritual sun, or love, man cannot receive. The natural mind of the lowest degree, said Swedenborg, is a hell in itself, while the mind which is spiritualized becomes a heaven. In other words, by love and the opening of each of the successive degrees man can rise toward God. According to Divine Love and Wisdom, the end of creation, both spiritual and natural, is to become perfectly the image of God Man.

Swedenborg undertook to answer the question of creation that has bothered countless numbers of theologically minded persons in every generation. Did God create the universe out of nothing, or did He form a cosmos from the stuff of chaos? He wrote

Every one of enlightened judgment sees that the universe was not created out of nothing because it is impossible to make anything out of nothing, for nothing is nothing, and to suppose anything to be made out of nothing is absurd and therefore contrary to the light of truth which comes from the divine Wisdom, and whatever is inconsistent with the divine Wisdom is also inconsistent with the divine Omnipotence. Everyone of enlightened judgment also sees that all beings were created out of self-existent substance, the very BEING out of which all things that exist come forth and as God is the only self-existent Substance, and thus is essential Being it is plain that this is the source of all things that exist Many have seen this because it is consistent with reason, but they have not dared to confirm it, fearing to be led to suppose that the created universe is God, because it exists from Him or that nature is self-existent and thus that what is called God is only nature in her utmost recesses

Swedenborg suggests that there are pairs in all parts of the body in order that every man may achieve the love and wisdom of divinity He notes that the eyes, ears, nostrils, hands loins and feet exist in pairs, that the heart, brain, and lungs are divided into two parts The right hand parts, according to his views have a relation to love and the left hand parts a relation to wisdom

The doctrine propounded in Divine Love and Wisdom grants to all human beings the means of achieving the spiritual heaven, for in the Swedenborgian view it is a false doctrine that the Lord admits or excludes members of the human race arbitrarily from salvation

This drama, ordinarily considered one of Molière's less important works, nevertheless demonstrates his ability to ridicule the fads of his day, in this case the vogue, not wholly extinct three centuries later, of showing obsequious deference to men of science no matter what their real qualifications may be Exposing the fact that ignorance often hides behind a smattering of superficial learning, he levels his barbs against the doctors of his time The comedy was an immediate success and has always been popular Sixty five years after its first presentation, Henry Fielding, English novelist and dramatist, adapted the basic plot in a play presented at the Drury Lane Theatre under the title of The Mock Doctor, or, the Dumb Lady Cur'd

Sganarelle, a faggot gatherer, was driven to extremes because Martine, his nagging wife, accused him of always being drunk instead of working, and finally he took a stick and beat her soundly When their neighbor M Robert sought to interfere, Martine boxed his ears and declared she liked to have her husband beat her But as Sganarelle went off to the woods after promising to bring back a hundred faggots that day, Martine itched for wifely revenge

Géronte's daughter Lucinde had feigned illness and loss of speech in order to escape marriage to a wealthy suitor her father had chosen for her she herself was in love with Léandre, who returned her love Her father had summoned many physicians to treat her, but all had failed to find a cure. At last Geronte sent his attendants Valère and Lucas, in search of a specialist.

When they encountered the offended Martine and confided in her the reason for their journey, she saw in their search an opportunity to get even with her husband. She told them that he was a marvelous curer of any illness, a doctor who pretended to be a woodcutter who dressed absurdly and pretended complete ignorance of his art, so that it might actually be necessary to thrash him violently to gain from him admission of his real talents. Her boasts of the wonderful cures he had performed so impressed her listeners that they set off in immediate search of this medical prodigy. They found Sganarelle in the wood, relaxing with his bottle, and, being rebuffed by him after their first ceremonious introduction, they thrashed him severely and finally forced him to say he was a doctor and to follow them to see Lucinde.

The attendants persuaded Geronte that Sganarelle, though he loved a joke and seemed to be off his head, was really the greatest doctor in the world. When Sganarelle was introduced to Geronte, he inquired, as he himself had been asked, if the other man were a doctor. Geronte replied that he was not, whereupon Sganarelle, following the pattern applied to him, gave him a sound thrashing. The attendants thereupon explained to the bewildered Geronte that this was merely an example of the great doctor's eccentricity, a sure sign of his greatness.

When Geronte brought in his daughter, she replied to Sganarelle's questions by signs, gestures, and grunts. From these noises Sganarelle diagnosed Lucinde as dumb, a malady caused by loss of speech because of an impediment in the action of her tongue, on which subject Aristotle said—thus and so. Using some learned sounding Latin words which meant nothing at all, he prescribed that the patient be put to bed and given plenty of bread soaked in wine, his explanation was that in this manner parrots were induced to speak.

Geronte, overwhelmed by the brilliance of Sganarelle's diagnosis and vast medical knowledge, felt absolute confidence in the ability of this eccentric to cure his daughter of her strange action. What pleased Sganarelle most was the generous fee Geronte gave him.

Léandre came to the fake physician to ask his help in carrying out a plan by which the young man hoped to see Lucinde, but Sganarelle pretended to be beyond influence in such matters, until the lover offered him a handsome fee. Léandre then told him that Lucinde's illness was put on and that its cause was not the brain, the spleen or intestines, but love. Sganarelle and the young man plotted to disguise Léandre as an apothecary's assistant so that he could speak with Lucinde. Sganarelle also confided that he was not really a doctor but had been forced to appear one in spite of himself, for a reason he did not know. Once the error had spread, however, everyone had taken him for a man of great reputation, and so he had made up his mind to stick to his new calling, for it paid very well.

As if to substantiate his story, Thibaut and his son Perrin, country fellows who had heard of Sganarelle's powers, asked him to prescribe for Thibaut's ailing wife, but Sganarelle gave no ear to their troubles until they gave him gold crowns. As a cure, he prescribed a piece of cheese, which, he said, was made of mixed gold, coral, pearls, and other precious things, and must be used as directed. He also warned them that if the patient died they should bury her as decently as possible.

Géronte reported to Sganarelle that his patient had grown worse since taking his remedy. When the nurse brought in Lucinde, Sganarelle asked his disguised assistant to feel her pulse, meanwhile keeping Géronte occupied in conversation in order to keep him from overhearing the lovers' plans. But Géronte caught a few words spoken by Lucinde and exclaimed in surprise and in praise of the doctor Lucinde approached her father and acknowledged that she had now recovered her speech, but only to tell him that she would marry no one except Leandre and that nothing would shake her resolution

Geronte stubbornly insisted that she must marry Horace, the man of his choice, that very evening. When Lucinde declared she would rather die, Sganarelle stepped in and assured the father that her actions were merely a sign of additional madness and that the apothecary was the man who could effect a cure. Summoning Léandre, and, sprinkling his instructions with Latin polysyllables to mislead the others, he urged the lover to fly with Lucinde immediately. Sganarelle engaged Geronte in conversation while Lucinde and Léandre made their escape. When their flight was reported to the irate father, he threatened Sganarelle with hanging for aiding in his daughter's elopement.

In the midst of this predicament Martine overtook her husband. On being told he was about to hang for helping his master's daughter elope, she bewailed the fact but added she would have been somewhat comforted if only he had finished chopping their wood. Sganarelle told her to leave but she said she preferred to stay and see him hanged.

At that critical moment Lucinde and Leandre returned to confront Geronte with the news that Leandre's uncle had just died and named the young man heir to a considerable fortune. Geronte, overjoyed at the turn of events which would bring him a rich son-in-law, gave the couple his blessing. Martine insisted that since Sganarelle was not to be hanged he could thank her for having achieved the honor of being a doctor but Sganarelle pointed out that this distinction had gained him innumerable thracks with a stick. He forgave the beatings, however, because of his new dignity as a doctor. But he took occasion to remind his shrewish wife that henceforth she must show greater respect for a man of his consequence, one whom the world now looked up to and honored—in spite of himself.

Critique

Doctor Pascal is the twentieth and last volume of the Rougon-Macquart series, in which Zola intended to apply the methods of the experimental sciences to the social novel. Dr. Pascal, himself a Rougon, is doing research on the problem of heredity. Using experimental methods, he has chosen his own family as his field of investigation. Thus the novel affords Zola a double opportunity to conclude the whole series with flashbacks to the former volumes, and to expose his own conception of reality through Dr. Pascal's exposition of his theories. When Dr.

Pascal remarks that his files on the family contain the materials for a fresco of life during the Second Empire, the parallel is obvious. What Dr. Pascal has meant to do on the subject of heredity, Zola intended to do on the subject of social life. As in the preceding volumes, a dominant characteristic of the book is its objectivity. Although Zola has often been accused of insensibility, Dr. Pascal seems to testify more to his great passion for truth, whether pleasant or not.

The Story

The July afternoon was extremely hot, but the room was well protected from the heat by heavy wooden shutters. In front of a huge carved oak armoire, Dr. Pascal was patiently looking for a paper. The search was not easy. For some thirty years, the doctor had been amassing manuscripts related to his work on heredity.

A smile came over his face as he found the paper and handed it to his niece, asking her to copy it over for their friend Dr. Ramond. Clotilde took it without interrupting her pastel drawing of some flowers intended to provide illustration plates for the doctor's work.

Martine, the housekeeper, came in to repair the tapestry on an armchair. She had been with the doctor for thirty years, ever since he had come to Plassans as a young doctor. Thirteen years later, Dr. Pascal's brother, following the death of his wife, had sent Clotilde, then seven years old, to live with him. Martine had cared for the child according to her own zealous religious conviction.

For his part, Dr. Pascal completed Clotilde's instruction by trying to give her clear and healthy ideas on everything. The three had lived in peaceful happiness, although a certain uneasiness was now beginning to grow out of their religious conflicts. Martine considered it a pity that such a kind man as her master refused to go to church, the two women had agreed that they would force him to attend services.

Toward the end of the afternoon old Madame Rougon came for a visit, but under a false pretext, she was actually there to inspect everything. Hearing her son in the next room, she appeared quite displeased that he was again doing what she called his "devilish cooking." She told Clotilde of the unpleasant rumors going around about the doctor's new drug. If only he could try spectacular cures on the famous people of the town, she declared, but he was always treating the poor. She had always wanted him to be a success, like his two brothers or his nephew, Clotilde's brother. But Dr. Pascal was most unlike the rest of his family. He had practiced medicine for only twelve years, then he had invested his money with a private broker and was now living on its returns. Martine was getting the money every three months and using it to the best advantage. When his patients paid him, Dr. Pascal would throw the money in a drawer, taking it only as he needed it. When he visited a poor patient he often left money there instead of receiving payment. He was completely lost in his research work, his faith in life, and his fight against suffering.

Madame Rougon was upset most by the fact that the big oak armoire contained detailed information on each member of the family. Afraid that the doctor's papers might fall in the hands of a stranger, she asked Clotilde to give her the key. She opened the cupboard, but as she was reaching for the famous files Dr. Pascal entered, she left demurely as if nothing had happened. It was Clotilde who received the explosion of the doctor's anger.

From that time on Dr. Pascal felt that he was being betrayed by the two human beings who were dearest to him, and to whom he was dearest. He kept all the drawers of his desk tightly locked.

One day Maxime came for a visit. He was still young, but worn out by a dissolute way of life. Seeing that his sister was not planning to get married, he asked her to come to Paris with him. Clotilde was frightened at the idea of leaving Dr Pascal's home, but she promised to go to her brother if some day he really needed her.

After Maxime's visit the house returned to its state of subdued tension until a Capuchin came to Plassans to preach. Clotilde, deeply shaken by his preaching, asked Dr Pascal to burn all his papers. He refused. He also had another fruitless discussion with his mother, who was constantly begging the young girl to destroy his files.

One night, after Clotilde had taken the key to the armoire, he found her trying to steal the papers. While she was helping him replace them, he made a last attempt to convince her of the value of his work. He showed her the files and explained the use he was making of them. Clotilde, almost convinced, asked for time to think about the matter.

One day the doctor returned in an upset state from a call he had made. A patient had died of a heart attack while he was giving the man an injection. After Dr Pascal had refused Clotilde's attempted comfort, his mother hinted that he might be going insane, and he nearly believed the suggestion. He felt he might be suffering from the same insanity as his grandmother, who had never been well balanced and who was still in a sanitarium at the age of one hundred and four. Anxious and helpless, Clotilde and Martine watched over him.

When Dr Ramond came to ask Clotilde to marry him, she said that she needed time to consider his proposal but that she would answer him soon. In the meantime she wanted to learn from him what he thought about her uncle's condition. Dr Pascal overheard the conversation, and from that time on his health became worse. Although he allowed Clotilde to take care of him, he would not let her come into his room when he was in bed. She finally persuaded him to try some of his own injections, as Dr Ramond had suggested. As he began to show improvement she tried to restore his faith in his research. He was overjoyed when she found the key to the armoire and brought it to him.

At last Dr Pascal declared that he felt greatly improved, and he told Clotilde that she should begin to think about a date for her marriage. Clotilde did not seem concerned. One day, as they were coming back from a walk, she asked him to help untie her hat. Suddenly, as he bent close to her, he realized how greatly he desired her. Disturbed by the strength of his feelings, he insisted that she give Dr Ramond a definite date for the wedding. A short time later he bought her an extravagant present of lace, which he put on her bed. That night Clotilde came running to his door and told him that if her marriage was the occasion for the gift, she was not going to marry Dr Ramond. He, Pascal, was the man she loved. That night she was his.

A period of extreme happiness for both followed. Martine, after disappearing for a full day to show her disapproval, continued her faithful service.

One day Martine returned with the news that the broker had embezzled the doctor's funds and fled. She performed miracles in preparing meals, using the money accumulated in the drawer, but at last their situation became really desperate. Dr Pascal and Clotilde seemed quite unconcerned, however, and waited patiently for the matter to be settled in court.

Meanwhile, Madame Rougon kept busy. She produced a letter from Maxime, now disabled, in which he asked for his sister. She shamed Dr Pascal for keeping this young girl without even marrying her and for not being able to feed her properly. Dr Pascal was happy when Clotilde refused to go to her brother. Then, feeling guilty, he tried working hard in order to keep his mind busy. Finally, pretending that he needed time to devote himself to his research, he insisted that she should go. Clotilde, deeply hurt, obeyed.

Clotilde's letters. In poor health, he suffered two heart attacks. Dr. Ramond brought him the news that some of his money had been recovered. About the same time he received a letter from Clotilde saying that she was pregnant. He immediately wired her to return. She left at once, but two hours before she arrived he died. However, he had gathered enough strength at the end to complete his files concerning himself, Clotilde, and their unborn child.

While Clotilde was in Dr. Pascal's room, Madame Rougon, with the help of Martine, burned all his papers. Later on, Clotilde used the shelves to store her baby's clothes.

Although Fromentin was primarily a painter, his writings quickly won the respect of the most distinguished of his contemporaries. In Dominique he drew from the experiences of his own youth, the powerful and permanent hold that the French countryside and the seacoast exerted upon his mind is evident throughout the book. The love theme is the old one of the moth being drawn to the flame, despite morality, orthodoxy, or common sense. The hero is also torn in a choice between the rigors of excellence and the pleasures of mediocrity. The psychology of personality is deftly explored in polished prose style.

The Story

The narrator of the book first met Dominique de Bray at Villeneuve. Dominique lived at the large Chateau des Trembles with his wife and two children. The mayor of the commune, he was shy, unpretentious, and a friend to all in the community.

On St. Hubert's Day Dominique was visited by Olivier d'Orsel, a wealthy, solitary man with captivating manners and a passion for luxury, who had suddenly retired from social life. A few days after his visit Olivier tried to commit suicide. This event led Dominique to tell the narrator about himself.

Orphaned at an early age, Dominique grew up at Villeneuve. In his youth he became a lover of the outdoors. He was cared for by Madame Ceyssac, his aunt, who provided him with a tutor named Augustin. The two differed greatly in temperament. Dominique was emotional and wild and loved nature; Augustin was well read, exact, practical, and apparently oblivious to nature. When he was not tutoring Dominique, he would remain in his room, writing plays and letters. After four years the time came for Dominique to go away to school. Augustin went to Paris with high hopes of his own success.

Ceyssac in her mansion at Ormesson. At school he befriended young Olivier d'Orsel, who also had an estate near Les Trembles. Dominique, who was a good student, helped Olivier with their school work. Too shy to admit it, Dominique fell in love with Madeleine, Olivier's cousin. At night he would spend his time writing poetry. He also kept up a correspondence with Augustin, who warned him against confusing Olivier's love of pleasure with the true goals in life.

Dominique was surprised when Madeleine married M. de Nièvres, a well-established gentleman. After the ceremony Dominique was in despair because he realized that he loved a married woman.

After graduation, Dominique and Olivier went to Paris. There they saw Augustin, who grew to like Olivier but had no esteem for him. Olivier, in turn, esteemed Augustin without liking him.

Dominique, trying to forget his love for Madeleine, buried himself in his literary work. He went to libraries and lectures, and he read through the small hours of the night in the belief that the austere routine was good for him. After a few months, however, he burned his writings because he thought them stale and mediocre. Olivier, who saw what Dominique had done, told him to find other amusements and affections. Augustin, on the other hand, simply said that he would have to begin again. Augustin, who had experienced setbacks of his own, never complained. Having guessed Dominique's love problem, he told him to solve it by plunging into continuous work.

In spite of Augustin's advice and example, Dominique found it impossible to settle to his work. Through Olivier, he met a woman whom he saw steadily for two months. Then he learned that Nièvres and Madeleine were going to Ormesson, and he invited them to Les Trembles for the holidays. Although he never told Madeleine about his love for her, those were happy months for Dominique. That winter Nièvres and Madeleine decided to go to Paris.

Eventually Dominique wanted to make Madeleine admit that they loved each other, but the harder he tried to draw an admission from her the more she pretended to be quite unaware of his intention. One day, when he was determined to tell her of his love, he saw tears in her eyes; he understood then that there was nothing more to be said.

After that day their relationship became relaxed and natural, and Madeleine, wanting to encourage Dominique in his work, began to meet him at the risk of compromising her reputation. After a time Dominique realized that Madeleine was about to surrender herself to him. He then stopped seeing her, and she became gloomy and irritable. Her reactions made Dominique realize that he had deeply troubled her conscience.

Meanwhile, Augustin had married. Visiting Augustin in his home, Dominique saw the near poverty but great happiness in which his former tutor lived. At the same time Olivier, deeply involved with the women he had been seeing, began to hate the world and himself. It became evident that Julie, Madeleine's younger sister, loved Olivier. But Olivier, who claimed that happiness was a myth, refused to think of marrying her, and his attitude led to a loss of confidence between Dominique and Olivier.

One night, while Dominique and Madeleine were attending the opera, Dominique caught the glance of his former mistress. Madeleine saw the exchange and later told Dominique that he was torturing her and breaking her heart.

That night Dominique, determined to deal honestly with Madeleine, decided to claim her. For the next three weeks, however, she was not at home to him. Frustrated, Dominique moved to new quarters and, as a final effort, tried to escape the life of emotions and concentrate on the logical disciplines of the mind. He read much, saved his money, and published anonymously two volumes of his youthful poetry. He also wrote some political books which were immediately successful. When he evaluated his talents, however, he concluded that he was a distinguished mediocrity.

Several months later Olivier told Dominique that there was unhappiness at Nievres, where Madeleine was staying. Julie was ill and Madeleine herself was not well. Dominique went to Nievres at once and there found Julie recovering. No longer needed as her sister's nurse, Madeleine, with disregard for propriety, shared with Dominique three days of supreme happiness.

On impulse, after Madeleine had led him in a dangerous ride on horseback, Dominique decided to leave as he had come, without premeditation or calculation.

When he was helping her to fold a large shawl that evening, Madeleine half-fainted into his arms, and they kissed. Dominique felt very sorry for her and let her go. After dinner Madeleine told him that, although she would always love him, she wanted him to go away, to get married, to take up a new life. That was the last Dominique saw of Madeleine. He returned to Les Trembles and settled down to quiet country life.

Dominique told the narrator that the years had brought forgiveness and understanding. Augustin, he said, had become a respected figure in Paris. Dominique himself had never repented his early retirement, he felt, in fact, that his life was merely beginning.

STATUE OF THE COMMANDER

Critique

Don Juan is not really representative of Molière's work, but it holds lasting interest for the modern reader for two reasons. Written to fatten the lean exchequer of his company's theater because of the enforced closing of Tartuffe, as well as to please his fellow actors, it is an excellent example of the skill and speed with which Molière could turn out a play. It also departs from his usual technique in making use of the melodramatic and supernatural elements which characterized the original Spanish drama from which it was adapted. Here, as in his other dramas, Molière holds to his genius as a revealer of the hypocrisies and manners of his day, and the play brought down on itself the harsh criticism of those who had been shocked by the boldness of Tartuffe. By the spectacle-loving Parisians it was hailed with delight.

The Story

Don Juan's philandering habits filled Sganarelle, his valet, with apprehension that such scandalous behavior could only bring on him the wrath of heaven and an evil end, but Don Juan blatantly affirmed that any love he had for one fair face could not withhold his heart from others, and as for heaven, he was not afraid of divine wrath. His valet knew him for the greatest scoundrel on earth, a man who was ready to woo a fine lady or country lass at any time but who tired of them in rapid succession. Through fear, however, he remained faithful to Don Juan and often applauded his master's acts, even though he really detested them.

In one of his many affairs Don Juan had killed a Commander. Though officially pardoned, he was believed not entirely free of guilt, and friends and relatives of the dead man sought revenge. They followed Don Juan on one of his philandering journeys to a town where he determined to separate a pair of lovers he had chanced upon and to gratify his passion for the lady. The happy pair had planned a sail on the sea, and he prepared to follow in another vessel manned by villains ready to do his bidding.

Meanwhile, Donna Elvire, whom Don Juan had seduced and carried off from a convent where her brothers, Don Carlos and Don Alonso, had placed her, had got wind of his escapade and followed him. She upbraided him for his desertion. Don Juan refused to admit that he was tired of her, but he wished her to believe that he repented his former madcap behavior in forcing her to marry him against her will. From this sin he would deliver her by allowing her to return to the convent and her former obligations. Elvire, seeing through this deception, threatened him with the anger of an injured woman and declared that heaven would punish him for the wrong he had done her.

Don Juan gave chase to the vessel which carried the object of his most recent infatuation. But his plans were upset when a sudden squall arose and both ships were wrecked. Don Juan was rescued by Pierrot, a country lad, and brought with his men to land. He made immediate love to Charlotte, Pierrot's sweetheart, and she, overwhelmed by his smooth talk and social bearing, promised to marry him. At that moment Mathurine, another country lass who had caught the philanderer's fancy, accosted Don Juan, but he cleverly led each girl to think she was his only love and the one he would marry.

When Don Juan heard that his pursuers were closing in on him, he changed clothes with his valet. Sganarelle devised a better disguise. Putting on the attire of a physician, he prescribed remedies at random for ailing country folk, not knowing whether his medicines would kill or cure.

In the wood through which they were traveling, Don Juan and Sganarelle sought to evade their pursuers. They dismounted on heaven, hell, the devil, and another life, Don Juan declaring himself a practical man who held no belief in such stupid and supernatural things. Deep in argument, they lost their way. Suddenly, through a clearing in the trees, they saw Don Carlos, Elvire's brother, being attacked by a band of robbers. Don Juan rushed to assist the stranger and succeeded in routing the attackers. Don Carlos, not knowing that his rescuer was his own sister's seducer, expressed his gratitude to Don Juan for saving his life. At this moment Alonso came upon them. Their friendly attitude horrified him, for he immediately recognized Don Juan and demanded of his brother that this betrayer of their sister be killed. Don Carlos pleaded for delay and won for Don Juan a day's respite, but he agreed that after this short delay justice would be done and vengeance satisfied.

As Don Juan and Sganarelle continued on their way, Don Juan gave voice again to the song that his heart belonged equally to all the fair sex and that his attraction to Elvire had entirely faded. Among the trees they came on a statue, part of the tomb which the Commander had been building when killed by Don Juan. On a sudden whim Don Juan insisted that the shocked Sganarelle approach the mausoleum and invite the Commander to dine with them. To their amazement the statue nodded its head in assent. Overwhelmed, they retreated hastily, although Don Juan boldly asserted that strong minds are not affected by a belief in anything supernatural.

Don Louis, father of Don Juan, threatened action to put an end to his son's irregularities, reproaching his son for his unworthy life and lack of virtue, from the consequences of which even a worthy name could not protect him. A tradesman and creditor, Monsieur Dimanche, also learned where Don Juan was hidden. Although he blandly acknowledged his indebtedness to the tradesman, Don Juan had no intention of meeting his obligations, and he put the honest man off with hypocritical words of solicitude and friendliness.

Elvire, veiled, let Don Juan know that her love for him was now wholly free from sensual attachment and that she would retire to the convent from which he had taken her. Fearing that he could not escape the wrath of heaven, she implored him to reform before he was utterly crushed.

Meanwhile, Sganarelle and Don Juan had forgotten their invitation asking the statue to dinner. When the meal was served, the statue knocked at the door and seated itself at their table. The statue challenged Don Juan to dine with it the next day.

These happenings led Don Juan to pretend conversion and penitence to his father, who was overjoyed. But his so-called reform was merely a sham to further another of his designs, for Don Juan still believed that hypocrisy was a fashionable and privileged vice. He would boldly don the clothes of hypocrisy, more relentlessly than ever continue to persecute his enemies, and, holding to a good opinion of himself alone, adapt himself to the vices of his age.

Don Carlos demanded that Don Juan recognize Elvire publicly as his wife, but Don Juan demurred, saying the matter was no longer in his hands as Elvire was resolved to go into retreat and he to reform. Sanctimoniously, he begged Don Carlos to leave everything to the will of heaven, but he also warned that if attacked he would fight.

Don Juan, in calling on heaven had gone too far. A ghost in the form of a veiled woman warned him to repent of his sins immediately. Don Juan, thinking he recognized the voice, challenged the figure and raised his sword to strike, but the shape changed to that of Time with a scythe before vanishing. Later the statue returned, adding its threat of a terrible death if Don Juan persisted in his wickedness. Scorched by an invisible flame, Don Juan cried out, but amid lightning flashes and thunderous sounds, the earth opened up and swallowed him. Thus he who neglected debts, seduced his victims, dishonored friends, and violated all laws finally offended heaven. The things which he held in scoffing disbelief brought about his doom.

Pérez Galdós went to Madrid as a student of law in 1863, however, literature and the theater proved more interesting than the bar. Early in his literary career he wrote several novels about politics and social customs. Then, between 1875 and 1878, Galdós became interested in religion and published three novels dealing with its different aspects: Doña Perfecta, the story of a town dominated by the clergy, Gloria (1876-1877), a novel about a Jewish-Christian clash, and The Family of Leon Roch (1879), a story of religious fanaticism ruining a happy household. All are classified as belonging to the novelist's early period, though they represent a great technical advance over his first attempts. In Doña Perfecta, Galdós describes the clash of modern ideas against the walls of bigotry and prejudice in a small Andalusian town removed from the main current of life. Representative of the new order is the scientifically trained, clear thinking, outspoken bridge builder. The old is represented by a wealthy woman so fanatically religious that to save her daughter's immortal soul she would even condone murder. The result is a suspense novel that has shown its popularity by translation into eight languages.

The Story

The city of Orbajosa, with its 7,324 inhabitants, was proud of its religious atmosphere. It boasted a cathedral and a seminary, but it possessed nothing else to make it known to the rest of Spain. It had no manufacturing, and its only agricultural activity was the raising of garlic.

The leading citizen of Orbajosa was Doña Perfecta Rey, a widow whose wealth was the result of legal victories won over her husband's family by her brother, an Andalusian lawyer. Since he had a son, Pepe Rey, and she had a daughter, Rosario, the idea of marriage between the two young people seemed a natural arrangement to their elders. It was for this purpose that Pepe first came to Orbajosa.

In his busy life as a road construction engineer, Pepe had thought little about matrimony, but he began to do so after seeing the lovely Rosario. The girl was in turn attracted to her cousin Doña Perfecta, who was also much taken with Pepe, but not for long.

Doña Perfecta, like the other inhabitants of Orbajosa, was under the domination of the Church, and as the town's most exemplary citizen she felt the need to be especially devout. At the same time Don Inocencio, canon of the cathedral, had other plans for Rosario. Urged on by his sister, María Remedios, who desired the Rey fortune for her son Jacinto, Don Inocencio, far less innocent than his name implied, began conniving to end all talk of marriage between the cousins.

Pepe, through his wide travel and training, was unorthodox, though not without regard for religion. Before long, however, Don Inocencio made him appear a heretic, and Doña Perfecta, for getting her indebtedness to his father and ignoring the feelings of her daughter, refused him permission to see Rosario. The girl, made meek by education and dominated by her mother, lacked the courage to assert herself in declaring her love for her cousin.

Soon all the people of Orbajosa, from the bishop to the working man in the fields, were made to feel it a matter of religious and civic pride to rid their city of the heretic. The unsuspecting Pepe could not conceive of such intolerance. He tried to explain that he had no intention of attacking religion, but his attempts to make clear his position only made matters worse.

Finally, after several stolen interviews with Rosario in the family chapel, Pepe decided to take her away, and Rosario agreed to go with him. But the lovers had failed to reckon with the power of community opinion. While the conscience-stricken Rosario was revealing to her mother her plan to run away that night with Pepe, Maria Remedios filled with hatred for the young man who was cheating her Jacinto out of the Rey for tune arrived to warn Doña Perfecta that the heretic was entering the garden.

Warned now that Pepe was coming to take Rosario away, her mother ordered one of her acquaintances to shoot him. Pepe fell, mortally wounded. His death drove Rosario insane. Don Inocencio felt himself cut off from the world, and Doña Perfecta died of cancer. Nobody gained anything, but Orbajosa felt sure it had won a victory for the faith.

Huysmans began his career as a novelist during the 1870's as a member of the naturalistic school of Zola, whose friend and disciple he then was. But in 1884 he broke with Zola by writing his most famous book A rebours (Against the Grain), which was vastly admired by the fin de siècle writers on both sides of the Channel.

Down There (La bas) was the first of a series of four novels, the purpose of which was to trace the spiritual autobiography of one Durtal (Huysmans himself) as he struggled from skepticism through spiritual despair to the final goal of faith. It was not the author's intention to "tell a story" but rather to analyze his own reactions to the faith that he had lost, but hoped to regain, and to various aspects of historical and contemporary Roman Catholicism, hence, the plots of the books are very slight, and Huysmans used the novels as a platform from which he could express his very decided views on a number of subjects and display his esoteric learning.

When the story opens, Durtal is engaged in writing a biography of Gilles de Rais, the infamous murderer of children, who lived in the fifteenth century. With his friend Des Hermies, whose sole function is to provide someone for him to talk with, Durtal visits the home of Carhaix, the bell ringer of Saint Sulpice, in the tower of the church. During these visits the conversation turns to Church history and especially to Satanism, a subject in which Durtal has become interested as part of the background for his study of de Rais. Des Hermies avers that Satanism is being practiced in Paris at that very time and he mentions a certain Canon Docre, a renegade priest. While Durtal is wondering how he can make the contacts necessary to observe modern Satanism at first hand, he receives a series of anonymous love letters. He eventually discovers that the writer is a Madame Chantelouve, whose receptions he has sometimes attended. After a few meetings she becomes his mistress, he learns that she knows Docre, and at length he persuades her to take him to a Black Mass. He witnesses the revolting spectacle, held in an abandoned Ursuline convent afterwards, in a nearby tavern, Madame Chantelouve tricks him into committing sacrilege. Disgusted with her, he breaks off their relationship, and the novel comes to an end.

There is, however, a story within the story, for large sections of the book are devoted to Durtal's readings from his biography of de Rais. The material for this section Huysmans obtained from a work by the Abbé Bossard, published in 1884, which contained a transcript of the records of de Rais' trial preserved in the archives at Nantes. Although he made a number of mistakes, Huysmans traced, with reasonable accuracy and considerable drama, the career of the sinister marshal. The details are often horrifying, and Huysmans spares his readers none of them, but the ending of the story, with de Rais' trial and final repentance, gave him the opportunity for his most famous passages of description. He was attracted to this unsavory bit of history as others have been (for the literature in French on de Rais is considerable) by the problem in morbid psychology that it presents. De Rais had been in his youth a companion in arms of Jeanne d'Arc and had apparently shared the religious exaltation that had affected her followers. How then, did he change into such a monster of butchery, Satanism, and sexual perversion that his name is remembered after the passage of five hundred years? In addition, Huysmans was a fervent medievalist, and all aspects of the period fascinated him, particularly the religious fervor that had been possible in an age of faith. He never tired of contrasting the ardent Catholicism of the Middle Ages, the splendor of its ritual and the beauty of its architecture with the vulgar manifestations that he saw in his own day. Faith had been easy in the fifteenth century, he believed, the problem was to find it in the materialistic present.

The parts of the novel dealing with modern Satanism—weird as they appear—were taken from happenings in contemporary Paris. There was apparently a good deal of this disgusting hocus pocus going on at the time and several of the characters in Down There were drawn from life.

Huysmans during his later period, never wearied of damning the nineteenth century and all its characteristic works. He begins the novel with an attack on Naturalism, the literary school to which he had once belonged. It has "made our literature the incarnation of materialism 'appetite and instinct' seem to be its sole motivation and rut and brain storm its chronic states." And throughout the book he continues to attack his own age for its shoddiness, crassness, and vulgarity.

But the core of the book is its contribution to the author's spiritual autobiography. Huysmans had spent his childhood quite literally in a religious atmosphere under the shadow of Saint Sulpice, but he confessed later that he had been completely indifferent to religion throughout his youth. He was converted between 1884 and 1892, Down There represents the first stage of this conversion. In this work Durtal Huysmans has reached the stage familiar enough in such cases, of being attracted by the externals of religion such as the beauty of the liturgy and the fascination of Church history, and yet unable to accept the essentials. He had the true Romanticist's attitude—he could have been a devout Catholic in any period except the present. Because the Church fell artistically short of what he believed it to have been during the Middle Ages, he had difficulty in understanding that the underlying reality could have remained unchanged Here his artistic nature in a stumbling block He had yet to under-

Critique

Chinese scholars and readers consider the eighteenth century Hung Lou Meng (Dream of the Red Chamber) the greatest of their novels. Published anonymously in 1792, and for a long time a matter of scholarly reference and dispute, the book is now ascribed to Tsao Hsueh chin, who completed the first eighty chapters before his death in 1763, and Kao Ou, who added forty more as an expansion of Tsao Hsueh chin's original notes. There is internal evidence to show that Tsao Hsueh chin may have drawn on his own experience and family background in creating the character of Pao-yu, the pampered younger son of an aristocratic and powerful family in gradual financial decline at the time of his birth. Like Pao-yu, Tsao Hsueh chin was petted by his family and spoiled by luxury, unlike Pao yu, he failed to pass the Imperial Examinations which would have raised him to some official position. Dream of the Red Chamber is within a single framework a long and extremely complicated domestic chronicle—the novel contains more than four hundred characters—that is both a lively comedy of manners and a realistic fable of moral seriousness. The title is capable of expressing several meanings. In the view of Professor Chi Chen Wang it may be translated as “Dreams of Young Maidens,” since the younger women of the Chia clan lived in the traditional “red chamber” of a palace compound like those which housed wealthy or aristocratic Chinese families until fairly recent times. The term may also be interpreted as a reference to the metaphor “Red Dust,” which in Buddhist usage is a designation for the material world with all its pleasures, follies, and vices. Manuscript copies of the first eighty chapters of the novel were apparently circulated before the publication of the complete 120 chapter version in 1792.

The Story

Ages ago, in the realm of the Great Void, the Goddess Nügua whose task it was to repair the Dome of Heaven rejected a stone which she found unsuited to her purpose. Because she had touched it, however, the stone became endowed with life, so that thereafter it could move as it pleased. In time it chanced on a crimson flower in the region of the Ethe real, where each day it watered the tender blossoms with drops of dew. At last the plant was incarnated as a beautiful young girl. Remembering the stone that had showered the frail plant with refreshing dew, she prayed that in her human form she might repay it with the gift of her tears. Her prayers were to be granted, for the stone, too, had been given life in the Red Dust of earthly existence. At his birth the piece of jade was miraculously found in the mouth of Pao yu, a younger son of the rich and powerful house of Chia, which by imperial favor had been raised to princely eminence several generations before.

At the time of Pao yu's birth the two branches of the Chia family lived in great adjoining compounds of palaces, pavilions, and parks on the outskirts of Peking. The Matriarch, an old woman of great honor and virtue, ruled as the living ancestress over both establishments. Chia Ging, the prince of the Ningkuofu, had retired to a Taoist temple some time before and his son Chia Gen was master in his place. The master of the Yungkuofu was Chia Sheh, the older son of the Matriarch. Chia Cheng, her younger son and Pao yu's father, also lived with his family and attendants in the Yungkuofu. A man of upright conduct and strict Confucian morals, he was a contrast to the other members of his family, who had grown lax and corrupt through enervating luxury and the abuse of power.

Pao yu, the possessor of the miraculous jade stone and a boy of great beauty and quick wit, was his grandmother's favorite. Following her example, the other women of the family—his mother, aunts, sisters, cousins, and waiting maids—doted on the boy and pampered him at every opportunity, with the result that he grew up girlish and weak, a lover of rouge pots and feminine society. The traits of effeminacy he displayed infuriated and disgusted his austere father, who treated the boy with undue severity. As a result, Pao yu kept as much as possible to the women's quarters.

His favorite playmates were his two cousins, Black Jade and Precious Virtue. Black Jade, a granddaughter of the Matriarch, had come to live in the Yungkuofu after her mother's death. She was a lovely, delicate girl of great poetic sensitivity, and she and Pao yu were drawn to each other by bonds of sympathy and understanding that seemed to stretch back into some unremembered past. Precious Virtue, warm hearted and practical, was the niece of Pao yu's mother. She was a girl as good as her brother Hsueh Pan was vicious, for he was always involving the family in scandal because of his pursuit of maidens and young boys. Pao yu's favorite waiting maid was Pervading Fragrance. She slept in his chamber at night, and it was with her that he followed a dream vision and practiced the play of cloud and rain.

When word came that Black Jade's father was ill and wished to see her before his death, the Matriarch sent the girl home under the escort of her cousin Chia Lien. During their absence Chin shih, the daughter in law of Chia Gen, died after a long illness. By judicious bribery the dead woman's husband, Chia Jung, was made a chevalier of the Imperial Dragon Guards in order that she might be given a more elaborate funeral. During the period of mourning Chia Gen asked Phoenix, Chia Lien's wife, to take charge of the Ningkuofu household. This honor gave Phoenix a position of responsibility and power in both palaces. From that time on, although she continued to appear kind and generous, she secretly became greedy for money and power. She began to accept bribes, tamper with the household accounts, and lend money at exorbitant rates of interest.

One day a great honor was conferred on the Chias. Cardinal Spring, Pao yu's sister and one of the emperor's concubines, was advanced to the rank of an Imperial consort of the second degree. Later, when it was announced that she would pay a visit of filial respect to her parents, the parks of the two compounds were at great expense transformed into magnificent pleasure grounds, called the Takuanyuan, in honor of the consort's visit. Later, at Cardinal Spring's request, the pavilions in the Takuanyuan were converted into living quarters for the young women of the family. Pao yu also went there to live, passing his days in idle occupations and writing verses. His pavilion was close to that of Black Jade, who had returned to the Yungkuofu after her father's death.

Pao yu had a half brother, Chia Huan. His mother, jealous of the true born son, paid a sorceress to bewitch the boy and Phoenix, whom she also hated. Both were seized with fits of violence and wild delirium. Pao yu's coffin had already been made when a Buddhist monk and a lame Taoist priest suddenly appeared and restored the power of the spirit stone. Pao yu and Phoenix recovered.

A short time later a maid was accused of trying to seduce Pao yu. Dismissed, she drowned herself. About the same time Chia Cheng was told that his son had turned the love of a young actor away from a powerful patron. Calling his son a degenerate, Chia Cheng almost caused Pao yu's death by the severity of the beating which the angry father administered.

As Phoenix became more shrewish at home, Chia Lien dreamed of taking an other wife. Having been almost caught in one infidelity, he was compelled to exercise great caution in taking a concubine. Phoenix learned about the secret marriage, however, and by instigating claims advanced by the girl's former suitor she drove the wretched concubine to suicide.

Black Jade, always delicate, became more sickly. Sometimes she and Pao yu quarreled, only to be brought together again by old ties of affection and understanding. The gossip of the servants was that the Matriarch would marry Pao yu to either Black Jade or Precious Virtue. While possible marriage plans were being talked about, a maid found in the Takuanyuan a purse embroidered with an indecent picture. This discovery led to a search of all the pavilions, and it was revealed that one of the maids was involved in a secret love affair. Suspicion also fell on Bright Design, one of Pao yu's maids, and she was dismissed. Proud and easily hurt, she died not long afterward. Pao yu became even moodier and more depressed after her death. Outraged by the search, Precious Virtue left the park and went to live with her mother.

A begonia tree near Pao yu's pavilion

bloomed out of season. This event was interpreted as a bad omen, for Pao yu lost his spirit stone and sank into a state of complete lethargy. In an effort to revive his spirits the Matriarch and his parents decided to marry him at once to Precious Virtue rather than to Black Jade, who continued to grow frailer each day. Pao yu was allowed to believe, however, that Black Jade was to be his wife. Black Jade, deeply grieved, died shortly after the ceremony. Knowing nothing of the deception that had been practiced, she felt that she had failed Pao yu and that he had been unfaithful to her. So the flower returned to the Great Void.

Suddenly a series of misfortunes overwhelmed the Chias as their deeds of graft and corruption came to light. When bailiffs took possession of the two compounds, the usury Phoenix had practiced was disclosed. Chia Gen and Chia Sheh were arrested and sentenced to banishment. The Matriarch, who took upon herself the burden of her family's guilt and surrendered her personal treasures for expenses and fines, became ill and died. During her funeral services robbers looted the compound and later returned to carry off Exquisite Jade, a pious nun. Phoenix died also, neglected by those she had dominated in her days of power. Through the efforts of powerful friends however the complete ruin of the family was averted, and Chia Cheng was restored to his official post.

But it was the despised son who in the end became the true redeemer of his family's honor and fortunes. After a Buddhist monk had returned his lost stone, Pao yu devoted himself earnestly to his studies and passed the Imperial Examinations with such brilliance that he stood in seventh place on the list of successful candidates. So impressed was the emperor that he wished to have the young scholar serve at court. But Pao yu was nowhere to be found. The tale was that he became a bodhisattva and disappeared in the company of a Buddhist monk and a Taoist priest.

Drink belongs to the series of the Rougon-Macquart in which Zola attempted to apply the methods of the experimental sciences to the social novel. This particular novel depicts with an extremely cruel precision the destructive effects of alcoholism among workers. At the time of publication it was received either with enthusiasm or with indignation, never with indifference. Actually, Drink might well be the one of Zola's novels in which there is the least prejudice and where the bare document is the most effective. Zola's visionary imagina-

- tion communicates an intense life to the social group he describes as a whole, thus, a certain poetry evolves from the atmosphere of fatality in Drink, and it is this quality which makes the reading bearable

The Story

All night Gervaise had been waiting for her lover, Lantier, to come back to their quarters in Paris. When he finally came home, he treated her brutally and did not display the least affection toward Claude and Étienne, their two children. He stretched out on the bed and sent Gervaise off to the laundry where she worked.

When she was thirteen, Gervaise had left her country town and her family to follow Lantier; she was only fourteen when Étienne was born. Her family had been cruel to her, but until recently Lantier had treated her rather kindly. Gervaise knew that Lantier had come under the influence of the dram shop and at the same time of Adèle, a pretty prostitute.

Gervaise herself was rather pretty, but she had a slight limp which, when she was tired, became worse; the hard life she had lived also had put its mark on her face, although she was only twenty-two. She would have been perfectly happy working hard for her own home and a decent life for her children, but all she had ever known was endless hardship and insecurity.

At the laundry she found some relief in confiding her story to Madame Boche, an older woman who had become her friend. Suddenly the children came running in with word that Lantier had deserted the three of them to go away with Adèle and that he had taken with him everything they owned.

Gervaise's first thought was for her children, and she wondered what would become of them. Soon, however, she was roused in anger by the insults of Virginie, Adèle's sister. Virginie had come to the laundry for the sadistic pleasure of watching how Gervaise would take the triumph of her rival. Gervaise was quite frail and much smaller than Virginie; nevertheless she jumped toward her, full of rage. A struggle followed, in which the two women used pieces of laundry equipment and wet clothes to beat each other. Surprisingly, Gervaise, who had given all her strength, came out victorious. Virginie was never to forgive her.

Madame Fauconnier, proprietress of a laundry, gave Gervaise work in her establishment. There she earned just enough to provide for herself and her children. Another person interested in Gervaise was Coupeau, a roofer who knew all about her unhappy life. He would have liked to have her live with him. Gervaise preferred to devote herself entirely to her two small boys, but one day, when Coupeau proposed marriage to her, she was overcome by emotion and accepted him.

The situation was not very promising at first because the couple had no money. Coupeau's sister and brother-in-law, who were as miserly as they were prosperous, openly disapproved of his marriage. Slowly, perseverance in hard work made it possible for the Coupeaus to lead a decent life and even to put a little money aside. Gervaise had quite a reputation as a laundress and she often dreamed of owning her own shop. A little girl, Nana, was born to the couple four years later. Gervaise resumed working soon afterward.

This good fortune could not last. While he was working on a roof, Nana diverted her father's attention for a split second and he fell. Gervaise, refusing to let him be taken to the hospital, insisted on caring for him at home. Coupeau somehow survived, but his recovery was very slow. What was worse, inactivity had a bad effect on him. He had no more ambition, not even that of supporting his family. He also went more and more often to the dram shop.

Meanwhile, Gervaise was preparing to give up her dream of a little shop of her own when Goujet, a neighbor secretly in love with her, insisted that she borrow the five hundred francs he offered her as a gesture of friendship. She opened her shop and soon had it running quite well.

Goujet's money was never returned. Instead, the family's debts kept progressively increasing, for Coupeau remained idle and continued his drinking. Gervaise herself had become accustomed to a few small luxuries, and she was not as thrifty as she had once been. Actually, she still felt quite confident that she would be able soon to meet her obligations; she had a very good reputation in the whole neighborhood.

At this point, Virginie returned pretending that she had forgotten the fight in the laundry. Gervaise was a little startled at first to discover that her old enemy was going to be her neighbor once more. Being unprejudiced, however, she had no objection to being on friendly terms with Virginie.

Then Lantier came back. When Gervaise heard from Virginie that he had deserted Adèle and had been seen again in the neighborhood, she had been badly frightened. So far, however, her former lover had made no attempt to see her and she had forgotten her fears.

Lantier had waited to make a spectacular entrance. He chose to appear in the middle of a birthday party that Gervaise was giving. Most unexpectedly, Coupeau, who by that time was continuously drunk, invited him in. During the weeks that followed the two men became drinking companions. Later on, Lantier suggested that he might live and board with the Coupeaus. Gervaise's husband had reached such a state of degeneration that he welcomed the idea.

Although the agreement was that Lantier was to pay his share of the expenses, he never kept his promise, and Gervaise found herself with two men to support instead of one. Furthermore, Lantier had completely taken over the household and was running it as he pleased. Still a charming seducer, he was extremely popular with the women of the neighborhood.

Gervaise herself began to degenerate. Disgusted by her husband, she could not find the strength to refuse the embraces of her former lover. Before long her work suffered from such a state of affairs, and eventually she lost the shop. Virginie bought it and, at the same time, won the favors of Lantier.

Meanwhile, Nana had almost grown up, and she was placed as an apprentice in a flower shop. When she decided to leave home for the streets, Gervaise gave up all interest in life and joined Coupeau in the dram shop. After he finally died of delirium tremens, she tried walking the streets but nobody would have her, wretched as she was. Goujet's timid efforts to help her were useless. Completely worn out by all the demands that had been made on her, she died alone.

DUINO ELEGIES

Author Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926)

First published 1923

For the reader who must rely on a prose translation of Rainer Maria Rilke's culminating work, the story and the man behind its appearance may overshadow the poem itself. Nothing of the elegiac quality of the original German can be translated which is as deeply affecting as the inspiration which produced the work, or the philosophy of the man who wrote it.

Often ranked with Yeats as one of the great poets of this century, Rilke is also called the great beginner. One might, however, better compare his poetic innovations with those of Gerard Manley Hopkins, though in the case of Rilke experimentation with rhythm and rhyme never took precedence over content. Like Yeats, he more often let the content find the form. Of the three, Rilke was the most intuitive, rhapsodic, and mystical and he was perhaps the most consummate craftsman.

In October, 1911, the poet visited his friend Princess Marie von Thurn und Taxis Hohenlohe, at Schloss Dumo near Trieste. He remained at the castle, alone throughout the winter, until April, and there he composed the first, the second, and parts of several other elegies. The opening stanza, "Who, if I cried, would hear me among the angelic orders?" came to him while walking in a storm along a cliff two hundred feet above the raging sea, a romantic interlude worthy of an atmospheric passage in a Gothic novel. Rilke conceived the plan of all ten elegies as a whole, though ten years elapsed before the poem found its final form.

The First Elegy, like the first movement of a musical work, presents the central theme and suggests the variations that follow. From the opening line to the last, Rilke invokes the Angels, not those of Christianity but of a special order immersed in time and space, a concept of being of perfect consciousness, of transcendent reality. As a symbol appearing earlier in Rilke's poetry, the Angel represents to him the perfection of life in all the forms to which he aspired, as high above man as God is above this transcending one. Nearest to this angelic order are the Heroes—later he praises Samson—and a woman in love, especially one who dies young, as did Gaspara Stampa (1523-1554), whom Rilke celebrates as a near perfect example. Like the lover, man must realize each moment to the fullest rather than be distracted by things and longings. With this contrast of Man and Angels, of Lovers and Heroes, and with the admission of life's transitoriness, the poet suggests the meaning of life and death as well as words can identify such profound things.

If the introduction or invocation is a praise of life, the Second Elegy is a lament for life's limitations. We moderns must, at best, content ourselves with an occasional moment of self awareness, of a glimpse at eternity. Unlike the Greeks, we have no external symbols for the life within. In love, were we not finally satiated, we might establish communication with the Angels, but finally our intuitions vanish and we have only a fleeting glance at reality.

Rilke began the Third Elegy at Dumo and completed it in Paris the following year, during an intervening visit to Spain. He composed parts of the Sixth, Ninth, and Tenth Elegies. In the third section he confronts the physical bases of life, especially love. He suggests that woman is always superior in the love act, man a mere beginner led by blind animal passion, the libido a vicious drive. Sublime love is an end in itself, but often human love is a means to escape life. Even children have a sort of terror infused into their blood from this heritage of doubt and fear. From this view of mortality Rilke would lead the child away, as he says in powerful though enigmatic conclusion,

Oh gently, gently
show him daily a loving confident task done,—guide him close to the garden, give him those counter balancing nights
Withhold him

Perhaps the advent of war made the Fourth Elegy the most bitter of all, written as it was from Rilke's retreat in Munich in 1915. The theme of distraction, our preoccupation with fleeting time and time serving, makes of this part a deep lament over the human condition. We are worse than puppets who might be manipulated by unseen forces, Angels. Our attempts to force destiny, to toy with fate, cause us to break from heaven's firm hold We must be as little children, delighted within ourselves by the world without, and with our attention and energies undivided, alone Here, we will find our answer to death as the other side of life a part of life and not the negation or end of it

The Fifth Elegy, the last from the standpoint of time, written at the Château de Muzot in 1922, was inspired by Picasso's famous picture of the acrobats Here again the circumstances of the writing overshadow the very real worth of the poem Les Saltimbanques of Picasso was owned by Frau Hertha Koenig, who allowed Rilke the privilege of living in her home in 1915 in order to be near his favorite painting Either the poet imperfectly remembered the details of the painting when the poem was finally written or else he included recollections of acrobats who had so delighted him during his Paris years Regardless of influences, however, this poem is remarkable in its merging of theme and movement with a painting, emphasizing Rilke's conviction that a poem must celebrate all the senses rather than appeal to eye or ear alone

The acrobats, symbolizing the human condition, travel about, rootless and transitory, giving pleasure neither to themselves nor the spectators Reality to the acrobat, as to man, is best discovered in the arduousness of the task, but routine often makes the task a mockery, especially if death is the end If death, however, is the other side of life and makes up the whole, then life forces are real and skillfully performed to the inner delight of performers and spectators, living and dead alike

The Hero, Rilke asserts in the Sixth Elegy, is that fortunate being whose memory, unlike that of long forgotten lovers, is firmly established by his deeds He, being single minded and single hearted, has the same destiny as the early departed, those who die young without losing their view of eternity The great thing, then, is to live in the flower of life with the calm awareness that the fruit, death, is the unilluminated side of life For the Hero, life is always beginning

In the Seventh Elegy the poet as the we and the you as well as the I, no longer worries about transitory decaying or dying Now he sings the unpremeditated song of existence

Don't think that I'm wooing!
Angel, even if I were, you'd never come For my call is always full of 'Away!' Against such a powerful current you cannot advance Like an outstretched arm is my call And its clutching upwardly open hand is always before you as open for warding and warning, aloft there Inapprehensible

From this viewpoint, Rilke attempts in the Eighth Elegy, dedicated to his friend Rudolph Kassner, to support his belief in the "nowhere without no," the "open" world, timeless, limitless, inseparable "whole" "We," contrasted to animals, are always looking away rather than toward this openness

The theme of creative existence Rilke continues in the Ninth Elegy, possibly begun at Duino but certainly finished at Muzot Here he suggests that the life of the tree is superior in felicity to the destiny of man We should, perhaps, rejoice in spite of the limiting conditions of man by overcoming this negation of the flesh with a reaffirmation of the spirit Then death holds no fears since it is not opposite to life, not an enemy but a friend This work possibly represents the author's own transformation from the negating, inhibiting conditions of the Great War to a renewed faith in life

The Tenth Elegy, the first ten lines of which came to him in that burst of creativity at Duino, contains a satiric portrait of the City of Pain where man simply excludes suffering, pain, death, from his thoughts, where distractions, especially the pursuit of money, are the principal activities This semi existence the poet contrasts with that in the Land of Pain, Life Death, where there is continuous progress through insights of a deeper reality to the primal source of joy

And we who have always thought of happiness clumbing, would feel the emotion that almost startles
when happiness falls

Perhaps Rilke means that by complete submission or attunement to universal forces one is suspended or even falls into the "open" This deeply realized philosophy he developed in the Sonnets to Orpheus (1923), a work which complements the Duino Elegies, though it does not surpass them in deep emotional undertones and sheer power of expression

THE DUNCIAD

Type of work Poem

Author Alexander Pope (1688 1744)

Time Eighteenth century

Locale England, the underworld

First published 1728 1743

DULNESS, a goddess

TIBBALD, hero of the first edition, a Shakespearian scholar

COLLEY CIBBER, hero of the second edition, playwright, producer, and poet laureate

When Alexander Pope set out to criticize the general literary climate of his time and to avenge the slights given his own work by other writers, he took the theme of John Dryden's MacFlecknoe, in which the poetaster Thomas Shadwell is crowned ruler of the Kingdom of Nonsense, and expanded it to make a true mock epic of three books He added a fourth book when he rewrote the poem in 1742 The Dunciad acclaims the goddess Dulness, daughter of Chaos and Night, and her chosen prince the scholar Lewis Theobald (Tibbald) in the first edition, Colley Cibber, playwright and poet laureate, in the second

This poem lacks the close knit quality of Pope's other fine mock epic, The Rape of the Lock It is longer, and the fact that the hero appears only at intervals explains a certain disunity Tibbald Cibber appears at the middle of Book I, is present only as a spectator at the epic games described in Book II, and dreams the trip to the underworld, modeled on that of Aeneas in Book VI of the Aeneid Thus, the action is limited The important points in the poem are made in the descriptive passages in these episodes and in conversations which contain criticism of individuals and trends

The general plan outlined above shows Pope's close reliance on the classical epic as his model The Dunciad, like The Rape of the Lock, begins with a parody of the Aeneid

The mighty Mother, and her Son, who brings
The Smithfield Muses to the ear of Kings,
I sing

The invocation is appropriately directed not at a muse but at the Patricians, the patrons whose purses inspire dull writing The dedication to the author's friend Jonathan Swift which follows is an eighteenth century, rather than a classic convention

Pope describes in detail the abode of Dulness and the allegorical figures gathered around her throne Fortitude, Temperance, Prudence, and Poetic Justice, who is weighing truth with gold and "solid pudding against empty praise" The gods are notoriously interested in the affairs of mortals, Dulness looks out upon the ingredients of dull writing and the numerous creators of it Her eye lights upon the hero, who is raising to her an altar of tremendous tomes of his writing She anoints him as king of her realm, and the nation croaks Aesop's line, "God save King Log"

In the second book Pope designs appropriate contests for his various groups of enemies The booksellers race to win a phantom poet A patron is designated for the poet who tickles best but he is carried off by an unknown sycophantic secretary Journalists swim through the muck of the Thames River

Who flings most filth, and wide pollutes around
The stream be his the Weekly Journals bound,
A pig of lead to him who drives the best
A peck of coals a piece shall glad the rest

As a final test the goddess promises her "amplest powers" to anyone who can remain awake as he listens to the verses of "Three College Sophs, and three pert Templars" The book ends with the whole company lying asleep

Grandiose heroic couplets and numerous parallels with classical visits to the underworld fill the third book John Taylor, the Water Poet, replaces the ferryman Charon, Elkanah Settle, a Restoration poet, takes Anchises' part in showing the hero the future of Dulness and her offspring The high point of this book is the crowning of Tibbald Cibber with a poppy wreath by Bavius, prototype of the worst of poets from ancient times

The 1742 Dunciad, centering on the triumph of Dulness over England, reveals a slightly more mature outlook in the poet than does the earlier version Tibbald was the object of a vindictive attack, occasioned by his criticism of Pope's edition of Shakespeare Cibber is representative of the dull poet, as laureate he was well known for his poor occasional verse The fourth book is far more concerned with the institutions promoting the rise of dullness than with individuals The more frequent use of classical names, rather than personal ones indicates the poet's movement toward universality

The last book is almost an entity in itself It opens with a new invocation, to Chaos and Night The pseudo learned notes, effective satire written by Pope himself, point out the precedents for a second invocation when important new matter is introduced Evil omens presage the coming destruction as Dulness ascends her throne and Cibber reclines in her lap, making his only appearance in this book

Around the goddess are Science, Wit, Logic, Rhetoric, and other abstractions in chains, reminiscent of several scenes in The Faerie Queene Various personages appear to tell of Dulness' victory over the many arts and institutions First to come is a harlot representing the Italian opera, she rejoices in the banishment of Handel to Ireland and the supremacy of chaos in music

Pope uses an epic simile to describe the nations clustering around the goddess

Not closer, orb in orb, conglomed are seen
The buzzing Bees about their dusky
Queen

Present are the passive followers of Dulness and those who lead the advance pompous editors who make mincemeat of good poets with notes and commentary, patrons who set up a bust of a poet after he has died neglected

A specter the head of Westminster School, modeled on Milton's Moloch, speaks on the state of education

As Fancy opens the quick springs of Sense
We ply the Memory, we load the brain Bind rebel Wit and double chain on chain, Confine the thought, to exercise the breath
And keep them in the pale of Words till death

Pope criticizes the hair splitting grammarians in Aristarchus' boasts that he has turned good verse into prose again. Science is also satirized as the study which loses itself in detail, but Dulness fears even that condition of affairs, for an object of nature is capable of awakening a mind. Religion does not escape, the poet says that it has degenerated into a belief in a mechanistic God, made in man's image.

Knowing the state of her kingdom, the goddess celebrates her mysteries, reflecting Pope's interest in ceremony. As the rites are concluded a state of dullness encompasses the country, schools, government, army. Truth, philosophy, and religion perish as "Universal Darkness buries All."

The Dunciad contains more of the true heroic spirit than most other mock epics, like Samuel Butler's coarse Hudibras or the delicate and sophisticated The Rape of the Lock. These poems are directed toward the amusement of the reader, while The Dunciad reveals Pope's passionate conviction that the triumph of dullness was a real danger to art, science, and learning. He chose to deliver his warning to England in the humorous mock epic form, but his seriousness about his subject raises the latter part of the fourth book to the level of real heroic poetry.

There are many fine lines of poetry in The Dunciad, but it is more diffuse and less brilliant satire than either MacFlecknoe or Pope's own Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot. Missing are the biting, succinct couplets like Dryden's

The rest to some faint meaning make pretense,
But Sh— never deviates into sense or Pope's lines on Addison

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering, teach the rest to sneer

The greatest deterrent to the modern reader of The Dunciad is probably the fact that so much of the poet's contemporary criticism is almost unintelligible, few names die faster than those of the fifth rate writers of an era. Yet the satirical comments on universal conditions remain fresh and pointed. The Dunciad is worthy of a high place among mock-heroic poems.

Critique

Earth (La Terre), the fifteenth volume of the Rougon-Macquart series, is Zola's horrifying vision of the French peasantry before the Franco-Prussian

War In the relationships between Fouan and his family, Zola consciously adopted the theme of Lear, although the farmer drawn with realistic detail has none of the nobility of Shakespeare's king Zola's introduction of Rabelaisian humor in the character Jésus Christ was an innovation in literary realism The earth itself dominates the novel, and its beauty and indifference contrast vividly with the peasants' passionate absorption in possessing the land and with the crimes they commit in order to do so When the novel appeared, Zola was reproached for his lack of idealism and his lack of understanding of the peasants Mallarmé, however, did not hesitate to see in it true poetry Earth is now among the most widely read of Zola's novels

The Story

As Jean Macquart finished sowing each furrow with grain, he paused and gazed over the wide, rich plain As far as he could see farmers were scattering their wheat, anxious to finish sowing before the frosts came He met and talked with Françoise about the coming division of old Fouan's property

In the notary's office, plans for Fouan's sons and son-in-law to divide and farm his land were angrily made Fouan could not bear to lose the land which had taken all his strength to work and which he had loved more passionately than his wife The rent and food he asked in return for his property seemed excessive to his children, who, now that the land was within their grasp, intended to keep as much of its yield as possible Buteau declared that the old man had money saved in bonds This claim so enraged Fouan that he exhibited some of his former ferocity and authority Finally the notary completed the transaction and arranged for the division of land by the surveyor

Buteau, having drawn the third lot of land, declared it was the worst, and he refused to take that part of the property His refusal distressed Lise, Françoise's sister, for Buteau had been her lover and she was pregnant She had hoped that when he got the land he would marry her

Old Mouche, the sisters' father, had a stroke and died in his home As the village women watched by his deathbed, a violent hail storm laid waste the village crops The peasants examined the damage by lamplight, their animosities for gotten in their common anguish at this devastation and their fury at the destructiveness of heaven

Lise and Françoise stayed in the house after their father's death Lise's son had been born and still Buteau had not married her Jean became a constant visitor in the household Believing that he was attracted by Lise, he proposed to her Before accepting him, she decided to consult Buteau because of the child

At the autumn haymaking Jean and Françoise worked together While the girl stood atop the growing rick, Jean forked up bales of hay to her She was flushed and laughing and Jean found her violently attractive Because he was years older than Françoise, he was greatly upset when he suddenly realized that it was she who had drawn him to the house and not Lise

Jean and the sisters met Buteau at the market in Cloyes Because Lise now had property of her own and because he had at last accepted his share of land, Buteau decided to marry Lise Buteau, delighted now by possession of the land, plowed and sowed with vigor and passion, determined never to relinquish one inch of the earth As the wheat grew, its rolling greenness covered La Beauce like an ocean Buteau watched the weather as anxiously as a sailor at sea Although Françoise wished to have her share of the land decided, Buteau managed to avoid a final settlement

When Fouan's older son, nicknamed Jésus Christ, took to buy brandy the money which Buteau had grudgingly given his parents as their allowance, Buteau was so infuriated that he struck his mother to the floor Rose did not recover and in three days she was dead Fouan was then left completely alone Finally, much against his will, he decided to make his home with Delhomme, his son in law

By harvest time the green sea of wheat had turned to a fiery gold, and the whole village worked at the harvest Jean, meanwhile, was tormented by his desire for Françoise Finally, exhausted by her struggle to resist the constant attentions of Buteau as well, she yielded to him Buteau, in his fear of losing both the girl and her land, asserted wildly that they could never be married while Françoise was under age

Meanwhile, Fouan was bullied and restricted in Delhomme's home, he had no money for tobacco and he was allowed little wine Completely miserable, he went to live with Buteau and Lise There he was appalled by Buteau's pursuit of Françoise, whose resistance made Buteau so angry that even Lise expressed the wish her sister would surrender in order to have peace once more in the household Françoise, continuing proudly to refuse Buteau, was gradually turned into a domestic drudge

In desperation Françoise agreed to marry Jean when she was of age Fouan, drawn into these household quarrels, was no happier than he had been with Delhomme At last, because Buteau and his wife begrudged every mouthful of food that he ate, he accepted Jésus Christ's offer of a home Jésus Christ was the only one of Fouan's children without a passion for land Although it distressed Fouan to see his hard won acres go to buy brandy for Jesus Christ, he enjoyed the jokes and the occasional excellent meals cooked in the nearly ruined house by Jesus-Christ's illegitimate daughter

Before the time of the vintage Jésus Christ discovered that his father was spending his bonds on an annuity by which he hoped to acquire some land of his own once more Amazed, first Fanny and then Buteau tried to bribe the old man to return to them Fouan's relationship with Jésus Christ was never close again after the discovery

After a final explosion with Lise, Françoise left the house and went to live with her aunt It was arranged that she should soon marry Jean and claim her full share of the property The ill will between the sisters was intensified when the land was divided and Françoise secured the house at auction Buteau and Lise moved to an adjacent house, where Fouan, fearing that Jesus Christ would steal his bonds, joined them

Jean and Buteau were forced to work side by side in the fields One day while Jean was manuring the earth, Lise told Buteau that Fouan had had a stroke and that she would bring the doctor Surprisingly, the old man recovered During his illness, however, Lise discovered his bonds When they refused to return them, he left

Homeless and desperate, Fouan wandered to Delhomme's farm, where he stayed wearily looking into the house Next he went to Jésus Christ's hovel, but fear and pride again prevented him from entering That night, during a terrible storm, Fouan, wretched and exhausted, dragged himself around to look once more at the land he had owned Finally his hunger became so great that he returned to Buteau, who jeeringly fed him

Françoise was pregnant Enraged by the fear that the property might not revert to him and by the fact that Jean's plow had cut into their land, Buteau, aided by Lise, at last raped Françoise The girl then realized with revulsion that she had always loved him Jealous, Lise knocked Françoise against a scythe in the field and the blade pierced her abdomen As she lay dying Françoise refused to will her share of the farm to Jean, although he was her husband, she still regarded him as an outsider After her death, Jean was evicted from the land

Greedy for more money, and terrified that the old man would betray the manner of Françoise's death, Lise and Buteau murdered Fouan by smothering him with a pillow and then setting fire to his bed Jean Macquart, having no further ties with La Beauce, decided again to become a soldier After a final tour of the land he left the region for good If he could not cultivate it, he would at least be able to defend the earth of France

Critique

East of Eden is an ambitious but not altogether successful attempt to present three themes simultaneously a panoramic history of the Salinas Valley (and thus of America itself) around the turn of the century, a melodramatic chronicle of two families in the valley, a symbolic recreation of the Cain and Abel story Its expressed concern, however, is philosophic—the nature of the conflict between good and evil In this conflict love and the acceptance or rejection it brings to the individual plays an important role, yet one has always the opportunity to choose the good In this freedom lies man's glory The book's defects stem from the author's somewhat foggy and sentimental presentation of its philosophy and his tendency to manipulate or oversimplify characters and events for symbolic purposes

The Story

The soil of the Salinas Valley in California is rich, though the foothills around it are poor and its life shrivels during the long dry spells The Irish-

born Hamiltons, arriving after American settlers had displaced the Mexicans, settled on the barren hillside There Sam Hamilton, full of talk, glory, and improvident inventions, and Liza, his dourly religious wife, brought up their nine children

In Connecticut, Adam Trask and his half brother Charles grew up, mutually affectionate in spite of the differences in their natures Adam was gentle and good Charles, roughly handsome with a streak of wild violence After Adam's mother had committed suicide, his father had married a docile girl who had borne Charles Adam loved his stepmother but hated his father, a rigid disciplinarian whose fanatic militarism had begun with a fictitious account of his own war career and whose dream was to have a son in the army To fulfill his dream, he chose Adam, who could gain the greater strength that comes from the conquest of weakness as Charles could not But Charles, whose passionate love for his father went continually unnoticed, could not understand this final rejection of himself In violent despair, he beat Adam almost to death

Adam served in the cavalry for five years Then, although he hated regimentation and violence, he reenlisted, for he could neither accept help from his father, who had become an important figure in Washington, nor return to the farm Charles now ran alone Afterward he wandered through the West and the South, served time for vagrancy, and finally came home to find his father dead and himself and Charles rich In the years that followed he and Charles lived together, although their bickering and inbred solitude drove Adam to periodic wanderings Feeling that their life was one of pointless industry, he talked of moving west but did not

Meanwhile, Cathy Ames was growing up in Massachusetts She was a monster, born unable to comprehend goodness but with a sublimely innocent face and a consummate knowledge of how to manipulate or deceive people to serve her own ends After a thwarted attempt to leave home, she burned her house, killing her parents and leaving evidence to indicate that she had been murdered She then became the mistress of a man who ran a string of brothels and used his insatiable love for her to torment him When he realized her true nature, he took her to a deserted spot and beat her savagely Near death, she crawled to the nearest house—the Trasks'—where Adam and Charles cared for her Adam found her innocent and beautiful, Charles, who had a knowledge of evil through himself, recognized the evil in her and wanted her to leave Cathy, needing temporary protection, enticed Adam into marrying her, but on their wedding night she gave him a sleeping draught and went to Charles

Feeling that Charles disapproved of Cathy, Adam decided to carry out his dream of going west He was so transfixed by his happiness that he did not take Cathy's protests seriously, as his ideal of love and purity, she could not disagree Adam bought a ranch in the richest part of the Salinas Valley and worked hard to ready it for his wife and the child she expected Cathy hated her pregnancy, but she knew that she had to wait calmly to get back to the life she wanted After giving birth to twin boys, she waited a week she then shot Adam, wounding him, and walked out

Changing her name to Kate, Cathy went to work in a Salinas brothel Her beauty and seeming goodness endeared her to the proprietress, Faye, and Kate gradually assumed control of the establishment After Faye made a will leaving Kate her money and property, Kate slyly engineered Faye's death Making her establishment one which aroused and purveyed to sadistic tastes, she became legendary and rich

Adam was like a dead man for a year after his wife left him, unable to work his land or even to name his sons Finally Sam Hamilton woke him by deliberately angering him, and Sam, Adam, and Lee the Chinese servant and a wise and good man, named the boys Caleb and Aron As the men talked of the story of Cam and Abel, Lee concluded that rejection terrifies a child most and leads to guilt and revenge Later, after much study, Lee discovered the true meaning of the Hebrew word timshel—thou mayest—and understood that the story meant in part that man can always choose to conquer evil

Sam, grown old, knew that he would soon die Before he left his ranch, he told Adam of Kate and her cruel, destructive business Adam, disbelieving in her very existence, visited her and suddenly knew her as she really was Though she tried to taunt him, telling him that Charles was the true father of his sons, and to seduce him, he left her a free and curiously exultant man Yet he could not tell his sons that their mother was not dead

Caleb and Aron were growing up very differently Aron was golden haired and automatically inspired love, yet he remained single-minded and unyielding,

Caleb was dark and clever, a feared and respected leader left much alone. When Adam moved to town, where the schools were better, Aron fell in love with Abra Bacon. Abra told Aron that his mother was still alive, but he could not believe her because to do so would have destroyed his faith in his father and thus in everything.

About this time Adam had the idea of shipping lettuce packed in ice to New York, but the venture failed. Aron was ashamed of his father for failing publicly. Caleb vowed to return the lost money to his father.

As they faced the problems of growing into men, Aron became smugly religious, disturbing to Abra because she felt unable to live up to his idealistic image of her. Caleb alternated between wild impulses and guilt. Learning that Kate was his mother, he began following her until she, noticing him, invited him to her house. As he talked to her, he knew with relief that he was not like her, she felt his knowledge and hated him. Kate herself, obsessed by the fear that one of the old girls had discovered Faye's murder, plotted ways to destroy this menace. Although Caleb could accept Kate's existence, he knew that Aron could not. To get the boy away from Salinas, Caleb talked him into finishing high school in three years and beginning college. Adam, knowing nothing of Caleb's true feelings, was extravagantly proud of Aron.

World War I began. Caleb went into the bean business with Will Hamilton and made a fortune because of food shortages. With growing excitement, he planned an elaborate presentation to his father of the money once lost in the lettuce enterprise. First he tried to persuade Aron, who seemed indifferent to his father's love, not to leave college. Caleb presented his money to Adam, only to have it rejected in anger because Adam's idealistic nature could not accept money made as profit from the war. He wanted Caleb's achievements to be like his brother's. In a black mood of revenge, Caleb took Aron to meet his mother. After her sons' visit, Kate, who was not disturbed by those she could hurt as she was by someone like Caleb, made a will leaving everything to Aron. Then, overburdened by age, illness, and suspicion, she committed suicide.

Unable to face his new knowledge of his parents' past, Aron joined the army and went to France. Adam did not recover from the shock of his leaving. Abra turned to Caleb, admitting that she loved him rather than Aron, whose romantic stubbornness kept him from facing reality. When the news of Aron's death arrived, Adam had another stroke. As he lay dying, Caleb, unable to bear his guilt any longer, told his father of his responsibility for Aron's enlistment and thus his death. Lee begged Adam to forgive his son. Adam weakly raised his hand in benediction and, whispering the Hebrew word timshel, died.

Critique

Eastward Ho! is a remarkable example of successful collaboration. For three authors as different in temperament as Chapman, Jonson, and Marston to write together a smooth, unified, and amusing play is almost a miracle. It encompasses the heartwarming theme of the Prodigal Son and satirical thrusts at contemporary society. Scholars have tried to assign specific scenes and lines to the individual authors, but the general reader or playgoer need not trouble himself with problems of authorship. The play's rapid dramatic movement, in keeping with its apparently rapid composition, carries its audience through laughter and sentiment to an appropriate happy ending. The characters are amusing, and even the victims of the satire are treated without the bitterness or savagery that other works of Jonson and Marston might lead one to expect. It is a true comedy which should be as effective on the modern as on the Elizabethan stage.

Touchstone, a goldsmith, had two daughters, Gertrude, a flutter-brained social climber, and Mildred, a modest, gentle girl. He also had two apprentices, Francis Quicksilver, a fellow as unstable as his name, and Golding, who was steady and conscientious.

Caught while trying to slip away from the shop, Quicksilver made a spirited defense of his way of life, especially of his prodigality among the town gallants. Touchstone answered with a severe moral lecture and pointed out the exemplary behavior of his fellow apprentice. The lecture was interrupted by a messenger from Sir Petronel Flash, who wished to make arrangements to marry Gertrude. As soon as Touchstone was out of hearing, Quicksilver abused the old citizen, but Golding defended his master and warned and rebuked Quicksilver.

Mildred, with the help of a tailor and a maid, attired Gertrude elegantly to receive her knight, while Gertrude rattled away, full of herself and contemptuous of her bourgeois family. Touchstone brought in Sir Petronel and concluded the arrangements for the wedding, warning both Gertrude and the knight that they need not expect any gifts beyond the agreed dowry. Gertrude impudently flouted him and left with the knight, Mistress Touchstone fluttering in attendance on her soon-to-be married daughter. After their departure, Touchstone proposed a match between Mildred and Golding.

From the wedding feast Quicksilver returned to the shop drunk, hiccupping and quoting lines from popular plays like Tambrulaine and The Spanish Tragedy. Touchstone, losing patience with the fellow, released him from his indenture and discharged him. After Quicksilver's defiant and staggering exit, Touchstone told Golding that he too would no longer be an apprentice, but a full-fledged member of the guild and his master's son-in-law.

At the home of old Security, where Quicksilver and his mistress Sindefy lived, the old usurer plotted with them to trap Sir Petronel and to gain possession of Gertrude's property. Quicksilver was to encourage the knight to borrow money for a proposed voyage to Virginia, and both Quicksilver and Sindefy, who was to become Gertrude's maid, were to encourage the bride to put up her land to cover the debt. Before leaving to set his plans in motion, Security delayed to bid farewell to his pretty young wife, Winifred

Sir Petronel confessed to Quicksilver that he had no castle, but that he intended to send his bride on a wild goose chase to an imaginary castle in the country in order to get her out of the way while he carried off old Security's young wife on the Virginia voyage. Security brought in Sindefy and placed her with Gertrude as a maid, then took Sir Petronel to his home for breakfast. Captain Seagull, Scapethrift, and Spendall joined Sir Petronel there to make the final plans for the voyage.

As Gertrude prepared for her ride into the country to see her husband's nonexistent castle, Touchstone entered with his other daughter and his new son-in-law, Golding. Gertrude heaped contempt on all three, and Sir Petronel made disparaging remarks about the groom's lack of nobility. Touchstone distributed a few ironical barbs and led away the newlyweds. After their departure, Security presented Gertrude with papers, supposedly to cover a loan for new furnishings for the country castle. At Sir Petronel's request she signed the papers without even reading them and set out in her coach after urging the knight to follow as soon as possible. Sir Petronel and Quicksilver convinced Security that the knight was planning to elope with a lawyer's wife, and Security, maliciously delighted at the chance to injure another man, promised to lend them his wife's gown as a disguise. He also felt that lending the gown would be a good way to make certain that his wife did not leave home.

Sir Petronel, the disguised Winifred, Quicksilver, and the other adventurers ignored storm warnings and set out in their boats for the ship. Security discovered his wife's absence and tried to follow them. Slitgut, a butcher coming to Cuckold's Haven to set up a pair of horns, saw from his elevated vantage point a boat overturned in the waves.

A few minutes later old Security crawled ashore bemoaning the appropriateness of his place of shipwreck. As soon as he had crept away, the butcher saw a woman struggling in the waves and a boy plunging in to save her. The boy rescued a very repentant Winifred, brought her ashore, and offered her shelter and dry clothes. A third victim of the storm was washed ashore at the foot of the gallows—a bad omen, Slitgut thought. The man was Francis Quicksilver, who passed by cursing his fate. Finally, Sir Petronel and Captain Seagull reached shore and met Quicksilver. Sir Petronel, having lost his money in the water, had no hope of saving his ship, which he expected to be confiscated. Winifred, now dry and freshly dressed, convinced Security that she had not left home until she began to worry about him. Slitgut made a few wry remarks about marriage and went home, unobserved by any of the adventurers.

Touchstone, thoroughly angered by the knight's desertion and by his wife's and daughter's foolishness, turned out Gertrude and Sindefy to shift for themselves, but having borne his wife as a cross for thirty years, he felt he should continue to do so. Golding, made an alderman's deputy on his first day in the guild, reported that Sir Petronel and Quicksilver had been arrested and the ship attached.

Mistress Touchstone had learned her lesson, but Gertrude, in spite of her mother's entreaties that she beg forgiveness, treated her father with her customary contempt. Sir Petronel and Quicksilver were brought in by a constable, and Quicksilver was charged with the theft of five hundred pounds, a capital offense. A warrant was also sent out for old Security for his share in the business. Sir Petronel and Quicksilver reached a peak of repentance that made them the talk of the prison. Golding and the jailer joined Mistress Touchstone and her daughters in pleading with Touchstone to show mercy to the offenders, but

Touchstone was adamant. Finally Golding had himself arrested, sent for Touchstone to come to release him, and arranged for the latter to overhear Quicksilver's ballad of repentance, sung for the edification of other prisoners to the tune of "I Wail in Woe, I Plunge in Pain." Touchstone's heart was moved, and he offered forgiveness to both prodigal son in law and prodigal apprentice. Old Secunty, hearing that a song of repentance had worked such wonders, rushed up howling a lamentable song in a most lamentable voice: he too received mercy. At Golding's urging, Quicksilver agreed to marry Sindefy. Security returned to Winifred. Even Gertrude forgave her erring husband and asked forgiveness from her father. Thus all differences were reconciled.

EBONY AND IVORY

Type of work Short stories

Author Llewelyn Powys (1884-1939)

Time Early twentieth century

Locale Africa and Europe

First published 1923

Llewelyn Powys, the youngest of three brothers to achieve literary fame, was a rather gifted and remarkable British writer. He was educated at Cambridge, worked as a stock farmer in Kenya during World War I, and then moved to New York to work as a journalist for five more years. The stories in Ebony and Ivory, many of which were published in the best magazines of the time, were written during his stay in Kenya and New York. They present perhaps the best and most representative examples of his outlook and art.

Powys' outlook and art are very closely related. His vision of life informs every aspect of his art, while his art is an attempt to answer that vision. This tension between outlook and art, truth and style, content and form, provides Powys' stories with their intensity and force.

Powys' vision of life, the spirit that informs these stories, was grounded in pain and death, cruelty and mortality, vanity and doom, for Powys was obsessed with agony and fate, which for him were the sole absolutes of life. His stories dwell overwhelmingly on the tragic soul-destroying aspects of life and have much the same spirit as Ecclesiastes, the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, and much of the fiction of Joseph Conrad. They show an intimate acquaintance with the terror, cruelties, and savagery that plague men. Powys knew the futility and mortality of humanity. This was the lesson he learned in Africa.

In this collection there are the Ebony stories and sketches, which take place in British East Africa, and the Ivory tales, which take place in Europe. The title obviously contains an ironic play on skin color, on black and white, but beyond this fact and far more important is the reference to the Arab proverb "On Ebony and Ivory the same dark doom is writ."

The Ebony stories provide the hard core of Powys' vision, for their total effect is that of hopelessness and despair. These sketches show the soul-killing effect of Africa on the European and African alike. The unrelenting sun, the harshness of color and noise, the voraciousness of animal and human life all reduce men to their naked, cruel selves. The European is demoralized and all of his illusions are destroyed. His rule is stripped of its benevolence in Africa and is shown to rest on brutality and cunning. Thus in "Black Parasites" a hard-hearted, mediocre farmer sets fire to his brushland after tying up a native sheep thief in the middle of it. In "How It Happens" a sensitive boy arrives in British East Africa from England, and in his harsh, new surroundings he is demoralized by his mediocre associates, gets syphilis, and commits suicide. Powys' theme, the loss of innocence, was almost inevitable, given his outlook on life. In "Black Gods" he declared that the bottom of the well of life contains no hope, that the surface was all, the depth hollow and empty.

When Powys' heroes undergo any change, it is in the direction of shedding illusions, of descending to the bottom of the well of life and facing life without hope. This does not mean that they necessarily give up. Powys' most memorable heroes face life's savagery with a hopeless defiance. In "Dead Matter in Africa" a zebra guards his dead mate against the vultures, against all hope and reason, and against the universe. Again, in his Ebony story, "The Stunner," a dumb brute of a man rises from his deathbed and staggers miles to his sweetheart solely on strength of his love. But this kind of heroism, however admirable, is essentially futile; it means involving oneself in pain, in death, and in tragedy. Although Powys' stories are not Christian in outlook, the figure of the crucified Jesus runs through the majority of them, for Jesus is the epitome of this futile heroism, of this agonized defiance of fate.

As the Arab proverb suggests, Powys' Ivory tales elaborate the ideas and motifs of the Ebony section. In "Threnody," "Death," and "The Brown Satyr," Powys develops the same theme he used in "How It Happens," namely the loss of innocence and the problem of facing a world devoid of hope. In "Not Guilty," "Un Mufle," and "The Wryneck," Powys shows again the impossibility of love in a cursed and savage world devoid of meaning and full of doom.

In quality the Ebony stories seem slightly superior to the Ivory tales simply because Africa provided a more appropriate background for Powys' despairing vision, even though he does a fine job of conveying that vision in the Ivory section as well. For Powys the world was cursed and damned, and it was damned no matter where one was, whether in the heart of Africa or in the heart of civilization. To him it was as if some evil wizard had desolated the world and left it in agony and despair.

Needless to say, such a vision of life could easily become intolerable to the person who possessed it unless he had some means of protecting himself against it. Some means of converting it into something productive. Powys' method of achieving release was through writing, through art which gave a tangible form to that vision. Powys sought his salvation through his stories and through observation. If participation in the world meant pain and tragedy, observation was a way of protecting oneself from pain and tragedy, a way of keeping the world at a distance. Art for Powys, was a way of reshaping life's pain and thereby controlling it. Passive observation and active artistic creation were his way of protecting himself against his vision.

As one might expect, Powys wrote about pain and tragedy in a detached style that was both cool and evocative. Powys possessed a happy feeling for the right word, the precise expression which contributed greatly to the crisp, cold, clear quality of his writing. This detached mode of writing, which at times approached cruelty, considerably heightened the horror of his tales. If Powys had written with sympathy for his characters the effect would have been reduced and the full power of his vision would not have come through.

Powys was essentially an ironist. His irony was engendered by the conflict between his vision and his art. On the one hand he saw the world as irrevocably damned and on the other he tried to escape this damnation through art, thus he wrote about cruelty, pain, and doom with detachment and reserve. Truth, for Powys, was only to be gained through passive observation. Through truth he hoped to gain a kind of salvation, but the truth proved to be just as ironic as himself What Powys did gain through passive observation was the ability to transform horror into beauty His stories possess a cruel, evocative beauty, but his beauty, like his truth, was essentially ironic, frigid and sterile in its revelation

Powys' failings and virtues as a writer arise from his vision of life and his attempt to cope with that vision He was a fine writer of short stories and sketches and had a remarkable ability to express himself with clarity, beauty, and force, but he paid for this ability in terms of agony and coldness His stories are comparable with those of Poe, Bierce, and Hemingway in vividness, beauty, and power One must be prepared to pay for these things

The Ecclesiazusae is not one of Aristophanes' best plays Written late in his career, it lacks the wit and ingenuity of Lysistrata, the play which it most resembles The scatological humor seems gratuitous, but the satire on the communist Utopia enforced by the women of Athens is effective and the action moves swiftly, especially since the role of the chorus has been reduced to practically nothing Although the play appeared some twenty years before Plato's Republic, some critics believe that the playwright is here deriding the philosopher's ideas as they circulated in discussion

Praxagora, who had stolen her husband's clothes and escaped from the house before dawn, was waiting in the street for her fellow conspirators to appear As they arrived she inspected them to see if they had made all the preparations that had been agreed upon at the feast of the Scirophonia Had they let the hair under their armpits grow? Had they darkened their complexions by rubbing themselves thoroughly with oil and standing all day in the sun? Had they prepared false beards? Had they stolen their husbands' shoes, cloaks, staffs, and clubs? Assured that they had done everything possible to disguise themselves as men, Praxagora opened the discussion of their plot to save Athens by taking over the government from the men This was to be achieved by invading the assembly disguised as men and dominating the vote The first problem was to select a spokesman When woman after woman failed the practice test by invoking goddesses or addressing the audience in feminine terms, Praxagora herself took on the responsibility of speaking for them At dawn they departed for the assembly

Meanwhile, Blepyrus, Praxagora's husband, had awakened with a need to relieve himself, only to find both his wife and his clothes missing His need was so great, however, that he dressed in his wife's saffron robe and rushed outdoors

Before he could return to the house, he was accosted by his friend Chremes, who gave him a detailed account of the strange proceedings at the assembly. He told how, after several citizens had proposed stupid suggestions for curing the economic plight of the city, a rather fair young man had taken the floor to urge that the government be hereafter entrusted to the women. The speaker had been enthusiastically applauded by a large crowd of strange shoemakers. Chremes himself was rather in favor of the idea, since it was the one and only solution that had hitherto not been tried.

After supervising a secret change back to feminine dress among the women, Praxagora returned to her husband with the excuse that she had been called during the night to aid a friend in labor and had taken his clothes for greater warmth. When Blepyrus described the decision of the assembly, Praxagora expressed great surprise and delight and immediately launched into a detailed list of the revolutionary reforms she intended to carry out. Every conceivable kind of private property—land, money, food, and even husbands and wives—was to be common to all. All cheating, bribery, and lawsuits would disappear, since no one would have to engage in such activities to achieve what he wanted. Robbery, gambling, and the exchange of money would be abolished. Prostitutes would be outlawed so that decent women could have the first fruits of the young men. Upon Blepyrus's protest that complete sexual freedom would result in chaos, Praxagora established the rule that all the youth would first have to satisfy the prior claims of the aged before mating with other young people and that all children would look upon the oldest people in the community as their parents.

Blepyrus, thrilled, looked forward to the prospect of being known as the dictator's husband.

Chremes, also eager to cooperate, began to pack up all his belongings to contribute to the common store, despite the taunts of a skeptical citizen who reminded him that all previous decrees, such as the reduction of the price of salt and the introduction of copper coinage, had failed. But Chremes insisted that the new reform was thoroughgoing and departed for the common feast, leaving the citizen to devise some scheme whereby he, too, might participate without abandoning all his goods.

The first great test of the new society occurred when a young man, about to enter the house of a voluptuous girl, was stopped by an old woman, a veritable hag, who insisted on her prior claim. The young man tried every conceivable stratagem to avoid relations with the aged flat nose, but the old woman stubbornly insisted on her legal rights. At first the young man decided to do without sex altogether, rather than yield to the disgusting hag first, but, finding such renunciation impossible, he at last reluctantly submitted. Before the old woman could get him into her house, an even older and uglier hag appeared on the scene to demand her prior right to him. While he quarreled with her, a third and truly horrendous old woman seized him. He was last seen being carried off by two frightful old hags.

Praxagora's maid, returning from the great banquet, met Blepyrus, who had not yet dined, and regaled him with a frenzied account of the delicious viands that were being served there. Taking some young girls with him, Blepyrus hurried off to gorge himself on rich food and drink.

Critique

Although he had been a writer for most of his life—poet, journalist, historian—Fontane did not begin to write fiction until he had gained a thorough knowledge of Prussian society. He was sixty when he completed his first novel, seventy-five when he wrote Effi Briest. His main subject was the human being entangled in a net of strict rules and principles of a society which felt secure in a Prussia stabilized by the "Iron Chancellor," Bismarck. Fontane did not raise a warning pedagogical finger when he described the merciless destruction of human happiness by the rigid rules of that society. He merely introduced his characters and left judgment to his readers. When, after the tragic death of Effi Briest, Effi's mother asks whether they might have done something wrong, the father waves the question aside because it is useless to discuss it. Fontane initiated in Germany the modern realistic novel, and in describing him the term "psychological novel" appears for the first time in German literature. The tragic tale of Effi Briest remains a perennial reprint favorite of German publishers.

The Story

Effi Briest was sixteen years old when her mother cheerfully announced that Baron von Innstetten had asked for her hand in marriage. Effi had seen Innstetten only once, but she knew he had vainly tried to marry her mother years before. When Baron von Innstetten was absent for a long period, her mother had married Effi's father, at the time a match with Ritterschaftsrat von Briest had seemed too good an opportunity to forego. Innstetten was now a government official with a promising future.

Half an hour before, Effi had been sitting on a swing enjoying a happy childhood. Suddenly she was a bride to be. The situation seemed to her a new and welcome experience. In a few weeks she would be the wife of an important government official.

After the excitement of preparations, the wedding, and a honeymoon trip to Italy, the couple arrived in Kessin, a small town on the Baltic Sea. At first the completely new surroundings were interesting for Effi, but soon she felt ill at ease in the house. It was a strange house, formerly owned by a seafaring captain, his relics and souvenirs gave the place a bizarre character. A stuffed shark, stories about the captain's mysterious Chinese servant, and a mentally ill maidservant, who sat in the kitchen with a black chicken on her shoulder, brought nightmares to Effi, and she claimed that she heard noises in an unoccupied upstairs room. Considerate toward his young wife, Innstetten never failed to show his devotion, but being a practical-minded man, he paid no attention to Effi's tales of supernatural happenings in the house. He was convinced that his wife's childish imagination would soon return to normal.

The obligatory social visits to the local aristocracy revealed to Effi that she would not have friends in their circle. At first her only friend was the town apothecary. Her second friend was Roswitha, her maid, whom she met in the graveyard where the girl was bemoaning the loss of her former mistress. Effi was pregnant and needed a maid. Learning that Roswitha was Catholic, she was convinced Roswitha's faith would conquer the ghostlike noises in the house. Roswitha never heard ghosts and her straightforward manner was a relief from the formal stiffness of Effi's social world. The birth of a daughter, Annie, gave Effi new activities, but her boredom with Kessin continued.

The new military commander in Kessin, Major von Crampas, was another addition to Effi's social world. The major's carefree behavior and witty conversation were quite a contrast to the well disciplined and formal Innstetten, but both men respected each other and became friends. Visits to the Innstetten home, horseback riding along the seashore, and participation in community plays brought Effi and Crampas closer together. Effi, realizing the danger of this situation, made efforts to avoid him. During a sleighride Crampas overstepped the boundaries of their friendship.

One day Innstetten informed Effi that he had been promoted to a new post in a Berlin Ministry, a position which would take them to Berlin. Effi was happy to leave the strange house, the boring people, and above all to be separated from Crampas, for their relationship, although a well kept secret, burdened her conscience increasingly. Innstetten, seeing Effi's great joy when he told her about the transfer to Berlin, felt guilty for not having considered leaving the disliked house sooner.

In Berlin, Innstetten made a special effort to have a cheerful house and an enjoyable social life. Though Innstetten's duties at the Ministry kept them from spending much time together, the years in Berlin were happy ones until Effi went to the Rhine country for recuperation after an illness. Meanwhile, Innstetten and Annie remained in Berlin. One day Annie fell on a stairway and cut her forehead, and Roswitha searched through Effi's belongings to find a bandage. Innstetten, trying to restore order in Effi's room, found a bundle of love letters from Crampas, written six years before. Innstetten did what he considered his duty regardless of his personal feelings. He called a friend to make the necessary arrangements for a duel with Crampas. Although his friend pointed out that the letters were more than six years old, Innstetten, who would have preferred to pardon Effi, decided to go through with the duel because he felt that the insult to his honor had not been diminished by time. In the duel, fought near Kessin, Crampas was shot fatally.

At the time Effi was still in the Rhine country waiting for Innstetten's letters, which used to arrive punctually every day. Instead, a letter from her mother informed her of the duel and of pending divorce. Annie was put in the custody of Innstetten. The Bries family was willing to assist Effi financially but her conduct had made it impossible for her to return home. Heartbroken, she went back to Berlin and lived in a small apartment. As quickly as she had changed years ago from a child into a woman, she now became a social outcast. Only Roswitha remained faithful to her.

Effi's health declined rapidly. Once she accidentally saw Annie leaving school, but she avoided meeting the child. Finally, moved by a desire to see her daughter again, Effi asked for permission legally to have Annie visit her. When Annie arrived at the apartment, however, she gave only well rehearsed and evasive answers. Discouraged, Effi sent the child home without the hope of seeing her again. Soon after this incident Effi's health became extremely poor and the family doctor reported her condition to her parents, hinting that their continued rejection could mean her death. Her health improved when she was finally permitted to return home. Aside from her parents and the local minister, however, there was nobody for Effi to speak to. Roswitha, concerned for her mistress', loneliness, wrote to Innstetten asking him to give Effi the family dog. Innstetten was glad to fulfill her desire. His career in the Ministry had been extremely successful, but no promotion would lessen the pain in his heart; he still loved his former wife.

After a beautiful summer at her parents' home, Effi died. In her last conversation with her mother she asked Frau von Brest to tell Innstetten that he had done the only correct thing possible for him. She wanted to die as Effi Brest, for she had not honored her married name.

Critique

Although written late in the author's career, Elective Affinities (Die Wahlverwandtschaften) illustrates some of the romantic tendencies usually found in Goethe's earlier works. The emotionalism of Edward, the quasi-scientific theme, and the poetically fitting (if unrealistic) deaths are examples of the romantic elements. At the same time, it is only fair to classify the novel as a philosophical piece of fiction. The human relationships (both the actual and the symbolic), the passages discussing education and pedagogical techniques, and the comments found in the passages taken from Ottilie's fictional diary all contribute to the philosophical effect. Elective Affinities is a novel in which psychological actions and reactions are important, while of physical action there is so little that one can almost say there is none, just as there is almost no plot as ordinarily defined.

The Story

Edward, a wealthy nobleman, had long been in love with Charlotte, but each had been forced to wed someone else. Both their first spouses died before many years elapsed, and soon afterward Edward and Charlotte were married. With Charlotte's daughter Luciana placed in a good school, the pair, happily married at last, settled down to an idyllic existence at Edward's rural castle. They spent their time working at pleasant tasks about the castle and its park, leading together the kind of life they had long dreamed about and hoped for.

But one day a letter came to threaten the happy couple. The Captain, long a friend of Edward, was out of a position. Edward immediately suggested that his friend be invited to the castle, where he could help in improving the grounds and buildings. At first Charlotte withheld her consent, but finally she agreed to her husband's earnest desire. She revealed that she, too, had thought of inviting someone to the castle, the daughter of a dead friend. Charlotte had taken the girl, Ottilie, as her protégée because of her friendship for the girl's mother. Ottilie, who was at school with Luciana, was not immediately invited for the visit Charlotte planned

When the Captain arrived, as he did shortly, his presence soon made marked differences in the household. In order that he and Edward might work together undisturbed and with greater convenience, Edward moved from the wing in which Charlotte's rooms were located to the wing in which the Captain had been placed, and Charlotte saw less and less of her husband. One evening the three read about the elective affinities of chemical elements and fell to speculating on how people were also attracted to one another in different combinations and in varying degrees. The invitation to Ottlie was again discussed. Since the girl was not doing well in school, and because Charlotte obviously needed additional companionship, Ottlie was immediately sent for.

When Edward had seen the girl and been in her company on previous occasions, Ottlie had made no impression on him. Seeing her in the same household, however, he soon became aware of her attractiveness. It became obvious, too, that Ottlie found Edward attractive. The two fitted together strangely well. When they played duets, Ottlie's very mistakes coincided with Edward's. Gradually, as the two spent more and more time together, Charlotte and the Captain often found themselves together, too, much to their delight. After some weeks had passed, Edward realized the extent of his passion and his influence on Ottlie, all of which made him rejoice. Recognizing the force of his passion, he made efforts to cause it to grow, as it did steadily and swiftly. Although Charlotte noticed the attentions he paid the girl, she refused to become upset by them, since she had discovered her own regard for the Captain, she could more easily overlook her husband's behavior.

One day, while Charlotte and the Captain were out boating, their passion for each other could no longer be concealed.

Being mature people, however, they immediately controlled their emotions and resolved, after a few kisses, to adhere strictly to the moral path in their conduct. Also, during one of their periods together, Ottlie and Edward discovered their love for each other. Being more easily swayed and emotionally immature, they welcomed the passion and did not try to curb their emotions.

While the relationships among the four were developing, more guests came to the castle. They were a countess and a baron who were spending a vacation as lover and mistress while away from their respective spouses. On the night of their arrival, Edward showed the baron the way to the countess' rooms, that the lovers might be together. While wishing he could enter Ottlie's room with the same freedom as the baron had entered that of his mistress, Edward found himself at his wife's door. He knocked and was admitted. He remained the night with Charlotte, but when he and his wife embraced they did not think of each other, but of Ottlie and the Captain.

The four people had all been working on plans for improving the grounds of the castle, with the hope, especially on Edward's part, that everything might be finished in time for Ottlie's birthday. On the day of the birthday celebration Edward made a public spectacle of himself, proving almost a fool in his ardor for Ottlie. Finally, Charlotte suggested that Ottlie be returned to school or sent to live with other friends. Edward, angry and frustrated in his love, left the castle. When he left he vowed he would have nothing more to do with Ottlie, as Charlotte wished, so long as the girl remained. On the same day the Captain, who had received a position which promoted him to the rank of major, also left the castle.

Shortly after Edward's departure, Charlotte, discovering that she was pregnant as the result of the night her husband had spent in her apartments, called on the services of Herr Mittler, a volun-

ceer marriage counselor But Herr Mittler was unable even to begin a reconciliation with Edward, whose passion for Otilie had conquered him completely Having been accustomed all his life to doing as he pleased, Edward could not see why he should not have his way in this matter When war broke out, he entered the king's service He served gallantly and won many honors He believed that if he lived through the war he was fated to have Otilie

Charlotte, meanwhile, endured her pregnancy, but she and Otilie were no longer so close to each other, for the younger woman had become suspicious of Charlotte For a time life at the castle was enlivened when Luciana arrived for a visit with a large party of her friends During the entertainment of the visit, Luciana pointedly left Otilie out of the activities arranged for the guests

Otilie's friend during the trying weeks after Edward had gone was a young architect hired to supervise the building of a summerhouse His work completed, Charlotte had kept him on to redecorate the local church The young man admired Otilie very much A young schoolmaster who had taught Otilie also expressed interest in marrying the girl, but Otilie could think only of Edward

At last a son was born to Charlotte At the christening Otilie and Herr Mittler, who stood as sponsors for the baby, were surprised to note how much the infant resembled both Otilie and the Captain, a resemblance soon noted by others Charlotte, remembering how she had dreamed of the Captain while embracing her husband, guessed that Edward had been dreaming at the same time of Otilie In a sense the child, named Otto, was a symbol of the parents' double adultery

Edward returned to a nearby farm when the war ended Meeting the Captain, he made a proposal to solve every one's problems He suggested that he and Charlotte be divorced, so that he could marry Otilie and Charlotte could marry the Captain Although the ethics of the plan did not appeal to him, the Captain agreed to take the suggestion to Charlotte When the Captain set out for the castle, Edward also visited the grounds in hopes of seeing Otilie They met, and Otilie was much upset, so much so that while returning to the castle alone in a small boat she dropped Charlotte's baby overboard The child was drowned When the Captain arrived at the castle, Charlotte showed him the little corpse that was a miniature of himself

Otilie decided to go away Edward meeting her at an inn, persuaded her to return to the castle with him There the four—Edward, Charlotte, Otilie, and the Captain—tried to resume the happy life they had known before But Otilie seldom spoke and ate her meals in her rooms One day she died suddenly, having starved herself to death It came out that Nanny, her little protégée, had been persuaded to eat the food intended for Otilie Edward also began a fast When he died a short time later, although not as the result of his fasting, he was laid in a tomb beside the girl he had loved In death for one, in life for the other, the two couples were finally united

William Carleton's fiction is best known for his realistic pictures of Irish peasant life during the nineteenth century, and The Emigrants of Ahadarra is one of his best novels in this respect. The most noteworthy sections are the chapters describing such things as a "kemp" (a spinning contest among the peasant women), a country funeral, an election, and illegal distillation of whiskey. While his treatment of these matters is outstanding, the entire novel is filled with specific and colorful details of peasant life. The speech of the people, the homes they live in, the farm routine, landlord-peasant relations, whiskey smuggling, the character of the people—all these are related with a view to giving the reader a true picture of rural Irish life a century ago. Although Carleton's fiction is now little read, it deserves attention from the student of the novel as an example of early realism well done.

The Story

Hycy Burke was the son of a well-to-do and respected peasant who had allowed his wife, a woman with social pretensions of her own, to spoil the young man, and Hycy, with his mother's approval, had become a dissolute young man. Because his father, Jemmy Burke, tried to curb him, Hycy entered into partnership with whiskey smugglers to supplement the diminished allowance from his father.

When one of the prettiest girls in the area, Kathleen Cavanagh, caught Hycy's eye, he determined to seduce her. Unfortunately for his plans, he misdirected two letters—one, intended for Kathleen, went to Bryan M'Mahon, who truly loved the girl, another, intended for young M'Mahon, went to Kathleen. Later, publicly snubbed on more than one occasion, Hycy resolved to have revenge on the girl and her true admirer. Any additional villainy could scarcely put him in greater danger, for he had already been an accomplice to burglarizing his father's house, taking a large sum of money, as well as an active accomplice of smugglers. It was through his fellow smugglers that he planned to get his revenge. At the time there was a law in Ireland which required the inhabitants of a township to pay fines for illegal distillation and smuggling of whiskey if the actual culprits were not known. Bryan M'Mahon's farm at Ahadarra covered an entire township; if he were required to pay such a fine by himself, he would be ruined. To carry out his plan, Hycy tried to get the help of the nephew of the local gauger. Hycy promised the exciseman's nephew the chance to lease a fine farm if the latter would press Hycy's suit for his sister's hand. The farm, of course, was Bryan M'Mahon's.

Bryan was not the only member of his family facing tragedy. Both his and his father's farm leases had run out, and death had prevented the absentee landlord from renewing them. The new landlord—a well-meaning but weak and inexperienced young man, was ruled by his agent, who wished to see the M'Mahons lose their farms, leased by the family for generations.

Hycy carefully made his plans. What he failed to realize, however, was that he had made enemies while Bryan had made friends, so that some persons who knew of his villainy were prepared to take measures to thwart him. In his father's house was Nanny Peety, a pretty, virtuous beggar girl who resented Hycy's attempts to seduce her. She knew something of his plans and she had been a witness to the burglary Hycy and his accomplice had committed Nanny Peety's aunt, Kate Hogan, loved her niece and thought highly of Kathleen Cavanagh. She was willing to help them and could because she was married to one of Hycy's smuggling associates. Also friendly to Kathleen and Bryan was Patrick O'Finigan, the drunken master of the local hedge school.

The plot against Bryan was put into operation when Hycy's anonymous letter sent the gauger to discover the illicit still at Ahadarra, on Bryan's farm. Faced with financial ruin and his family's loss of their leases, the young peasant did not know what to do. Because his own honesty kept him from believing that Hycy was working against him in that manner, Bryan even took advice from the man who was bent on ruining him. Before long he found himself worse off by his taking that advice. A parliamentary election was about to take place, in which the M'Mahons' landlord was standing for a seat. The voting turned out to be a tie until Bryan, angry with his landlord and following Hycy's advice, voted for his landlord's opponent. By doing so he made himself appear false in everyone's eyes, for his landlord was a liberal who favored the Irish peasantry and religious freedom, while the opponent was a conservative who worked against the peasants and the Roman Catholic Church.

When Hycy sent another letter enclosing a fifty pound note, it looked as if

Bryan had accepted a bribe for his vote. The evidence was so damning that even Kathleen, who loved Bryan sincerely, was forced to believe him guilty. Faced with calamity and disfavor in his community, Bryan and his family planned, like so many unfortunate Irish at the time, to emigrate to America in order to start a new and more successful life.

But Bryan's friends began to work for him. Kate Hogan, displeased at Hycy's treatment of her niece and the troubles facing Kathleen when she lost her fiancé, began investigating Hycy's activities. She, Patrick O'Finigan, Nanny Peety's father, and others gathered additional information and presented it to the magistrates with demands for a hearing. At the hearing it was proved that Hycy had robbed his father, had been an accomplice of the whiskey smugglers, had placed the still at Ahadarra to incriminate Bryan, had plotted to make his victim appear to have taken a bribe, and had also become a counterfeiter. Confronted with these proofs, Jimmy Burke gave his son two hundred pounds to leave the country and stay away. Hycy's accomplices were arrested, convicted, and transported as criminals from Ireland, thus becoming the "emigrants" of Ahadarra. Cleared of all charges, Bryan resumed his rightful place in the community and in the affections of Kathleen.

First published 1762

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU, in the role of tutor

ÉMILE, a French orphan, healthy and intelligent

SOPHIE, a wellborn, warm hearted young woman

Rousseau's treatise on education—a novel in name only—is addressed to mothers in the hope that, as a result of learning Rousseau's ideas on education, they will permit their children to develop naturally without letting them be crushed by social conditions. Children cannot be left to themselves from birth because the world as it is would turn them into beasts. The problem is to educate a child in the midst of society in such a manner that society does not spoil him.

Rousseau argues that education comes from nature, from men, and from things. The education from men and from things must be controlled so that habits conformable to nature will develop. Children have natural tendencies which should be encouraged, for nature intends children to be adults, the aim of education, according to Rousseau, is to make a boy a man. Yet by swaddling children, by turning them over to wet nurses, and by punishing them for not doing what is said to be their duty, parents turn children from natural ways of acting and spoil them for life.

Rousseau insists that the proper way to bring up a child is to begin by having the mother nurse the child and the father train him. But if substitutes must be found, a wet nurse of good disposition who was lately a mother should be selected, and a young tutor should be chosen, preferably one with the qualities of Rousseau.

In order to explain his theory of education, Rousseau refers to an imaginary pupil, Émile. The child should come from France, since inhabitants of temperate zones are more adaptable and more intelligent than those from other climates. He should be from a wealthy family, since the poor are educated by life itself, and he should be an orphan in order to allow Rousseau free range as tutor. Finally, he should be healthy in body and mind.

Rousseau recommends a predominantly vegetable diet, particularly for the nurse, since the milk would be better if meat were not eaten. The tutor should see to it that the child is taken out to breathe the fresh air of the country, and, if possible, the family should live in the country. "Men are devoured by our towns."

The child should become accustomed to frequent baths, but he should not be softened by warm water or by other pampering which destroys his natural vigor.

The child should not be allowed to fall into habits other than that of having no habits. He should not have regular meal times or bedtimes, and as far as possible he should be free to act as he chooses. He may injure himself or become ill, but it is better for him to learn how to live naturally than to become a weak and artificial adult.

"The natural man is interested in all new things," wrote Rousseau, and he urged that the child be introduced to new things in such a way that he would not be encouraged to fear whatever is not naturally fearful. He offers, as an example of the proper kind of education in this respect, an account of what he would do to keep Émile from becoming afraid of masks. He would begin with a pleasant mask and then proceed to less pleasing and, finally, to hideous ones, all the while laughing at each mask and trying it on different persons. Similarly, to accustom Émile to the sound of a gun, Rousseau would start with a small charge so that Émile would be fascinated by the sudden flash, then proceed to greater charges until Émile could tolerate even large explosions.

Rousseau maintained that cries and tears are the child's natural expression of his needs. The child should not be thwarted, for he has no other way of learning to live in the world, and education begins with birth. On the other hand, he should not become the master of the house, demanding obedience from his parents.

It was Rousseau's conviction that children must be given more liberty to do things for themselves so that they will demand less of others. A natural advantage of the child's limited strength is that he cannot do much damage even when he uses his power freely. A child will learn to speak correctly, to read and write, if it is to his advantage to do so, threats and coercion only hinder him.

Speaking of a mode of education which burdens a child with restrictions and is, at the same time, overprotective, Rousseau wrote, "Even if I considered that education was wise in its aims, how could I view without indignation those poor wretches subjected to an intolerable slavery and condemned like galley slaves to endless toil ? The age of harmless mirth is spent in tears, punishments, threats, and slavery. You torment the poor thing for his good, you fail to see that you are calling Death to snatch him from these gloomy surroundings." Instead of torturing children with excessive care, one should love them, laugh with them, send them out into the meadows, and play with them.

"When our natural tendencies have not been interfered with by human prejudice and human institutions, the happiness alike of children and men consists in the enjoyment of their liberty." Here the principle behind Rousseau's theory of education becomes clear. The effort of the tutor or the parent is so to educate the child in such fashion that he will learn through his own efforts to be as free as possible within society. If he is educated by rules and threats he becomes a slave, and once free he seeks to enslave others. The most satisfactory general rule of education, Rousseau argued, is to do exactly the opposite of what is usually done.

Since the child is supposed to learn through his own experience, misdeeds should be punished only by arranging matters so that the child comes to experience the natural consequences of what he has done. If there is any rule which can be used as a moral injunction, it would be, "Never hurt anybody"; only trouble comes from urging children or men to do good to others.

Rousseau rejected the use of tales and fables for children. An amusing analysis illustrates his conviction that even the simplest fable, such as "The Fox and the Crow," strikes the child as ridiculous and puzzling and encourages him to use language carelessly and to behave foolishly.

After the child has reached adolescence, the education of his intellect should begin. Prior to this time the concern of the tutor was to give Émile the freedom to learn the natural limits of his powers. Now he teaches Émile by showing him the natural advantages of the use of the intellect. The tutor answers questions, but just enough to make the child curious. His explanations are always in language the child can understand, and he encourages the child to solve his own problems and to make his own investigations. Interest should lead the child to increase his experience and knowledge; it is a mistake to demand that he learn. Jean Jacques, as the tutor, shows Émile the value of astronomy by gently encouraging him to use the knowledge that he has in order to find his way out of the woods.

Rousseau's accounts of his efforts to teach Émile owe some of their charm to the author's willingness to show himself unsuccessful in some of his efforts. Nevertheless, the pupil Émile never becomes a distinctive character; Émile is merely a child symbol, just as later in the book Sophie is, even as the author indicates, a woman symbol devised to enable Rousseau to discuss marriage problems.

By the time Émile is fifteen he has gained a considerable amount of practical and scientific knowledge; he can handle tools of all sorts, and he knows he will have to find some trade as his life's work. In Book IV of Émile, Rousseau discusses the most difficult kind of education: moral education, the study of the self in relation to other men.

Rousseau presents three maxims which sum up his ideas concerning human sympathy, the foundation of moral virtue:

First Maxim—It is not in human nature to put ourselves in the place of those who are happier than ourselves, but only in the place of those who can claim our pity.

Second Maxim—We never pity another's woes unless we know we may suffer in like manner ourselves.

Third Maxim—The pity we feel for others is proportionate, not to the amount of the evil, but to the feelings we attribute to the sufferers

These maxims fortify the tutor, but they are not imparted to Émile. The youth is gradually made aware of the suffering of individuals, his experience is broadened, and he comes to know through personal experience the consequences of various kinds of acts. The important thing is to turn his affections to others.

Émile is given insight concerning religious matters by hearing a long discourse by 'a Savoyard priest' who tells of the difficult passage from doubt to faith. He affirms man's natural goodness and the reliability of conscience when uncontaminated by philosophers or by mere convention.

Sophie, "or Woman," is introduced in Book V, since Émile must have a helpmate. Rousseau begins curiously by saying 'But for her sex a woman is a man' but when he considers her education it is apparent that sex makes quite a difference. Woman need not be given as many reasons as man, and she can get along with less intellect, but she must have courage and virtue. Rousseau offers a great deal of advice, even concerning Sophie's refusal of Émile's first attempt to share her bed. The book closes, after a charming digression on travel, with Émile's announcement that he is about to become a father and that he will undertake the education of his child following the example of his beloved tutor.

Émile is as full of good humor as it is of good advice. Rousseau pursued an educational philosophy which is, on the whole, humane and sensible. He desired to make the child neither a noble savage nor a cultivated gentleman, but a man living fearlessly and forthrightly according to impulses and abilities which were naturally his. Although Rousseau's psychology is sometimes naive, it is seldom far from the modern view and that, if anything, is a compliment to the modern view.

This play, romantic though it now seems, was one of the first tragedies which broke from strict adherence to the French neo-classic unities. The best tragedy of Lessing's small group of plays, Emilia Galotti takes its theme from classical antiquity, the story of the innocent maiden who dies at the hand of her father in order to prevent the loss of her chastity. A drama of middle class life, the work is also a problem play, with revolt from the tyranny of the aristocracy presenting in interesting development an underlying social theme.

The Story

Prince Hettore Gonzaga, once happily in love with and loved in return by Countess Orsina, had unhappily fallen in love with Emilia Galotti. She, the daughter of a soldier who resisted the conquest of Sabionetta by the prince, was to be married to Count Appiani, of the neighboring principality of Piedmont. This desirable union of a nobleman and a beautiful, middle class woman was the result of her mother's studied plan.

The treacherous Marquis Marnelli proposed that the prince retire to his palace at Dosalo after sending Count Appiani on a mission to the Princess of Massa, soon to be the prince's bride. The absence of her betrothed would leave Emilia open to the designs of the prince. Motivated by lechery, the ruler eagerly agreed to this plan.

Odoardo Galotti, having readied his villa at Sabionetta in preparation for the wedding, returned to his wife in Guastalla in order to accompany the bridal party. A young assassin garnered from a family servant all these facts so that he could plan the abduction of Emilia, who, pursued by the prince, had just returned from church. This action of Prince Hettore's the honest patriot father or the independent husband to be would have avenged, but the unsophisticated Emilia did not know how to treat the prince's lustful behavior.

Count Appiani, disturbed by presentiments of evil, rejected the prince's proposal to send him off on his wedding day, and he was killed for his temerity when the bridal party was attacked.

Closely guarded, Emilia was taken to the palace under pretense of a rescue from brigands. There the prince, playing the gallant, allayed the fears of Emilia by apologizing for his former behavior and promising to escort her to her mother Claudia, in the meantime, had been made frantic by separation from her daughter, and, hysterical over the death of Count Appiani, she accused Marnelli of plotting this deed of treachery and violence.

The prince, now beset by a hysterical mother and a swooning young woman whom he desperately desired, had not reckoned with the wrath of a rejected mistress as well. The Countess Orsina, whose spies had uncovered all the prince's guilty secrets, arrived at the palace in Dosalo and, failing in an attempt at blackmail, revealed Prince Hettore's guilt to Odoardo Galotti when he came in haste and unarmed to the aid of his daughter and wife. The countess, determined to have revenge on her former lover, gave Galotti the dagger she had intended to use on the prince. Galotti insisted on his rights as a father to take his daughter to her home, but his petition was denied by the crafty Marnelli. Meanwhile, the prince, unaware of Galotti's knowledge and purpose, tried to appear as a benefactor who would see justice done in the courts. Until that time, however, he would keep Emilia apart for security's sake. To this arrangement Galotti seemed to agree, ironically commenting on each provision of treachery as it was proposed.

When the anxious father was finally allowed to see his daughter, she told her fears that her virtue might yield where force could never prevail, the arts of seduction being so brilliantly practiced in Prince Hettore's court. To protect her innocence, Galotti stabbed Emilia, presented her body to the lustful prince, threw the dagger at his feet, and went off to give himself up to the authorities.

Though possibly controversial, the biographical writings of Lytton Strachey are never dull and when they address themselves to the Victorian Period they possess a special interest. For the biographer himself was a product of that period, and his feelings about it, while mixed, were far from being vague or uncertain. The Age of Victoria both fascinated and repelled him, he loved it while he hated it. Even though its pretentiousness exasperated the artist in Strachey, he could not help acknowledging its solidity and force, as manifested in many outstanding scientists and men of action.

Four such people, including one woman are his subjects in Eminent Victorians. Not the greatest of their time, these four yet belong among the most appropriate of its decorations. Superficially diverse in their activities, they include an ecclesiastic, a woman of action, an educational authority, and a man of adventure. As drawn by their biographer, they provide a striking illustration of the many faceted era in which they lived and worked.

This quartet of portraits proved to be a critical and financial success. It became the cornerstone in an increasingly solid career, and after it appeared, Strachey was no longer in need of assistance from family or friends. Yet his treatment of Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale, Arnold of Rugby, and General Gordon did not go unchallenged. The author was accused of undue severity with his subjects, of handling facts with carelessness and of superficiality in his judgments.

Such indictments derived, in general from people friendly to one or more of the individuals pictured in Eminent Victorians, but not infrequently they were joined by critics of influence and standing.

Some of these critics overlooked the point that Strachey's biographical method aimed at verisimilitude instead of photographic realism. It is true that his determination to rise above mere facts sometimes carried him too far—as far as out right and sometimes outrageous caricature—but the writing remained brilliant and stimulating. The intelligent reader is more likely to be diverted than deceived by his prejudices, for his dislike for such targets as Florence Nightingale and Thomas Arnold is hardly disguised. Whatever charges may be brought against Strachey today, his services to biographical writing are generally admitted: he brought to it good proportion, good style, and colorful realism.

For such talents, the life of Cardinal Manning provides ideal material. But Manning, despite his distinction as a churchman, does not escape a touch of the Strachey lash. He is revealed, this representative of ancient tradition and uncompromising faith, as a survival from the Middle Ages who forced the nineteenth century to accept him for what he was. Practical ability, rather than saintliness or learning, was the key to his onward march. In the Middle Ages, says Strachey, he would have been neither a Francis nor an Aquinas, but he might have been an Innocent.

Very early in his life, Manning's hopes became fixed on a position of power and influence in the world. Upon leaving college he aspired to a political career, but its doors were abruptly closed to him by his father's bankruptcy. Next he tried the Church of England as another, perhaps less promising, avenue to fulfillment. By 1851, already over forty, he had become an archdeacon, but such rank was not enough. For some time his glance had been straying to other pastures; finally, he made the break and became a convert to Roman Catholicism. In the process he lost a friend—a rather important one—named Gladstone.

Thereafter his ecclesiastical career was an almost unbroken series of triumphs and advances. One important asset was the ability to make friends in the right places, especially if one of those places was the Vatican. Brooking no rivals, Manning became the supreme commander of the Roman Church in England, then a cardinal. His magnetism and vigor spread his influence beyond Church boundaries, and at his death crowds of working people thronged the route of his funeral procession. At the end of a long and twisted road, his egoism, fierce ambition, and gift for intrigue accomplished some unexpected rewards, not least among them the regard of the poor.

The second of Strachey's eminent Victorians is Florence Nightingale. Here, in his treatment of one of the most remarkable women of any age, the biographer is conspicuously successful in resisting any urge to be gallant. What her friends called calm persuasiveness, he characterized as demoniac fury; it is clear that to him the "Lady with a Lamp" might be extremely capable but she was also tiresomely demanding and disagreeable. Nevertheless, his account does disclose the almost miraculous energy and endurance which carried Miss Nightingale past obstacle after obstacle.

For the sake of convenience, Strachey divides the accomplishments of Florence Nightingale into two phases. The first is her dramatic contribution to the welfare of British wounded during the course of the Crimean campaign, the second deals with her unflagging efforts, after the war, to transform the Army Medical Department, revolutionize hospital services, and even to work much needed reform in the War Office itself. These aims dominated her completely in the prosecution of them; she drove her friends ruthlessly, but she used herself with even less mercy. Enduring to the age of ninety, she became a legend, but, ironically and cruelly, her last years brought senility and softness upon her. They also brought, after consciousness had dulled almost into insensibility, the Order of Merit.

Dr. Thomas Arnold is generally considered the father, not only of Matthew Arnold, poet and critic, but of the British public school system as well. Neither of these products inspires Strachey with much respect, and his bias against the doctor is obvious in Eminent Victorians. Dr. Arnold, for instance, was determined to make good Christians, as well as good Englishmen, out of his public school boys, whereas Strachey had little patience for either Christianity or Christian institutions. This fact, incidentally, seems to color his attitude toward all his subjects in Eminent Victorians, since the latter are, without exception, religiously employed or inclined to a very strong degree.

Dr. Arnold's prefectorial system, as he instituted it at Rugby, also meets with strong disapproval. Strachey credits it with two dubious, if unexpected, effects on later English education, the worship of athletics and the worship of good form. To some Victorians, Dr. Arnold may have seemed one of their most influential teachers; to Strachey, he is the apostle of ideas obviously harmful and absurd.

With apparent alacrity, the biographer turns to his fourth and final portrait. It is a long step from the educator to the general, involving as it does the distance between the single-mindedness of Arnold and the maddening inconsistencies of Gordon. For Charles George Gordon is unveiled as a mass of contradictions whom no biographer could ever hope completely to unravel. A mischievous, unpredictable boy, he developed into an undisciplined, unpredictable man. A romantic legend wove itself about his early, swashbuckling exploits in China and Africa. His deeds were genuinely heroic—no one has ever questioned Gordon's bravery—but they combined oddly with his passion for religion. He was influenced strongly, and to an approximately equal degree, by brandy and the Bible. Inclined, on the whole, to be unsociable, he maintained an icy reserve, except for fits of ungovernable temper vented upon unlucky servants or trembling subordinates.

This is the man who, in his fifties, was chosen by the English government for a delicate African mission. Strangely, considering the qualifications of the man selected, it was not military in its nature, but diplomatic, requiring the utmost in self control, tact, and skill of a negotiator. For General Gordon was to arrange for inglorious evacuation of the Sudan by British forces, a project for which he was disqualified by his opinions, his character, and everything in his life. What followed, not surprisingly, was the tragedy at Khartoum, an episode seldom matched in military annals for the mystery and horror with which it enveloped the fate of the principal actor.

Thus, on a dramatic note, ends the biographer's searching glance at four eminent Victorians. Widely differing in background, vocation, and personality, they illustrate different phases of existence in England of the later nineteenth century. Each is bound to the others, however, by the possession of a restless, questing vitality, and each has left a mark upon his age.

Endymion, or, The Man in the Moon, is undeniably an effete, even trivial play; the plot is singularly inconsequential and artificial, the characters are unreal, the dialogue is pedantic. But Endymion was important historically for these very reasons, in that Lyly was trying to make the drama an art. Writing for the court rather than the populace, Lyly replaced the earthiness and crudity of earlier English plays with refinement and polish, thereby setting new standards which later dramatists, including Shakespeare, were to emulate.

The Story

To his friend Eumenides, Endymion declared his love for Cynthia, goddess of the moon Eumenides chided Endymion, reminding him of the moon's inconstancy, whereupon Endymion extolled inconstancy and change as virtues, attributes of everything beautiful. Convinced that Endymion was bewitched, Eumenides prescribed sleep and rest for the love sick swain, but Endymion rejected the advice and berated his friend.

In hopes of misleading his friends, Endymion had also professed love for Tellus, a goddess of the earth. Enraged by his apparent perfidy, Tellus swore to take revenge. Since she still loved Endymion, Tellus was unwilling for him to die, therefore she resolved to resort to magic and witchcraft in order to awaken his love for her. Her friend Floscula warned that love inspired by witchcraft would be bitter, but Tellus ignored the warning and left to consult Dipsas, an enchantress.

In contrast to Endymion and Tellus, Sir Tophas habitually scoffed at love and dedicated his life to war—against black birds, mallards, and wrens. When mocked by Endymion's and Eumenides' pages, Dares and Samias, Sir Tophas swore to kill them, but pardoned them when they explained that they had been speaking in Latin.

Meanwhile, Tellus had found Dipsas, whom she consulted about the possibility of killing Endymion's love for Cynthia and supplanting it by magic with love for the earth goddess herself. Dipsas declared that since she was not a deity, she could only weaken love, never kill it. At Tellus' request Dipsas agreed to enchant Endymion in such a way that his protestations of love for Cynthia would be doubted. Accompanied by Floscula and Dipsas, Tellus confronted Endymion in a garden and tried to make him confess his love for Cynthia. Though he admitted that he honored Cynthia above all other women, he insisted that he loved Tellus.

Later, the two pages, Dares and Samias, strolled in the gardens with their own lady loves, whom they had shown Endymion and Eumenides in the act of moonning over their loves. As a jest, Dares and Samias asked the two girls to feign love for Sir Tophas, who, as usual, was playing at warfare in the gardens. The girls complied, but Sir Tophas, ignoring them, reiterated his contempt for love and his passion for war.

Still later, Dipsas came upon Endymion asleep in a grove. Assisted by Bagoa, her servant, Dipsas spelled Endymion into a sleep from which he would not awake until he was old and gray. In a dream, three women appeared to Endymion, and one of them started to stab him. She desisted at the importuning of the third, peered into a looking glass, and threw down her knife. At this moment an old man appeared carrying a book which contained only three pages. Endymion refused to read the book until the man had torn up two of the pages.

When informed of Endymion's mysterious slumber, Cynthia agreed with Eumenides that the sages of the world should be consulted about a remedy. Also, angered by the impertinence of Tellus, Cynthia made her a prisoner in Corsites' palace, where she was to weave tapestries depicting stories of people who had been punished for their long tongues.

On the way to Thessaly, where Cynthia was sending him to seek a cure for Endymion, Eumenides met Geron, an old hermit. Geron said that Eumenides, if he were a faithful lover, could learn the cure from a magic fountain nearby. Since Eumenides had always been true to Semele, the fountain promised to grant any single wish he might make. Although tempted to wish that his love for Semele might be requited, dutifully he asked for a cure for his friend. The fountain answered that the cure was a kiss from Cynthia.

In the meantime Tellus, slowly pining away in prison, promised Corsites, her jailer and suitor, that she would marry if he could perform the impossible task of bringing Endymion to a cave, where she might see him once more. Corsites undertook this task but was himself

pinched into a slumber by faeries guarding Endymion's body

And so Cynthia found two sleeping men when she came to the grove accompanied by wise men who she hoped would wake Endymion. But the sages succeeded in waking only Corsites, who freely confessed his love for Tellus and what he had dared to do, inspired by that love.

At last Eumenides returned and persuaded Cynthia to attempt the cure. And so, upon her kiss, Endymion awoke. But his forty year slumber had withered him; he was so senile that he could not stand. At Cynthia's request, however, he related his strange dream, explaining that in the book which the old man had given him to read, he saw Cynthia being attacked by beasts of ingratitude, treachery, and envy. Cynthia promised to listen later to a fuller account of this vision.

A short time later Bagoa disclosed that Tellus and Dipsas had been responsible for enchanting Endymion. For her pains Bagoa was transformed into an aspen tree by Dipsas.

Cynthia, however, was more lenient than Dipsas. Learning that Tellus had been motivated by unrequited love, Cynthia forgave her and gave her to Corsites as his wife. Dipsas, too, was pardoned on condition that she would be reunited with Geron, her husband, whom she had sent away many years ago. This reunion displeased Sir Tophas, who had discarded his armor out of love for Dipsas; he was content, however, when Cynthia disenchanted Bagoa and gave her to Tophas as his wife. To Eumenides she promised Semele, but Semele objected on the grounds that Eumenides had not asked for her at the magic fountain. She was placated, however, when Geion explained that Eumenides would not have learned the fountain's secret had he not been faithful.

Most important, Cynthia restored the youth of Endymion and bade him persevere in his love.

AN ENQUIRY CONCERNING HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

Type of work Philosophical treatise

Author David Hume (1711-1776)

First published 1748

"Philosophical decisions," says Hume toward the end of his Enquiry, "are nothing but the reflections of common life, methodised and corrected." This simple, homely epigram conceals a great deal. For one thing, the Enquiry is actually a sort of popularized revision of ideas that were systematically developed in Book I of his precocious Treatise of Human Nature (1739-1740), which, although it was completed before the author was twenty-five, has been characterized as one of the most profound, thoroughly reasoned, and purely scientific works in the history of philosophy. Secondly, Hume's method for correcting the reflections of common life actually involves a thorough attack on the obscurities of metaphysical idealists.

Born in an age of reason, Hume at first shared the optimism of those who were certain that pure reason could unlock the secrets of nature, and as he read Bacon, Newton, Hobbes, and Locke, he longed for fame equal to theirs. But, as he reported in a letter to Sir Gilbert Elliot, though he "began with an anxious search after arguments, to confirm the common opinion, doubts stole in, dissipated, returned, were again dissipated, returned again, and it was a perpetual struggle of restless imagination against inclination, perhaps against reason." That last, "perhaps against reason," is the crucial phrase, for no philosopher before Hume used reason so brilliantly in an attack against the certainties of reason. The twelve essays of the Enquiry reflect his three principal attacks: (1) against rationalism, the doctrine of innate ideas, faith in ontological reasoning and an ordered universe, (2) against empiricism, both the kind that led to Lockian dualism and Berkeleyan idealism, on the ground that neither the physical nor the spiritual can be proved, and (3) against deism, based on universal axioms and the law of causality. It is not surprising that since Hume religions have largely made their appeals to faith rather than to reason.

Considering what remains when such thoroughgoing skepticism rejects so much of the beliefs of rational men, Hume himself readily admitted (in the fourth essay, "Sceptical Doubts Concerning the Operations of the Understanding") that as a man he was quite satisfied with ordinary reasoning processes, but that as a philosopher he had to be skeptical. For reasoning was not based on immediate sense experience. "The most lively thought is still inferior to the dulllest sensation," he asserted in his second essay, "The Origin of Ideas." Unless the mind is "disordered by disease or madness," actual perceptions have the greatest "force and vivacity," and it is only on such matters of basic mental fact rather than on the abstract relations of ideas, as in mathematics, that we must depend for certainties about life. For example, no amount of reasoning could have led Adam in the Garden of Eden to believe that fluid, transparent water would drown him or that bright warm fire would burn him to ashes. "No object ever discovers [reveals], by the qualities which appear to the senses, either the causes which produced it, or the effects which arise from it." In dealing with this idea, Hume is quite dogged and persistent, he backs every argument into a corner, into some "dangerous dilemma." What is more he enjoys himself immensely while doing it—"philosophers that gave themselves airs of superiority and sufficiency, have a hard task when they encounter persons of inquisitive dispositions," he says. Concerning cause and effect, he argues that we expect similar effects from causes that appear similar, yet this relationship does not always exist and, though it is observed, it is not reasoned. Furthermore, it is merely an arbitrary assumption, an act of faith, that events which we remember as having occurred sequentially in the past will continue to do so in the future. Causation thus was merely a belief, and belief he had defined as a "lively idea related to or associated with a present impression."

This seemed to Hume not merely an impractical philosophical idea, but a momentous discovery of great consequence. Since causation was an a priori principle of both natural and moral philosophy, and since causation could not be reasonably demonstrated to be true, a tremendous revolution in human thought was in preparation. Only in the pure realm of ideas, logic, and mathematics, not contingent upon the direct sense awareness of reality, could causation safely (because arbitrarily) be applied—all other sciences are reduced to probability. The concluding essay, "Of the Academical or Sceptical Philosophy," reaches grand heights of eloquence, when Hume argues that a priori reasoning can make anything appear to produce anything "the falling of a pebble may, for aught we know, extinguish the sun, or the wish of a man control the planets in their orbits."

When we run over libraries, persuaded of these principles, what havoc must we make? If we take in hand any volume of divinity or school metaphysics, for instance let us ask: Does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or number? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact and existence? No. Commit it then to the flames for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion.

The polemic vigor of the essays stems in large part from the bitter experiences Hume had in the years immediately preceding the publication of the Enquiry. In 1744 he had sought to fill a vacancy in the chair of Ethics and Pneumatical Philosophy at Edinburgh University, but to his astonishment his Treatise was invoked to prevent the appointment "such a popular clamor has been raised against me in Edinburgh, on account of Scepticism, Heterodoxy, and other hard names that my Friends find some Difficulty in working out the Point of my Professorship" Then he was dismissed without full salary as tutor to the mad son of the Marquis of Annandale These experiences helped sharpen the hard cutting edge of his thought and prose style

After refining his conception of reason and its modes of function, Hume applies it to four crucial problems "Liberty and Necessity," "Reason of Animals," "Miracles," and "Particular Providence and a Future State"

Concerning liberty and necessity, Hume argues that since the subject relates to common life and experience (unlike topics such as the origin of worlds or the region of spirits), only ambiguity of language keeps the dispute alive For a clear definition, he suggests that it be consistent with plain matters of fact and with itself Difficulty arises when philosophers approach the problem by examining the faculties of the soul rather than the operations of body and brute matter In the latter, men assume that they perceive cause and effect, but in the functioning of their minds they feel no connection between motive and action However, we cannot invoke the doctrine of cause and effect without, ultimately, tracing all actions—including evil ones—to the Deity whom men refuse to accept as the author of guilt and moral turpitude in all his creatures As a matter of fact, freedom and necessity are matters of momentary emotional feeling "not to be controuled or altered by any philosophical theory or speculation whatsoever"

The "Reason of Animals" consists—as it does in children, philosophers, and mankind in general—not so much in logical inferences as in experience of analogies and sequential actions Observation and experience alone teach a horse the proper height which he can leap or a greyhound how to meet the hare in her tracks with the least expenditure of energy Hume's learning theory here seems to be based on the pleasure pain principle and forms the background for some theories of twentieth century psychology However, Hume ends this essay with a long qualification in which he cites the Instincts unlearned knowledge derived from the original hand of nature, and then adds this curious final comment 'The experimental reasoning itself, which we possess in common with beasts, and on which the whole conduct of life depends, is nothing but a species of instinct or mechanical power, that acts in us unknown to ourselves'

The essay on miracles is perhaps the most spirited of the entire collection and it is the one which Hume expected, correctly, would stir the greatest opposition Nevertheless, he was certain that his argument would be, for the wise and the learned, "an everlasting check to all kinds of superstitious delusion, and consequently useful as long as the world endures" Events can be believed to happen only when they are observed, and all reports of events not directly observed must be believed only to the degree that they conform with probability experimentally or experientially derived A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature, therefore it violates all probability, therefore it is impossible History gives no instance of any miracle personally attended to by a sufficient number of unquestionably honest, educated, intelligent men Despite the surprise, wonder, and other pleasant sensations attendant upon reports of novel experiences, all new discoveries that achieve credibility among men have always resembled in fundamentals those objects and events of which we already have experience The most widespread belief in miracles exists among primitive barbarians Finally, since there is no objective way of confirming miracles, believers have no just basis for rejecting those claimed by all religions "So that, on the whole, we may conclude, that the Christian Religion not only was at first attended with miracles, but even at this day cannot be believed by any reasonable person without one. Mere reason is insufficient to convince us to believe what is most contrary to custom and experience."

In the 1777 posthumous edition of the Enquiry appeared the announcement that these unsystematic essays be alone regarded as containing Hume's philosophical sentiments and principles. Despite the fact that professional philosophers, especially the logical positivists, still prefer the earlier Treatise of Human Nature, it is well that the Enquiry with its livelier style and popular appeal stands as his personal testament. In it he said that he would be "happy if we can undermine the foundations of an abstruse philosophy, which seems to have hitherto served only as a shelter to superstition, and a cover to absurdity and error." The irony is that he succeeded so well in undermining reason that he opened the door to the romanticism of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. But his voice has outlasted that babel and his humanistic skepticism survives. "Be a philosopher," he cautioned himself, "but amidst all your philosophy, be still a man."

The idea of the superman is not a new one. Demigods who overcame great obstacles enjoy a long and honored literary tradition. Achilles, Odysseus, Hercules, Samson, Beowulf, Roland and King Arthur all have epic stature. Earlier than any of these, however, is Gilgamesh, the valiant hero of a Babylonian epic written about four thousand years ago. A figure of heroic proportions, Gilgamesh knew love and conflict, friendship and loyalty, joy and sorrow, courage and fear, and ultimately the horror and mystery of death. Thus the Gilgamesh epic embraces the enduring themes of literature, and its hero remains an enduring affirmation of life in all its transience and mystery.

The Story

Gilgamesh was the wisest, strongest and most handsome of mortals, for he was two-thirds god and one third man. As king of the city state of Uruk he built a monumental wall around the city, but in doing so he overworked the city's inhabitants unmercifully, to the point where they prayed to the gods for relief.

The god Anu listened to their plea and called the goddess Aruru to fashion another demigod like Gilgamesh in order that the two heroes might fight, and thus give Uruk peace. Aruru created the warrior Engidu out of clay and sent him to live among the animals of the hills.

A hunter of Uruk found Engidu and in terror reported his existence to Gilgamesh. Gilgamesh advised the hunter to take a priestess to Engidu's watering place to lure Engidu to the joys of civilization and away from his animal life. The priestess initiated Engidu into civilization with her body, her bread, and her wine. Having forsaken his animal existence, Engidu and the priestess started for Uruk. On their arrival she told him of the strength and wisdom of Gilgamesh and of how Gilgamesh had told the goddess Ninsun about his dreams of meeting Engidu, his equal, in combat.

Engidu challenged Gilgamesh by barring his way to the temple. An earth-shaking fight ensued in which Gilgamesh stopped Engidu's onslaught. Engidu praised Gilgamesh's strength and the two enemies became inseparable friends.

Gilgamesh informed Engidu of his wish to conquer the terrible monster, Khumbaba, and challenged him to go along. Engidu replied that the undertaking was full of peril for both. Gilgamesh answered that Engidu's fear of death deprived him of his might. At last Engidu agreed to go with his friend. Gilgamesh then went to the elders and they, like Engidu, warned him of the perils he would encounter. Seeing his determination, the elders gave him their blessing. Gilgamesh then went to Ninsun and she also warned him of the great dangers, but to no avail. Then she took Engidu aside and told him to give Gilgamesh special protection.

Upon climbing the cedar mountain to reach Khumbaba, Gilgamesh related three terrible dreams to Engidu, who shored up Gilgamesh's spirit by placing a favorable interpretation on them. On reaching the gate to the cedar wood where Khumbaba resided, the pair were stopped by the watchman who possessed seven magic mantles. The two heroes succeeded in overcoming him. Accidentally, Engidu touched the magic portal of the gate, immediately he felt faint and weak, as if afraid of death. The champions entered the cedar wood and with the aid of the sun god slew Khumbaba.

Upon their return to Uruk after their victory, the goddess Ishtar fell in love with Gilgamesh and asked him to be her consort. But Gilgamesh, being wiser than her previous consorts, recalled all of the evil things she had done to her earlier lovers. Ishtar then angrily ascended to heaven and reported his scornful refusal to Anu. Threatening to destroy mankind, she forced Anu to create a monster bull that would kill Gilgamesh.

Anu formed the bull and sent it to Uruk. After it had slain five hundred warriors in two snorts, Engidu jumped on its back while Gilgamesh drove his sword into its neck. Engidu then threw the bull's thighbone in Ishtar's face and Gilgamesh held a feast of victory in his palace.

Engidu, still ailing from touching the portal to the cedar wood, cursed those who had showed him civilization. He related his nightmares to Gilgamesh, grew faint-hearted, and feared death. Since he had been cursed by touching the gate, he died. Gilgamesh mourned his friend six days and nights, on the seventh he left Uruk to cross the steppes in search of Utnapishtim, the mortal who had discovered the secret of life.

Upon reaching the mountain named Mashu, he found scorpion men guarding the entrance to the underground passage. They received him cordially when they learned he was seeking Utnapishtim, but they warned him that no one had ever found a way through the mountain.

Gilgamesh traveled the twelve miles through the mountain in pitch darkness and at last he entered a garden. There he found Siduri, the cup-bearing goddess, who remarked on his haggard condition Gilgamesh explained that his woeful appearance had been caused by the loss of Engidu, and that he sought Utnapishtim. The goddess advised him to live in pleasure at home and warned him of the dangers ahead.

Gilgamesh went on his way, seeking the boatman Ur Shanabi, who might possibly take him across the waters of death. On finding Ur Shanabi's stone coffers, Gilgamesh broke them in anger, but he made up for them by presenting the boatman with huge poles. Ur Shanabi then ferried Gilgamesh across the waters of death.

Utnapishtim, meeting Gilgamesh on the shore, also spoke of his haggard condition. Gilgamesh told him about the loss of Engidu and his own search for the secret of life. Utnapishtim replied that nothing was made to last forever, that life was transient and that death was part of the inevitable process.

Gilgamesh then asked how Utnapishtim had found the secret of eternal life, and Utnapishtim told him the story of the Great Flood.

Utnapishtim had been told in a dream of the gods' plans to flood the land. So he built an ark and put his family and all kinds of animals on it. When the flood came, he and those on the ark survived, and when the flood subsided he found himself on Mount Nisr. After the waters had returned to their normal level, he gave thanks to the gods, and in return the god Ea blessed him and his wife with the secret of life everlasting.

After finishing his story Utnapishtim advised Gilgamesh to return home, but before going he had Ur Shanabi bathe and clothe Gilgamesh in a robe that remained clean as long as he lived. As Gilgamesh was leaving Utnapishtim gave him the secret of life, a magic plant which grew at the bottom of the waters of death. However, as Gilgamesh bathed in a pool on his way home, an evil serpent ate the plant.

On arriving home Gilgamesh went to Ninsun to inquire how he could reach Engidu in the land of the dead. Although Ninsun directed him, he failed in his attempt because he broke some of the taboos that she had laid out for him. Deeply disappointed, he made one final appeal to the god Ea, the lord of the depths of the waters, and Engidu was brought forth. Gilgamesh asked Engidu what happened to one after death, and Engidu laid bare the full terrors of the afterworld. Worms, neglect, and disrespect were the lot of the dead.

EPIGRAMS OF MARTIAL

Type of work Verse epigrams

Author Martial (Marcus Valerius Martialis, c. 40 c. 104)

First transcribed 80 104

The fourteen books of epigrams which were written by Martial during a pivotal period in the history of Rome display a rare form of literary accomplishment, the adoption and complete individual mastery of a literary form by one man. From the time of his arrival at Rome, about the age of twenty three, until his return to his birthplace in Spain, Martial wrote verse epigrams on a wide variety of subjects and in many different styles.

Almost all that we know of Martial we learn from his epigrams, and a great deal of our present knowledge of Rome from the death of Nero, in A.D. 68, until the end of the first century comes from the same source. What Martial tells us is the sort of information that could not, perhaps, be gained in any other way. One of the most common subject areas of Martial's verse is the everyday life of ancient Rome. He took an active part in that life, and it is realistically mirrored in his writings.

There are roughly five other kinds of epigrams that Martial produced. The first of these, probably the most important to him personally, is the epigram written in praise of the emperor or some other man of wealth and power. This type was written largely as a means of subsistence, patronage being the primary system by which poets lived. The contemplative epigrams, usually addressed to friends, show that Martial was realistic almost to the point of cynicism. He reached no great heights of philosophy, wishing only to be comfortable and peaceful. His desire for peace and solitude is expressed in another type of epigram in which he praises life in the country. In these Martial sees the country with the enthusiasm often found in the city dweller, but he did not write pastoral verse; he saw the Italian country side as it really existed. The epigrammatic epitaphs, often written on children, or animals, are among his best work, revealing sentiments that are rare in Martial feeling often leavened by humor. In the epigrams on friendship he comes the closest to real emotion. Romantic love is usually treated satirically, and his discussions of that passion in himself seem devoid of sincere feeling.

Perhaps the chief fault that has been found with his work is found in Martial's personal situation, his toadying to men of position. When he begged the Emperor Domitian, whose name has become synonymous with cruel despotism and wicked licentiousness, for a special position (pleading as the father of three children), for example his epigram has a self abasement that may disgust the modern reader.

Welfare and glory of the earth, while thee
We safe behold, we gods believe to be
If my slight books did e'er thee enter tain,
And oft to read them thou didst not disdain,
What nature does deny, do thou bestow
For father of three children make me go
When my verse takes not, this will be an ease,

A high reward, in case it thee do
please

It is important, however, to understand the position poets held in Rome at that time. Only through patronage, from the emperor if possible, could a poet lead a comfortable life. Everyone who hoped to be looked upon as a gentleman wrote verses, and those who wrote to live were compelled to praise and praise highly in order to be heard. Martial was certainly not alone in this respect. Completely a product of his time, he accepted the necessity to praise great men as a part of the literary milieu in which he lived.

Criticism that may carry more weight today is Martial's lack of poetic vision. He is never profound, seldom lyrically imaginative. His subjects are the people and things around him, and he depicts them as they are. It is this accuracy of portrayal that makes his verse so valuable in understanding his era. Counterbalancing this absence of elevated vision, however, is Martial's technical grasp of the form in which he wrote. Although he did not create the epigram, he is usually considered the first epigrammatist. He adopted the form, wrote exclusively in it, and did with it all that could be done.

The verse epigram customarily has two major parts, the exposition and the conclusion. The parts may vary in length—Martial's epigrams are from two to over thirty verses long—but usually the exposition takes up most of the poem, with the conclusion being short, often containing a sharp twist of meaning. Within this general framework Martial used direct address, questions, brief transition from exposition to conclusion, satire, irony, and sarcasm. Striking exaggerations and sudden surprises are common, as are plays on words and brief aphorisms. Rhetorical devices abound. His epigram "On a Pretender" for example shows the quick turn of meaning at the close.

He whom you see to walk in so much state,
Waving and slow, with a majestic gait,

In purple clad, passing the nobles' seat,
 My Publius not in garments more complete — Whose new rich coach with gilt and studded reins, Fair boys and grown men follow in great trains,
 Lately his very ring in pawn did lay For four poor crowns, his supper to defray

Along with his technical skill goes an animation and a lively perception that make his epigrams often sound like casual conversation. With all the conciseness so necessary for the successful epigram, Martial has an ease that removes from his verses the tenseness that very often causes epigrams to be painful reading.

Although he himself was poor, Martial was the associate of rich men, and so had full opportunity to see Roman life in all its aspects. Slaves as well as emperors are the subjects of his epigrams. Dinner parties are described along with great monuments. Everywhere he shows a sharp eye and a penetrating wit. Hating pretension he pricks many a pompous bubble. Few elements of physical or human nature escape his attention.

Apart from Martial's clear pictures of Rome at the end of the first century, probably his greatest importance lies in his influence upon later writers of the epigram. Certainly it would be difficult to find any seventeenth or eighteenth century writer of this form in England who did not turn to Martial as his inspiration and guide. That there are at least seven French translations of the epigrams testifies to his popularity on the Continent.

Shortly after the accession of the Emperor Trajan, whom Martial flattered in verse with little effect, the poet returned, in 94, to his birthplace, Bilbilis, a Roman colony in Spain, where he lived on a comfortable estate given to him by a woman whom he probably later married. Characteristically, he was given money for the trip by a friend Pliny because of some verses written to him. It is equally characteristic that Martial continued his writing in Spain, sending his epigrams to Rome promptly, but now with frequent expressions of longing for the excitements and pleasures of the city that was to be for only a short time longer the capital of the world.

THE EPINICIA

Type of work Poetry

Author Pindar (c. 522 c. 443 B.C.)

First transcribed 502-452 B.C.

Pindar, by general consent the supreme lyric poet of Greece, is one of the least read of the world's great writers. A number of reasons have been given by various Greek scholars for the neglect of Pindar by modern readers. His language, based upon the Dorian dialect, poses problems for readers of his poems in the original Greek. Because all his epinicia or victory odes (his only complete poems extant) were written for special occasions and for special audiences, today's readers must depend upon scholarly notes for explanations of his many allusions and his abrupt transitions. The nature of the victory odes, too, makes them seem monotonous and even somewhat repetitious if a number of them are read at one time.

Edith Hamilton has said that Pindar is the most resistant of all poets to translation. The intricate form of his poems has never been more than faintly approximated in most of the attempts that have been made. In these odes Pindar achieved a masterly blend of carefully balanced structure and apparent emotional freedom, so that while he seems carried away by his feelings, he is at the same time in full control of his art. Such a fusion is difficult enough, one would suppose, for a poet himself to attain. It is even more so for a scholar or another poet to imitate successfully in translating Pindar's Greek. Ernest Myers and Sir John Sandys simply turned the Greek poems into English prose.

One reason for the tenuous appeal of Pindar was mentioned a half century ago by Robert Tyrrell: "It is hard," says Tyrrell, for us to figure to the imagination a form of art which partakes in nearly equal parts of the nature of a collect, a ballad, and an oration or to enter into the mind of a poet who is partly also a priest, a librettist, and a ballet master who while celebrating the victory of (perhaps) a boy in a wrestling match yet feels that he is not only doing an act of divine service and worship, but preaching the sacred truth of the unity of the Hellenes and their common descent from gods and heroes.

Yet the reader who does make the attempt to imagine the ancient occasions when these odes were first performed and to understand their effect upon the Greeks who watched and listened even if he reads them only in translation, will be richly rewarded as he becomes familiar with their form and purpose and with the artistry of the poet who wrote them.

The epinicia were written on contract to celebrate the winning of such events as chariot races, foot races, boxing and wrestling contests, and the combination pentathlon in four regularly held great "games" or athletic meets (The Pythian games included competition in singing to the flute and playing on the flute and the lyre as well as the usual athletic events and horse races.) These games were religious as well as secular, and they honored particular gods: the Olympian and Nemean games were in honor of Zeus, the Pythian of Apollo, and the Isthmian of Poseidon. The events were Panhellenic, open only to contestants from Greece or from such Greek island colonies as Rhodes and Sicily. Any soldier bearing arms to the games, which were held during periods of truce, was liable to arrest and could be freed only by ransom.

The odes were not written at the time of the victories which they celebrated but were composed for presentation at a later time. Exact details are not known but it is believed that the odes, commissioned by the family or patron of the victor, were presented by trained singers at some private entertainment.

Though a close study of all forty-five of the epinicia reveals many individual differences (several, in fact, are not really victory odes), most of them follow a general pattern. Composed in groups of three stanzas—strophe, antistrophe, and epode—they contain an introduction which invokes divine aid to the poet, praises the victor, and may include some reference to the contest itself (which is never actually described), a myth about gods or heroes and eulogy of the victor, his family, and his city, along with social, moral, or even semi-philosophical commentary on life. Though the moral observations and exhortations are usually reserved for the concluding section of an ode, they often appear in other sections. The odes vary considerably in length. Olympia 12, for example, contains only nineteen lines, whereas Pythia 4 runs to 299. The present order of the odes does not follow the chronology of their composition. They are grouped according to the games in which the victories were won and even within the four groups chronology is not followed.

Pindar belonged to the aristocracy and in the odes he celebrates the virtues and accomplishments of aristocratic families for whom the poems were composed. This praise is to be expected since he had been paid to write the poems, but one gathers that Pindar had scant interest in the less fortunate classes, whom he rarely mentions. When he says, in Pythia 2, that "wealth, with wisdom allotted thereto, is the best gift of Fortune," he seems to be expressing his own belief. A similar sentiment is found in Nemea 9: "For if with much possession a man win conspicuous honor, there lies beyond no mark for a mortal to overtake with his feet."

The many lines in which Pindar states his faith in the gods or praises them for their gifts to men suggest the earnest sincerity of his religion. In Pythia 2 he reminds Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse, that

It is God that accomplishes all term to hopes

God who overtakes the flying eagle outpasses the dolphin in the sea, who bends under his strength the man with thoughts too high, while to others he gives honor that ages not

In Isthmia 3 he says: "Great prowess descends upon mortals / Zeus, from you." He often invokes the Graces or indicates his great debt to them. One of the most beautiful of the briefer Epimacia is Olympian 14, which is less a victory ode than a hymn in praise of the Graces who bless mankind. It begins

You who have your dwelling in the place of splendid horses, founded beside the waters of Kephisos
O queens of song and queens of shining Orchomenos, Graces, guardians of the primeval Minyai, hear! My prayer is to you. By your means all delight,
all that is sweet, is given to mankind

The poet refers to the Olympian victory itself only at the very end, when he asks that Echo tell Kleodamos that his son has "crowned his youthful locks with garlands won from the ennobling games."

Though there is an air of joyousness in the Epimacia, with many references to drinking and feasting and to processional singing to the music of flute or lyre, they are dignified by relating mortal victories of strength and skill to the glorious deeds of the gods or great heroes of the past. The myths either alluded to or told in detail include stories about Zeus, Hera, Kles, Belerophon, Tantalus, Jason, Orestes, Peleus, and Hippolyta. The poems are also elevated by the beauty of Pindar's style, his frequent adjurations to right living, and his reminders that man's life is filled with both lights and shadows. In Pythia 8 he praises the sweetness of life when God's brightness shines on men. Yet he reminds us in Pythia 12

Success for men, if it comes ever, comes not unattended with difficulty. A god can end it, even today. That which is fated, you cannot escape.

Though the fame of Pindar rests almost entirely upon his Epimacia, he is known to have written several other types of lyrics, among them hymns, paeans, dithyrambs, eulogies, and dirges. Of these, more than three hundred fragments have survived, enough to show Pindar's considerable versatility both in form and in style. Among the more beautiful of the fragments are those from the dirges, as in this picture of the dead in Elysium

For them the sun shineth in his strength, in the world below while here 'tis night and in meadows red with roses, the space before their city is shaded by the incense tree, and is laden with golden fruits

Critique

Erec and Enide is chronologically the first of a group of metrical romances by a master tale teller of the medieval period about whom very little is known. More important, it is the oldest romance on Arthurian materials extant in any language. In it the more primitive Celtic elements of the writer's sources have been lost or are almost completely obscured. King Arthur and his knights are now models of the highly sophisticated and intricately detailed chivalric code growing out of the courts of love which flourished in France during the Middle Ages. Written in eight syllable rhyming couplets and sometimes called the first novel because of its consistent plot, this story is one of four which give us the most idealized expression of the code of chivalry by a single writer of medieval times.

The Story

One Easter season, while King Arthur held his court in the royal town of Cardigan, he summoned all his knights to a hunt for the White Stag. Sir Gawain, hearing of the king's wish, was displeased and said that no good would come of that ancient custom, for the law of the hunt decreed that the successful hunter must also kiss the lady whom he considered the most beautiful damsel of the court. As Sir Gawain noted, there was likely to be dissension among the assembled knights, each was prepared to defend his own true love as the loveliest and gentlest lady in the land and he would be angered by the slight put upon her if she were not so chosen.

At daybreak the hunters set out. After them rode Queen Guinevere, attended by Erec, a fair and brave knight, and one of the queen's damsels, a king's daughter. While they waited by the wayside to hear the baying of the hounds or the call of a bugle, they saw coming toward them a strange knight, his lady and a dwarf who carried a knotted scourge. First the queen sent her damsel to ask who the knight and his fair companion might be, but the dwarf, barring her way, struck the damsel across the hand with his whip. Then Erec rode forward and the dwarf lashed him across the face and neck. Being unarmed, Erec made no attempt to chastise the dwarf or his haughty master, but he vowed that he would follow the strange knight until he could find arms to hire or borrow that he might avenge the insult to the queen.

In the fair town to which the strange knight and his companions presently led him, Erec found lodgings with a vavasor who told him the reason for all the stir and bustle that Erec had seen as he rode through the gates. On the next day a fine sparrow hawk would be given to the knight who could defend against all comers the beauty and goodness of his lady. The haughty knight, who had won the bird in two successive years, would be allowed to keep it if his challenge went unanswered on the morrow. At the home of the vavasor Erec met his host's daughter, Enide, who in spite of her tattered garments was the most radiantly beautiful damsel in Christendom. With her as his lady and with arms borrowed from his host, Erec challenged and defeated in single combat the arrogant knight who was defending the hawk. Then Erec dispatched the vanquished knight, whose name was Yder, to Queen Guinevere to do with at her pleasure, along with his lady and his dwarf. With them he sent word that he would return with his beautiful bride, the damsel Enide.

Erec promised Enide's father great riches and two towns to rule in his own land, but he refused all offers to have

Enide dressed in robes suitable to her new station he wished all in King Arthur's court to see that in spite of her humble garments she was the most beautiful lady who ever lived So great was her beauty that King Arthur, who himself had killed the White Stag kissed her without a demer from the assembled knights and ladies The king also granted Erec the boon of a speedy marriage, so eager was the young knight for the love of his promised bride The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury at the time of the Pentecost before an assemblage of knights and ladies from every corner of the kingdom, and the celebration continued for a fortnight

A month after Pentecost a great tournament was held near Tenebroc and in the lists there Erec showed himself the most valiant of all the knights assembled On his return he received from the king permission to visit his own land, and he and Enide set out with an escort of sixty knights On the fifth day they arrived in Carnant, where King Lac welcomed his son and his bride with much honor Meanwhile Erec found so much pleasure in his wife's company that he had no thought for other pastimes When tournaments were held in the region around, he sent his knights to the forays but he himself remained behind in dalliance with the fair Enide At last people began to gossip and say that he had turned a craven in arms These reports so distressed Enide that one morning while they were still abed she began to lament the way in which the brave and hardy knight had changed because of his love for her Overhearing her words, Erec was moved to anger, and he told her to rise and prepare herself at once to take the road with him on a journey of knight errantry in search of whatever perils he might encounter by chance At the beginning of the journey he gave orders that she was never to tell him of anything she might see, nor to speak to him unless he addressed her first

speak, she lamented her disclosure and their sudden departure from the life she had enjoyed with her loving husband She disobeyed him, however, when they were about to be attacked by three robber knights, and again when they were assailed by five recreants Erec, having overcome all who opposed him, felt no gratitude for her wifely warnings and fears for his safety, but spoke harshly to her because she had disobeyed his command that she was under any circumstance to remain silent until he gave her leave to speak

That night, since they knew of no town or shelter nearby, they slept in an open field There the squire of Count Galoin came upon them the next day and conducted them to lodgings in the town where the count was master That nobleman, going to pay his respects to the strange knight and his lovely lady, was much smitten with Enide's beauty, so much so that, going to the place where she sat apart, he expressed his pity for her obvious distress and offered to make her mistress of all his lands When Enide refused, he declared that he would take her by force Fearful for her husband's life Enide pretended to do his pleasure It was arranged that on the next day the count's knights were to overtake the travelers and seize Enide by force Erec, coming to her rescue, would be killed, and she would be free to take the count as her lord Once more Enide disobeyed her husband and told him of Count Galoin's plan Forewarned, Erec overcame his assailants and knocked the false count senseless from his steed When Galoin's followers would have pursued Erec and Enide, the count restrained them, praising Enide's prudence and virtue and the bravery of her knight

Departing from Count Galoin's lands, the travelers came to a castle from which the lord came riding on a great steed to offer Erec combat at arms Enide saw him coming but did not dare tell her husband for fear of his wrath At last she did speak, however, and Erec realized her love for him that made her disobedient to his commands. The knight who challenged Erec was of small stature but stout heart and both were wounded in the fight. Though the doughty little knight lost, he put up such a good fight that he and Erec became friends. Guivret the Little invited Erec to have his wounds dressed and to rest at his castle, but Erec thanked him courteously and rode with Enide on his way.

At length they arrived at a wood where King Arthur had come with a large hunting party. By then Erec was so begrimed and bloodied that Sir Kay the seneschal did not recognize him. When he would have taken the wounded knight to the king's camp, Erec refused and they fought until Sir Kay was unhorsed. Sir Gawain then rode out to encounter the strange knight and he was able to bring Erec to the place where the king had ordered tents set up in anticipation of their coming. There was great joy in that meeting for the king and Queen Guinevere, but distress at Erec's wounds. Although the king pleaded with Erec to rest there until his hurts were healed, the knight refused to be turned aside or delayed on his journey, and early the next morning he and Enide set out once more.

In a strange forest they heard the cries of a lady in distress. Leaving Enide to await his return, Erec rode in the direction of the sound and found a damsel weeping because two giants had carried away her knight. Riding in pursuit, Erec killed the giants and rescued the knight, whose name was Cadoc of Tabriol. Later he sent Cadoc and the damsel to King Arthur's camp to tell the story of how he fared. Meanwhile, Erec's wounds had reopened and he lost so much blood that he fell from his horse in a swoon.

While Enide was weeping over his prostrate body, a count with his suite came riding through the forest. The nobleman gave orders that the body was to be taken to Limors and prepared for burial. On their arrival at the count's palace he declared his intention of espousing

Enide at once. Although she refused to give her consent, the ceremony was performed in great haste and guests were summoned to a wedding banquet that night.

Erec, recovering from his deep swoon, awoke in time to see the wretched count strike Enide across the face because her grief was so great that she could neither eat nor drink at her new husband's bidding. Springing from the funeral bier, he drew his sword and struck the count on the head with such force that blood and brains flowed out. While the other knights and squires retreated in fear of the ghostly presence that had so suddenly returned to life, the two made their escape, Erec meanwhile assuring his wife that he was now convinced of her devotion and love.

Meanwhile, Guivret the Little had received word that a mortally wounded knight had been found in the forest and that the lord of Limors had carried off the dead man's wife. Coming to see that the fallen knight received proper burial and to aid his lady if she were in distress, the doughty little knight came upon Erec, whom he failed to recognize in the murky moonlight and struck a blow which knocked Erec unconscious. Enide and Guivret remained by the stricken man all that night, and in the morning they proceeded to Guivret's castle. There, attended by Enide and Guivret's sisters, Erec was nursed back to health. After his recovery, escorted by Guivret and burdened with gifts, the couple prepared to return to King Arthur's court.

Toward nightfall the travelers saw in the distance the towers of a great fortress. Guivret said that the town was named Brandigant in which there was a perilous passage called the "Joy of the Court." King Evraun welcomed the travelers with great courtesy, but that night, while they feasted, he also warned Erec against attempting the mysterious feat which no knight had thus far survived. Despite the disapproval of his friend and his host, Erec swore to attempt the passage.

The next morning he was conducted into a magic garden filled with all manner of fruits and flowers, past the heads and helmets of unfortunate though brave knights who had also braved danger in order to blow the magic horn whose blast would signify joy to King Evran's land. At the end of a path he found a beautiful damsel seated on a couch. While he stood looking at her, a knight appeared to engage him in combat. They fought until the hour of noon had passed, then the knight fell exhausted. He revealed that he had been held in thrall in the garden by an oath given to his mistress, whose one wish had been his eternal presence by her side. Erec then blew the horn and all the people rejoiced to find him safe. There was great joy also when the knight of the garden was released from his bondage and the beautiful damsel identified herself as the cousin of Enide.

Erec and Enide, with Guivret, continued their journey to the court of King Arthur, where they were received with gladness and honor. When his father died, Erec returned to reign in his own land. There he and Enide were crowned in a ceremony of royal splendor in the presence of King Arthur and all the nobles of his realm.

Author Michel Eyquem de Montaigne (1533-1592)

First published Books I II, 1580 I II revised, 1582, I III, 1588, I III, revised, 1595

Montaigne began his essays as a stoical humanist, continued them as a skeptic, and concluded them as a human being concerned with man. Substantially, this evolution is the one upon which Montaigne scholars are agreed. Surely these three phases of his thought are apparent in his Essays, for one may find, in these volumes, essays in which Montaigne considers how a man should face pain and die, such as "To Philosophize Is to Learn to Die", essays in which the skeptical attack on dogmatism in philosophy and religion is most evident, such as the famous "Apology for Raymond Sebond", and essays in which the writer makes a constructive effort to encourage men to know themselves and to act naturally for the good of all men, as in "The Education of Children."

Montaigne retired to his manor when he was thirty-eight. Public life had not satisfied him, and he was wealthy enough to live apart from the active life of his times and to give himself to contemplation and the writing of essays. He did spend some time in travel a few years later, and he was made mayor of Bordeaux, but most of his effort went into the writing and revision of his Essays, the attempt to essay, to test, the ideas which came to him.

An important essay in the first volume is "That the Taste for Good and Evil Depends in Good Part upon the Opinion We Have of Them." The essay begins with a paraphrase of a quotation from Epictetus to the effect that men are bothered more by opinions than by things. The belief that all human judgment is, after all, more a function of the human being than of the things judged suggested to Montaigne that by a change of attitude human beings could alter the values of things. Even death can be valued, provided the man who is about to die is of the proper disposition. Poverty and pain can also be good provided a person of courageous temperament develops a taste for them. Montaigne concludes that "things are not so painful and difficult of themselves, but our weakness or cowardice makes them so. To judge of great and high matters requires a suitable soul."

This stoical relativity is further endorsed in the essay "To Study Philosophy Is to Learn to Die." Montaigne's preoccupation with the problem of facing pain and death was caused by the death of his best friend, Étienne de la Boétie, who died in 1563 at the age of thirty three, and then the deaths of his father, his brother, and several of his children. In addition, Montaigne was deeply disturbed by the Saint Bartholomew Day massacres. As a humanist, he was well educated in the literature and philosophy of the ancients, and from them he drew support of the stoical philosophy suggested to him by the courageous death of his friend La Boétie.

The title of the essay is a paraphrase of Cicero's remark "that to study philosophy is nothing but to prepare one's self to die." For some reason, perhaps because it did not suit his philosophic temperament at the time, perhaps because he had forgotten it, Montaigne did not allude to a similar expression attributed by Plato to Socrates, the point then being that the philosopher is interested in the eternal, the unchanging, and that life is a preoccupation with the temporal and the variable. For Montaigne, however, the remark means either that the soul in contemplation removes itself from the body, so to speak, or else that philosophy is concerned to teach us how to face death. It is the latter interpretation that interested him.

Asserting that we all aim at pleasure, even in virtue, Montaigne argued that the thought of death is naturally disturbing. He refers to the death of his brother, Captain St. Martin, who was killed when he was twenty three by being struck behind the ear by a tennis ball. Other instances enforce his claim that death often comes unexpectedly to the young, for this reason the problem is urgent. With these examples before us, he writes, how can we "avoid fancying that death has us, every moment, by the throat?" The solution is to face death and fight it by becoming so familiar with the idea of death that we are no longer fearful. "The utility of living," he writes, "consists not in the length of days, but in the use of time." Death is natural, and what is important is not to waste life with the apprehension of death.

In the essay "Of Judging the Death of Another," Montaigne argues that a man reveals his true character when he shows how he faces a death which he knows is coming. A "studied and digested" death may bring a kind of delight to a man of the proper spirit. Montaigne cites Socrates and Cato as examples of men who knew how to die.

Montaigne's most famous essay is his "Apology for Raymond Sebond," generally considered to be the most complete and effective of his skeptical essays. Yet what Montaigne is skeptical of is not religion, as many critics have asserted, but of the pretensions of reason and of dogmatic philosophers and theologians. When Montaigne asks "Que sais je?" the expression becomes the motto of his skepticism, "What do I know?"—not because he thinks that man should give up the use of the intellect and imagination, but because he thinks it wise to recognize the limits of these powers.

The essay is ostensibly in defense of the book titled Theologia naturalis sive Liber creaturarum magistri Raymond de Sebonde, the work of a philosopher and theologian of Toulouse, who wrote the book about 1430.

Montaigne considers two principal objections to the book: the first, that Sebond is mistaken in the effort to support Christian belief upon human reasons, the second, that Sebond's arguments in support of Christian belief are so weak that they may easily be confuted. In commenting upon the first objection, Montaigne agrees that the truth of God can be known only through faith and God's assistance, yet Montaigne argues that Sebond is to be commended for his noble effort to use reason in the service of God. If one considers Sebond's arguments as an aid to faith, they may be viewed as useful guides.

Montaigne's response to the second objection takes up most of the essay, and since the work is, in some editions, over two hundred pages long, we may feel justified in concluding from length alone the intensity of Montaigne's conviction. Montaigne uses the bulk of his essay to argue against those philosophers who suppose that by reason alone man can find truth and happiness. The rationalists who attack Sebond do not so much damage the theologian as show their own false faith in the value of reason. Montaigne considers "a man alone, without foreign assistance, armed only with his own proper arms, and unfurnished of the divine grace and wisdom" and he sets forth to show that such a man is not only miserable and ridiculous but grievously mistaken in his presumption. Philosophers who attempt to reason without divine assistance gain nothing from their efforts except knowledge of their own weakness. Yet that knowledge has some value, ignorance is then not absolute ignorance. Nor is it any solution for the philosopher to adopt the stoical attitude and try to rise above humanity, as Seneca suggests the only way to rise is by abandoning human means and by suffering, cause oneself to be elevated by Christian faith.

In the essay "Of the Education of Children," Montaigne writes that the only objective he had in writing the essays was to discover himself. In giving his opinions concerning the education of children Montaigne shows how the study of himself took him from the idea of philosophy as a study of what is "grim and formidable" to the idea of philosophy as a way to the health and cheerfulness of mind and body. He claims that "The most manifest sign of wisdom is a continual cheerfulness," and that "the height and value of true virtue consists in the facility, utility, and pleasure of its exercise."

Philosophy is "that which instructs us to live." The aim of education is so to lead the child that he will come to love nothing but the good, and the way to this objective is an education that takes advantage of the youth's appetites and affections. Though his love of books led Montaigne to live in such a manner that he was accused of slothfulness and want of mettle, he justifies his education by pointing out that this is the worst men can say of him.

Not all of Montaigne's essays reflect the major stages of his transformation from stoic and skeptic to a man of good will. Like Bacon, he found satisfaction in working out his ideas concerning the basic experiences of life. Thus he wrote of sadness, of constancy, of fear, of friendship (with particular reference to La Boétie), of moderation, of solitude, of sleep, of names, of books. These essays are lively, imaginative, and informed with the knowledge of a gentleman well trained in the classics. Yet it is when he writes of pain and death, referring to his own long struggle with kidney stones and to the deaths of those he loved, and when he writes of his need for faith and of man's need for self knowledge, that we are most moved. In such essays the great stylist, the educated thinker, and the struggling human being are one. It was in the essaying of himself that Montaigne became a great essayist.

AN ESSAY CONCERNING HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

Author John Locke (1632-1704)

First published 1690

Locke's purpose in An Essay Concerning Human Understanding was to inquire into the origin and extent of human knowledge, and his answer—that all knowledge is derived from sense experience—became the principal tenet of the new empiricism which has dominated Western philosophy ever since. Even

George Berkeley (1685-1753), who rejected Locke's distinction between sense qualities independent of the mind and sense qualities dependent on the mind, produced his idealism in response to Locke's provocative philosophy and gave it an empirical cast which reflected Western man's rejection of innate or transcendental knowledge

An Essay Concerning Human Understanding is divided into four books. Book I, "Of Innate Notions", Book II, "Of Ideas", Book III, "Of Words", and Book IV, "Of Knowledge, Certain and Probable"

In preparation for his radical claim that all ideas are derived from experience, Locke began his Essay with a careful consideration of the thesis that there are innate ideas, that is, ideas which are a necessary part of man's convictions and are, therefore, common to all men. Locke's attack on this claim is from two directions. He argues that many of the ideas which are supposed to be innate can be and have been derived naturally from sense experience, that not all men assent to those ideas which are supposed to be innate. He maintained that even if reason enables men to discover the truth of certain ideas, those ideas cannot be said to be innate, for reason is needed to discover their truth.

In Book II, "Of Ideas," Locke considers the origin of such ideas as those expressed by the words "whiteness," "hardness," "sweetness," "thinking," "motion," "man," and the like. The second section states his answer:

Let us then suppose the mind to be as we say, white paper void of all characters, without any ideas. How comes it to be furnished? Whence has it all the materials of reason and knowledge? To this I answer, in one word, from experience. Our observation, employed either about external sensible objects, or about the internal operations of our minds perceived and reflected on by ourselves, is that which supplies our understandings with all the materials of knowledge.

The two sources of our ideas, according to Locke, are sensation and reflection. By the senses we come to have perceptions of things, thereby acquiring the ideas of yellow, white, cold, for example. Then, by reflection, by consideration of the mind in operation, we acquire the ideas of thinking, doubting, believing, knowing, willing, and so on.

By sensation we acquire knowledge of external objects, by reflection we acquire knowledge of our own minds.

Ideas which are derived from sensation are simple, that is, they present "one uniform appearance," even though a number of simple ideas may come together in the perception of an external object. The mind dwells on the simple ideas, comparing them to each other, combining them, but never inventing them. By a "simple idea" Locke meant what some modern and contemporary philosophers have called a "sense datum," a distinctive entirely differentiated item of sense experience, such as the odor of some particular glue, or the taste of coffee in a cup. He called attention to the fact that we use our sense experience to imagine what we have never perceived, but no operation of the mind can yield novel simple ideas.

By the "quality" of something Locke meant its power to produce an idea in someone sensing the thing. The word "quality" is used in the Essay in much the same way the word "characteristic" or "property" has been used by other, more recent, writers. For Locke distinguished between primary and secondary qualities. Primary qualities are those which matter has constantly, whatever its state. As primary qualities Locke names solidity, extension, figure, motion or rest, and number. By secondary qualities Locke meant the power to produce various sensations which have nothing in common with the primary qualities of the external objects. Thus, the power to produce the taste experience of sweetness is a secondary quality of sugar, but there is no reason to suppose that the sugar itself possesses the distinctive quality of the sensation. Colors, tastes, sounds, and odors are secondary qualities of objects.

Locke also referred to a third kind of quality or power, called simply "power," by which he meant the capacity to affect or to be affected by other objects. Thus, fire can melt clay; the capacity to melt clay is one of fire's powers, and such a power is neither a primary nor a secondary quality.

Locke concluded that primary ideas resemble external objects, but secondary ideas do not. It is this particular claim which has excited other professional philosophers, with Berkeley arguing that primary qualities can be understood only in terms of our own sensations, so that whatever generalization can be made about secondary qualities would have to cover primary qualities as well, and other philosophers arguing that Locke had no ground for maintaining that primary ideas "resemble" primary qualities, even if the distinction between primary and secondary qualities is allowed.

Complex ideas result from acts of the mind, and they fall into three classes: ideas of modes, of substances, and of relations. Modes are ideas which are considered to be incapable of independent existence since they are affections of substance, such as the ideas of triangle, gratitude, and murder. To think of substances is to think of "particular things subsisting by themselves," and to think in that manner involves supposing that there is a support, which cannot be understood, and that there are various qualities in combination which give various substances their distinguishing traits. Ideas of relations are the result of comparing ideas with each other.

After a consideration of the complex ideas of space, duration, number, the infinite, pleasure and pain, substance, relation, cause and effect, and of the distinctions between clear and obscure ideas and between true and false ideas, Locke proceeded to a discussion, in Book III, of words and essences. Words are signs of ideas by "arbitrary imposition," depending upon observed similarities which are taken as the basis for considering things in classes. Words are related to "nominal essences," that is, to obvious similarities found through observation, and not to 'real essences,' the actual qualities of things. Locke then discussed the imperfections and abuses of words.

In Book IV Locke defined knowledge as "the perception of the connection of and agreement, or disagreement and repugnancy, of any of our ideas." An example cited is our knowledge that white is not black; Locke arguing that to know that white is not black is simply to perceive that the idea of white is not the idea of black.

Locke insisted that knowledge cannot extend beyond the ideas we have, and that we determine whether ideas agree or disagree with each other either directly, by intuition, or indirectly, by reason or sensation. Truth is defined as "the joining or separating of signs, as the things signified by them do agree or disagree one with another." For example, the proposition "White is not black" involves the separation by "is not" of the signs "white" and "black," signifying the disagreement between the ideas of white and black, since the ideas are different, the proposition is true. Actually to have compared the ideas and to have noted their disagreement is to know the fact which the true proposition signifies.

Locke devoted the remaining chapters of Book IV to arguing that we have knowledge of our existence by intuition, of the existence of God by demonstration, and of other things by sensation. Here the influence of Descartes is clearly evident. But it is the empiricism of the earlier parts of the book which won for Locke the admiration of philosophers.

ESSAYS

Author Sir Francis Bacon (1561 1626)

First published 1597 added to and revised, 1612, 1625

Sir Francis Bacon was a man of many accomplishments—scientist, philosopher, and politician, he was adept, too, at taking bribes and for that was imprisoned. Yet it is as a literary man that he is perhaps best remembered, a writer so competent with the pen that for decades there have been persons willing to argue that Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare.

The essay form is rare in our age, although there are some faint signs of its revival. As Bacon used it, the essay is a carefully fashioned statement, both in formative and expressive, by which a man comments on life and manners, on nature and its puzzles. The essay is not designed to win men to a particular cause or to communicate factual matter better put in scientific treatises. Perhaps that is one reason why it is not so popular in an age in which it is always pertinent to ask whether a claim can be proved and whether knowing it makes a practical difference.

The Essays first appeared, ten in number, in 1597. They were immediately popular because they were brief, lively, humane, and well written. Perhaps they were effective in contrast to the rambling florid prose written by most writers of the time. A considerable part of their charm lay in what keeps them charming: their civilized tone. In these essays Bacon revealed himself as an inquisitive but also an appreciative man with wit enough to interest others.

The first edition contained the following essays: "Of Studies," "Of Discourse," "Of Ceremonies and Respects," "Of Followers and Friends," "Of Suits," "Of Expense," "Of Regiment of Health," "Of Honour and Reputation," "Of Faction," and "Of Negotiating."

By 1612 the number of essays had been increased to thirty-eight, the earlier ones having been revised or rewritten. By the last edition, in 1625, the number was fifty-eight. Comparison of the earlier essays with those written later shows not only a critical mind at work but also a man made sadder and wiser, or at least different, by changes in fortune.

The essays concern themselves with such universal concepts as truth, death, love, goodness, friendship, fortune, and praise, with such controversial matters as religion, atheism, "the True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates," custom and education, and usury, and with such intriguing matters as envy, cunning, innovations, suspicion, ambition, praise, vain glory, and the vicissitudes of things.

The Essays or Counsels, Civil and Moral, as they are called in the heading of the first essay, begins with an essay on truth and entitled directly, "Of Truth." The title formula is always the same, simply a naming of the matter to be discussed, as for example "Of Death," "Of Unity in Religion," "Of Adversity."

"What is Truth?" said jesting Pilate and would not stay for an answer. One expects a sermon—and is pleasantly surprised. Bacon uses his theme as a point of departure for a discussion of the charms of lying, trying to fathom the love of lying for its own sake. "A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure," he writes. But this pleasure is ill founded, it rests on error resulting from depraved judgment. Bacon reverses himself grandly: "truth, which only doth judge it self, teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the love making or wooing of it, the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature."

What of death? Bacon begins by admitting that tales of death increase man's natural fear of it, but he reminds the reader that death is not always painful. By references to Augustus Caesar, Tiberius, Vespasian, and others Bacon showed that even in their last moments great men maintained their characters and composure. Death is natural, he concludes, and it has certain advantages: it opens the gate to good fame and puts an end to envy. The good man is in no fear of death because he has better things to do and think about, and when he dies he knows he has obtained "worthy ends and expectations."

The essay "Of Adversity" is particularly interesting since it reflects Bacon's own experience after imprisonment, the loss of friends and position, and enforced retirement. He writes, "Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, Adversity is the blessing of the New, which carrieth the greater benediction, and the clearer revelation of God's favour." Adversity puts life's brighter moments into effective contrast, and it allows a man the chance to show his virtues.

Bacon is no casual essayist. We do not need the report of history to tell us that the essays as we find them are the product of numerous revisions. Sentences do not achieve a careful balance and rhythm accidentally, nor does a moment's reflection provide apt allusions, pertinent Latin phrases, and witty turns of thought.

The essay "Of Beauty" begins with a well-fashioned, complex statement: "Virtue is like a rich stone, best plain set, and surely virtue is best in a body that is comely, though not of delicate features, and that hath rather dignity of presence, than beauty of aspect." The essay continues by commenting on the sad fact that beauty and virtue are not always conjoined, but then Bacon remembers some noble spirits who were "the most beautiful men of their times"—Augustus Caesar, Titus Vespasianus, Philip le Bel of France, Edward the Fourth of England, Alcibiades of Athens, and Ismael the Sophy of Persia. Then he comes to a striking thought in a simple line: "There is no excellent beauty that hath not some strangeness in the proportion."

Although appreciative of beauty, Bacon was modern in his appreciation of use. "Houses are built to live in," he writes in the essay "Of Building"—"therefore let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had." He is aware of the importance of location; he warns the reader to beware of an "ill seat" for his house, and mentions in particular the discomfort that results from building a house in a hollow of ground surrounded by high hills. So much aware is he of the mistakes that a builder can make that Bacon follows a catalogue of dangers and difficulties with a charming and involved description of an ideal dwelling: a place for entertaining, a place for dwelling, and the whole a beautiful construction of rooms for various uses, courts, playing fountains—all of large, but proper dimensions, and built to take account of summer sun and winter cold.

Although there is a prevailing moral character to the essays so that, in retrospect, they seem to be a series of beautiful commands to erring spirits, there is enough of wisdom, education, humor, and common sense in them to save the author from the charge of moral arrogance. For example, Bacon does not begin his essay on anger by declaring how shameful anger is; he says instead, "To seek to extinguish Anger utterly is but a bravery of the Stoics." He then gives practical advice: To calm anger there is no other way but to consider the effects of anger, to remember what it has done in the past, and to repress particular angry acts. Bacon advises the reader to let time pass in the belief that the opportunity for revenge will come later, and he particularly warns against the bitterness of words and the doing of any irrevocable act.

In writing of atheism Bacon combined philosophical argument with moral persuasion and intensity of expression. If it seems strange that a scientist, the father of induction, should take so seriously the ordinary arguments of the Church, it is only because we tend to think of men as playing single roles and as living apart from their times. In any case, Bacon's philosophic skill was most at evidence in scientific matters, and there is no more reason to expect that he would be adept at philosophizing about religion than to expect that he should have anticipated Einstein in his reflections about science as an Elizabethan he did as well as we have a right to ask. The essay contains the famous line "It is true, that a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's mind about to religion."

Although the essays naturally reflect a lifetime of experience, they do so in general, not in particular. One looks in vain for reports of adventures and misadventures at court—and Bacon had many of both. He sounds like the better side of Machiavelli in his essay on simulation and dissimulation, but there are no personal references to events in which he was involved and from which he acquired the knowledge imparted here. Nor would we suspect that Bacon was one of the leading scientific minds of his age; he discourses on friendship, parents and children, gardens, study, and the rest, as a gentle, humane scholar. We realize that in the Essays Bacon gave up the roles which ambition made him play. In his contemplative moments he sought to satisfy a two-fold goal: to present the wisdom of his living, the wisdom that comes from experience and reflection on it, and to make this presentation by means of a style designed to be economical and ornamental at the same time.

ESSAYS FIRST AND SECOND SERIES

Type of work Philosophical essays

Author Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-1882)

First published First Series, 1841; Second Series, 1844

Emerson's Essays proclaim the self-reliance of a man who believed himself representative of all men since he felt himself intuitively aware of God's universal truths. He spoke to a nineteenth-century that was ready for an emphasis on individualism and responsive to a new optimism that linked God, nature, and man into a magnificent cosmos.

Emerson himself spoke as one who had found in Transcendentalism a positive answer to the static Unitarianism of his day. He had been a Unitarian minister for three years at the Old North Church in Boston (1829-1832), but he had resigned because in his view the observance of the Lord's Supper could not be justified in the Unitarian Church.

Transcendentalism combined Neoplatonism, a mystical faith in the universality and permanence of value in the universe, with a pervasive moral seriousness akin to the Calvinist conviction and with a romantic optimism that found evidence of God's love throughout all nature. Derivative from these influences was the faith in man's creative power, the belief that the individual, by utilizing God's influence, could continue to improve his understanding and his moral nature. Knowledge could come to man directly, without the need of argument, if only he had the courage to make himself receptive to God's truth, manifest everywhere.

Through his essays and addresses Emerson became not only the leading Transcendentalist in America, but also one of the greatest if least formal of American philosophers. The latter accomplishment may be attributed more to the spirit of his philosophy than to his technical excellence, for Emerson had little respect for logic, empiricism, and linguistic analysis—features common to the work of other great American philosophers such as Charles Sanders Peirce, William James, and John Dewey. Nor can Emerson be compared in his method to such a philosopher as Alfred North Whitehead, for Emerson disdained speculative adventures, he believed himself to be affirming what nature told him, and nature spoke directly of God and of God's laws.

Emerson's Nature (1836) was the first definitive statement of his philosophical perspective, and within this work may be found most of the characteristic elements of Emerson's thought. The basic idea is that nature is God's idea made apparent to men. Thus, "the whole of nature is a metaphor of the human mind." "The axioms of physics translate the laws of ethics," and "This relation between the mind and matter is not fancied by some poet, but stands in the will of God, and so is free to be known by all men." Emerson asserted emphatically that "day and night, river and storm, beast and bird, acid and alkali, preexist in necessary Ideas in the mind of God", hence he agreed with those who supposed that nature reveals spiritual and moral truths. Not only does nature reveal truths, it also disciplines men, rewarding them when nature is used properly, punishing them when it is abused.

One secret of Emerson's charm was his ability to translate metaphysical convictions into vivid images. Having argued that nature is the expression of God's idea, and having concluded that "The moral law lies at the center of nature and radiates to the circumference" he illustrated the moral influence of nature by asking, "Who can guess how much firmness the sea-beaten rock has taught the fishermen?" The danger in Emerson's method, however, was that readers tended to forget that his idealism was philosophically, not merely poetically, intended, he believed literally that only spirit and its ideas are real. He admitted the possibility that nature "outwardly exists," that is, that physical objects corresponding to his sensations exist, but he pointed out that since he was not able to test the authenticity of his senses, it made no difference whether such outlying objects existed. All that he could be sure of were his ideas, and that, whether directly or indirectly, the ideas came from God. For Emerson, then, idealism was not only a credible philosophy, but also the only morally significant one.

If nature is God's idea made apparent to men, it follows that the way to God's truth is not by reason or argument but by simple and reverent attention to the facts of nature, to what man perceives when his eye is innocent. Emerson criticized science not because it was useless but because more important matters, those having a moral bearing, confronted man at every moment in the world of nature, the individual needed only to intuit nature, to see it as it was without twisting it to fit his philosophy or his science, in order to know God's thoughts. Thus, in the essay "Nature" Emerson wrote that "Nature is the incarnation of a thought, and turns to a thought again."

The world is mind precipitated.
"He added, with assurance, "Every moment instructs, and every object, for wisdom is infused into every form."

The ideas which Emerson had endorsed in Nature found explicit moral application in the address titled "The American Scholar," delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Cambridge in 1837. Emerson defined the scholar as "Man Thinking," and he declared that the main influences of the scholar's education are nature, books, and action. The duties of a scholar all involve self-trust, he must be both free and brave. The rewards of such freedom and bravery are inspiring: the mind is altered by the truths uncovered, and the whole world will come to honor the independent scholar. It was in this address that Emerson said that "the ancient precept, 'Know thyself,' and the modern precept, 'Study nature,' become at last one maxim."

The essay "Self-Reliance," included in the First Series emphasizes the importance of that self trust to which Emerson referred in his Phi Beta Kappa address. It is understandable that this emphasis seemed necessary to Emerson. If nature reveals the moral truths which God intends for man's use, then three elements are involved in the critical human situation: nature, man, and man's attitude toward nature. It is possible to be blind to the truths about us, only the man who is courageous enough to be willing to be different in his search and convictions is likely to discover what is before every man's eyes. Emerson emphasized self reliance not because he regarded the self, considered as a separate entity, important, but because he believed that the self is part of the reality of God's being and that in finding truth for oneself, provided one faces nature intuitively, one finds what is true for all men. "To believe your own thought, to believe that what is true for you in your private heart is true for all men—that is genius," Emerson wrote in "Self Reliance"; he added that it is a kind of genius that is possible for anyone who is willing to acquire it.

Believing that each man's mind is capable of yielding important truth, Emerson distinguished between goodness and the name of goodness. He urged each man to work and act without being concerned about the mere opinions of others. "Whoso would be a man, must be a non-conformist," and whoever would advance in the truth should be willing to contradict himself, to be inconsistent. "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines."

That Emerson's philosophy was not an endorsement of selfish behavior is clear from his emphasis upon the use of the mind as an instrument for the intuitive understanding of universal truths and laws, but it is possible to misinterpret "Self Reliance" as a joyous celebration of individuality. A sobering balance is achieved by the essay "The Over Soul" in which Emerson subordinates the individual to the whole. "Meantime within man is the soul of the whole—the eternal One." Using language reminiscent of Platonism, Emerson wrote that the soul "gives itself, alone original and pure, to the Lonely, Original and Pure, who, on that condition, gladly inhabits leads and speaks through it."

Emerson valued the poet because the poet uses his imagination to discern the meanings of sensuous facts. The poet sees and expresses the beauty in nature because he recognizes the spiritual meaning of events; he takes old symbols and gives them new uses, thereby making nature the sign of God. In the essay "The Poet" Emerson wrote that the poet's insight is "a very high sort of seeing," a way of transcending conventional modes of thought in order to attend directly to the forms of things.

It is a misunderstanding of Emerson to regard him as a sentimental mystic, as one who lay on his back and saw divinity in every cloud. Emerson's transcendental insight is more akin to the intelligence of the Platonic philosopher who, having recognized his own ignorance, suddenly finds himself able to see the universal in the jumble of particular facts. Emerson may be criticized for never satisfactorily relating the life of contemplation to the life of practical affairs, but he cannot be dismissed as an iconoclastic mystic. For him the inquiring soul and the heroic soul were one, and the justification of self reliance and meditation was in terms of the result, in the individual soul, of the effort to recognize the unity of all men. In "Experience," Emerson chooses knowing in preference to doing, but it is clear that he was rejecting a thoughtless interest in action and results. In "Character" and again in "Politics" he emphasized the importance of coming to have the character of transcending genius, of spirit which has found moral law in nature and has adapted it for use in the world of men. The transforming power of spirit properly educated and employed was something Emerson counted on, and he was concerned to argue that such power is not easily achieved

Emerson defended democracy as the form of government best fitted for Americans whose religion and tradition reflect a desire to allow the judgments of citizens to be expressed in the laws of the state But he cautioned that Every actual State is corrupt," and added, "Good men must not obey the laws too well" Here the independent spirit, concerned with the laws of God, demands

heroism and possibly, like Thoreau, civil disobedience

Scholars have written innumerable articles and books attempting to account for Emerson's influence—which continues to be profound—on American thought If agreement is ever reached, it seems likely that it will involve acceptance of the claim that Emerson, whatever his value as a philosopher, gave stirring expression to the American faith in the creative capacity of the individual soul

ESSAYS OF ELIA and LAST ESSAYS OF ELIA

Author Charles Lamb (1775-1834)

First published 1823 and 1833

Among modern platitudes at least half true is the assertion that conversation is a lost art Certainly more than half true is a similar statement that the art of the personal essay as practiced by Charles Lamb in The Essays of Elia is an art that few modern writers practice Both conversation and the personal essay—as might be pointed out by persons who lived at other stages of our culture—depend on periods of quiet, periods of boredom, and finally mental action that is various and witty, the display of riches that have been laid up in periods of quiet and refined in periods of apparent boredom The personal essay, at any rate, can be only the product of a person who has followed from his youth onward the dictum of Dr Samuel Johnson and read five hours a day and who, in his middle years, takes delight in displaying, sometimes with mock modesty, the fruits of silent study Lamb's essays are, at any rate, a kind of conversation with the unhurried reader and the reader's part, though mute is essential He must be a 'good listener', he must be patient and allot to Lamb time enough to play with a thought as well as to develop it, he must award a smile to the poor "jokes" that mingle with the good ones told by Elia, he must be able to follow the quick alternations of mood that appear in such essays as "The South Sea House," "Dream Children," and "The Superannuated Man" He must be willing to be irresponsibly playful along with the author who is, at a particular moment, writing "A Dissertation on Roast Pig" or "A Chapter on Ears"

For these reasons it is obvious that the old style personal essay, as written by Lamb and his great contemporary William Hazlitt, is a form of writing to which hasty readers, readers for information, will continue to remain indifferent Such readers read essays as they attend lectures They wish to be informed about a topic on which, it is supposed, the speaker is an expert Or they hope to be given a new set of ideas and they scan these ideas energetically to see whether the lecturer is unsound on crucial issues Lamb demands no such attention, indeed, he suffers from it Lamb does not write to convey ideas or facts or convictions even though his essays are full of all these But his ideas are mostly playful, as in "Samity of True Genius", he aims not to persuade the reader of the truth of a concept but chiefly to provide temporary entertainment by presenting a startling assertion And though his essays abound in facts about old houses and old relatives and old clerks, they are not facts that prove" anything they simply stand as reminders of mileposts along which "Elia" (Lamb's pen name) has passed in his journey—mileposts of which it is amusing to speak. Finally, Elia Lamb is not without convictions, but they are not ideas that command attention because they belong to the abstract level of philosophy. The true, the beautiful, and the good do not exist in Lamb's essays and demand our assent or denial. Lamb's mind seizes little portions of truth that turn up in the daily round. In his world virtue is not a system, it is a fleeting deed or a glance of affection detected in a parlor, over a game of whist. Nor is beauty an intellectual entity, it is, at the most, a hundred tiny little impressions recorded during a summer stroll and now shared with us.

By such perceptions we can come to understand what Lamb's essays offer to us. Originally written for the London Magazine, the essays survive their first appearance in a modest but insistent way. Weightier writing of the time—Coleridge's essays, for example, which were not conversations but lectures and "final" philosophical pronouncements, and similar writings—survive in the "complete works" and become the subject of graduate study. Lamb's essays continue to speak to a small but faithful company of readers who are more drawn by a tone, a sensibility delicate and yet robust, hinting rather than explicit. (Some of this company are probably readers of Jane Austen also, whose ideas may fade but whose perceptions of truth are deathless.)

Doubtless the conditions of Lamb's life, once they are known, add to the interest of the essays. That Lamb had a stammer and could not find a way to complete his education, that he worked through a hundred folios of bookkeeping for the East India Company, that violence and insanity threatened the good cheer of his life, that "Dream Children" was written by a man condemned to solitary life, that "Old China" speaks of luxury that Lamb himself could never possess, that many essays explore old books that Lamb haunted bookstalls to buy—all such knowledge adds to our response to the blend of whimsy, outright jest, and fleeting sentiment in the essays.

This blend was Lamb's own. But it is not without its models in language and form, as Lamb would be ready to admit. It might be said that Lamb's literary tastes caused him to leap backward more than a century. He ignored the essays of Addison and Steele and even more those of Dr. Samuel Johnson, these were writers who tended toward public address, public instruction, and public betterment, whatever they treated. Lamb, who sought an audience of friends rather than a cluster of worshipful inferiors, turned to such seventeenth-century masters as Sir Thomas Browne and Robert Burton, men who wrote before English prose had taken on a cold, instructing, and regular form. Sir Thomas Browne said, "I love to lose myself in O Altitudos" and in such spirit does Lamb love to pursue the small ecstasies of his daily life: the middle class jaunts, the excitements of the card table, and the thrills of inexpensive theatrical attendance. "Tis all mine, none mine" wrote Robert Burton of his disorderly masterpiece, The Anatomy of Melancholy, that vast tissue of quotation and opinionated comment. So might Lamb say, whatever he treats, there are ancient echoes. In these echoes sound the quaint, crabbed spirits of Browne and Burton, and the more generous and still more undisciplined natures of Elizabethan dramatists who, though "minor," were one and all great to Lamb, one of their first "discoverers."

No analysis or digest can suggest to the reader the charm of the Essays of Elia or the Last Essays. They must, if we may use a word play that would please Lamb, not be digested but digested, and that again and again.

ETHICS

Type of work Philosophy

Author Benedictus de Spinoza (1632-1677)

First published 1677

The complete Latin title of Spinoza's masterpiece is Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata. A geometric demonstration of ethics is a novelty in the history of thought, but this work is famous not because of, but in spite of, its novelty of method. The principal advantage of the method is that it reveals Spinoza's thought as clearly as possible, and although the demonstrations may not satisfy critics who concern themselves only with definitions and logical form, they have a strong persuasive force upon those who, already committed to the love of the good and of God, need clarity and structure in their thoughts.

Spinoza begins with definitions, proceeds to axioms (unproved but obviously acceptable), and then to propositions and demonstrations. Obviously, if one must find fault with Spinoza's argument, any place is vulnerable, for one can quarrel about the definitions, doubt the truth of the axioms, or question the validity of the demonstrations. But in order to reject the book it would be necessary to question the integrity and wisdom of Spinoza's spirit, and that would be not only difficult but impertinent to do.

It has long been regarded an error in philosophy to attempt to deduce what men ought to do from a study of what men do, but what Spinoza attempts is a deduction of what men ought to do from a study of what must be, according to his definitions and axioms. The primary criticism of his method, then, is not that he errs—although most critics find errors in Spinoza—but that he tries to use logical means to derive ethical truths. The criticism depends, of course, on the assumption that ethical truths are either matters of fact, not of logic, or else that they are not truths at all but, for example, emotive expressions.

tions of 'cause,' 'finite,' 'substance,' 'attribute,' 'mode,' 'free,' 'eternity,' and 'God,' the latter term being defined to mean 'Being absolutely infinite that is to say, substance consisting of infinite attributes, each one of which expresses eternal and infinite essence.' To understand this definition one must relate it to the definitions of the terms within it—such as 'substance,' 'finite,' and 'attribute'—but one must also resist the temptation to identify the term, so defined, with any conventionally used term. Spinoza's God is quite different from anyone else's God, at least in conception. The point of the definition is that what Spinoza means by 'God' is whatever is 'conceived through itself' (is substance) has no limit to its essential characteristics (has infinite attributes), and maintains its character eternally. As one might suspect, the definition of 'God' is crucial.

The axioms contain such logical and semantical truths as "I. Everything which is, is either in itself or in another," "II. That which cannot be conceived through another must be conceived through itself," "VI. A true idea must agree with that of which it is the idea," and "VII. The essence of that thing which can be conceived as not existing does not involve existence." At first the axioms may be puzzling, but they are not as extraordinary as they seem. The last axiom, for example, number VII, means only that anything which can be thought of as not existing does not by its nature have to exist.

The propositions begin as directly implied by the definitions. "I. Substance is by its nature prior to its modifications" follows from the definitions of "substance" and "mode," and "II. Two substances having different attributes have nothing in common with one another" is another consequence of the definition of

'substance' As the propositions increase, the proofs become longer, making reference not only to definitions but also to previous propositions and their corollaries For those interested in technical philosophy the proofs are intriguing even when they are unconvincing, but for others they are unnecessary, the important thing is to get at Spinoza's central idea

Proposition XI is important in preparing the way for Spinoza's main contention "XI God or substance consisting of infinite attributes, each one of which expresses eternal and infinite essence, necessarily exists" Although one may be tempted to seize upon this proposition as an instrument to use against atheists, it is necessary to remember that the term "God" is a technical term for Spinoza and has little, if anything, to do with the object of religious worship

Proposition XIV soon follows with the startling claim that "Besides God no substance can be nor can be conceived" A corollary of this proposition is the idea that God is one, that is, everything that exists, all of nature, is God Individual things do not by their natures exist, but only through God's action, and God is not only the cause of their existence but also of their natures (XXIV, XXV) We might expect, consequently, that a great deal of the universe is contingent, that is, it depends upon something other than itself and need not be as it is But Spinoza argues in Proposition XXIX that "In Nature, there is nothing contingent, but all things are determined from the necessity of the divine nature to exist and act in a certain manner" Consequently, man's will is not free but necessary (XXXII) This was one of the ideas that made Spinoza unpopular with both Jews and Christians

Having used Part One of the Ethics to develop the conception of God, Spinoza goes on in Part Two, after presenting further definitions and axioms, to explain the nature and origin of mind Here again Spinoza concludes that "In the mind there is no absolute or free will

" (XLVIII) In this section he also develops the idea that God is a thinking and extended being

In Part Three, "On the Origin and Nature of the Emotions," Spinoza argues that emotions are confused ideas "Our mind acts at times and at times suffers" he contends in Proposition I of Part Three, "in so far as it has adequate ideas, it necessarily acts and in so far as it has inadequate ideas, it necessarily suffers" Perhaps it is well to note that Spinoza defines "emotion" as any modification of the body "by which the power of acting of the body itself is increased, diminished, helped, or hindered, together with the ideas of these modifications"

By this time in his book Spinoza has created the idea that God as both thinking and extended substance, is such that all nature is both thinking and extended (since everything that is must be part of God) Another way of putting it is that everything that exists does so both as body and as idea Thus, the human being exists as both body and idea If, then, the human being, as idea does not adequately comprehend the modifications of the human body, the mind suffers

In Part Four, "Of Human Bondage, or of the Strength of the Emotions," Spinoza defines the good as "that which we certainly know is useful to us," and in a series of propositions he develops the idea that each person necessarily desires what he considers to be good, that in striving to preserve his being a man acquires virtue, and that the desire to be happy and to live well involves desiring to act, to live, "that is to say, actually to exist" In this attempt to relate man's freedom to his will to act and in the identification of the good with the striving toward existence, Spinoza anticipated much of the more significant work of the twentieth century Existentialists

In Proposition XXVIII of Part IV, Spinoza writes that "The highest good of the mind is the knowledge of God, and the highest virtue of the mind is to know God" This claim has been prepared for by previous propositions relating the good to what is desired, the desire to action, action to being, and being to God. Because of the intricacy of Spinoza's argument it becomes possible for him to argue that to seek being, to seek the good, to use reason, and to seek God are one and the same. To use reason involves coming to have adequate ideas, having adequate ideas involves knowing the nature of things, knowing the nature of things involves knowing God.

Although it might seem that Spinoza's philosophy, for all its references to God, is egoistic in that this crucial phase of his argument depends upon the claim that each man seeks to preserve his own being, a full examination of Part IV will show that Spinoza manages to transcend the egoistic base of action by arguing that to serve the self best one uses reason but to use reason is to seek an adequate idea of God and, consequently, to seek what is good for all men. In fact, Spinoza specifically states that whatever causes men to live in harmony with one another is profitable and good, and that whatever brings discord is evil.

The highest happiness or blessedness of man, according to Spinoza, is "the peace of mind which springs from the intuitive knowledge of God." This conclusion is certainly consistent with Spinoza's ideas that man's good consists in escaping from the human bondage of the passions, that to escape from the passions is to understand the causes that affect the self, that to understand the causes involves action, and that action leads to God.

When man through rational action comes to determine himself, he participates in the essence of all being, he becomes so at one with God that he possesses an intellectual love of God, which is man's blessedness and virtue. The eternal is known only by the eternal, hence, in knowing God, man makes himself eternal—not in any finite or individual way, but as part of God's being.

Divested of its formal trappings and of those respects in which philosophic imagination outruns credibility—for example, the claim that everything is both thought and extension—Spinoza's philosophy of ethics tells the reader that happiness consists in understanding the causes of things. It might be argued that this idea, so familiar in philosophy, puts more simply than any other concept the kind of faith that makes a man a philosopher. But to understand the causes of things is, as Spinoza concludes, "as difficult as it is rare."

Critique

This sequel to Euphues, which deals less directly with morals and more openly with the psychology of love, is in some ways an improvement over the first book.

Although there is the same dependency on classical sources, such as Pliny and Erasmus, for examples to illustrate truths and for the truths themselves, this work has a better, more coherent plot and depends less on the use of letters from one character to another as a narrative method. The style is, if anything, more graceful and delicate than that in the earlier narrative. Some passages might well please the more fastidious modern reader, and certainly most of the book pleased the Elizabethan reader. Perhaps the most pleased was Queen Elizabeth, since much of the book is taken up with praise of England, Englishmen, and the queen herself. Also of interest to Lyly's contemporaries, undoubtedly, were the extensive and often penetrating passages on the many facets of love. Much sound advice is freely given among the characters, and the events in the plot serve to support the wisdom embodied in action and character.

The Story

As they had previously planned, Euphues and Philautus embarked from Athens for England. During the two-month voyage Euphues offered Philautus considerable counsel on how to behave while in the strange country, and cautioned him especially about his penchant for falling too easily in love. To illustrate his point, Euphues told the tale of young Callimachus, who learned through bitter experience the perils of travel. Euphues closed his discourse with a description of the island to which they sailed.

Upon their arrival, the two young men encountered Fidus, an old man who kept bees. After telling them of the folly of discussing the queen, about whom they had asked, Fidus illustrated for them the principles of a sensible monarchy by describing his colony of bees, with its queen, workers, and drones. Upon the urging of Philautus, he also told them of his own unhappy experience when he fell in love with a young maiden who loved another man and who died of grief after her lover was killed in a distant land. This experience had led Fidus to retire to beekeeping in a secluded area near Dover.

Leaving the old gentleman with thanks for his hospitality and his story, Euphues and Philautus proceeded toward London. The trip was largely taken up with an other warning by Euphues to Philautus about the dangers of love, advice given in spite of the Italian's vehement denials of any such weakness.

Soon the two strangers arrived in London, where they were welcomed because of their wit and address. Admitted into court circles, they were delighted with English virtue and charm. Philautus' eye soon fell upon Camilla, a young maiden not of high birth but of great beauty and virtue. He fell immediately, and hopelessly, in love. After a heated debate with himself about his plight, Philautus was discovered by Euphues, who began praising English women for their beauty and virtue. Philautus stopped his friend and accused him of being in love. The two young men quarreled, and Euphues moved to new lodgings.

At a masque, Philautus revealed his affection to Camilla, who received his overtures coldly. After further rebuffs he went to an Italian sorcerer in search of a charm to win his beloved. The sorcerer told Philautus that stories of such spells of love, about which he told many popular tales, were all false and that only God, who made the human heart, could govern its inclinations. He advised Philautus to write to his love of his devotion.

The young Italian did so several times, one letter being secretly transported to Camilla in the hollowed-out core of a pomegranate and her reply returned in a volume of Petrarch. Camilla still refused his love, however, and soon she refused to answer his letters. During his pursuit of Camilla, which took place mostly at the house of Lady Flavia, his hostess introduced Philautus to Frances, a girl who was almost as beautiful as Camilla and quite as witty and virtuous. She engaged with him in several debates about love and looked with considerably more favor upon the young Italian.

Philautus, finally convinced of the hopelessness of his love for Camilla, who was also courted by Surius, a young English nobleman, began to feel strongly the loss of his friendship with Euphues. After an exchange of letters, in which Philautus begged his former friend's pardon, the two young men were reunited.

At a party given by Lady Flavia, Camilla and Surius, Frances and Philautus, and Lady Flavia and an old friend engaged in a three-sided debate which Euphues judged wisely taking the middle ground, he declared that virtue and honor must be part of love for both the man and the woman, and he praised that higher love which is above lust. At the party Philautus discovered that he was very fond of Frances, and Camilla realized that she loved Surius.

While Philautus wooed Frances in the country, Euphues remained in London to study the court and English ways. Before long, however, he was called back to Athens by urgent business. From his home Euphues wrote his Euphues' Glass for Europe, in which he praised at some length English life, the English court, and, especially, the English sovereign whose beauty, chastity, and wisdom Euphues declared to be perfect.

In a letter from Philautus, Euphues learned of his friend's plan to marry Frances, of Camilla's marriage to Surius, and of the good wishes of his English friends. Euphues replied with a long letter containing counsel for his friend concerning the management of a marriage. Then the wise Athenian retired to a distant mountain for study and meditation.

Critique

Unquestionably the greatest contribution of Lyly's romance to the development of the English novel was the style of the writing. Although the "euphuistic" style, characterized by numerous similes, the use of countless examples taken from nature and mythology, frequent rhetorical questions, balanced sentence construction, and alliteration, had appeared earlier in English prose, no one before Lyly had used it so skillfully or with such persistence. As always, Lyly's intention was to refine the manners of an era that realized its need for delicacy and sophistication. There is, in addition, a strong strain of moralistic didacticism in Euphues, which was also written to oppose Italian influences in the court of Queen Elizabeth. Athens is generally accepted to have been, in Lyly's mind, a symbol of Oxford University, and he addressed a brief epilogue to the "Gentlemen Scholars of Oxford." What little plot there is in Euphues is probably based on some of Lyly's own experiences during his college days, but the story is less important for its own sake than as a vehicle for ornately written digressions, so that its essential purpose, the development of a graceful and ornate prose style, is undeniably well achieved. That the Elizabethan age welcomed such a development is shown by the fact that the extreme popularity of Euphues gave the name that still clings to the kind of writing which Lyly perfected.

Euphues, a young gentleman of Athens, was graced by nature with great personal beauty and by fortune with a large patrimony, but he used his brilliant wit to enjoy the pleasures of wickedness rather than the honors of virtue. In his search for new experiences the young man went to Naples, a city famed for loose living. There he found many eager to encourage a waste of time and talent, but he was ever cautious, trusting no one and taking none for a friend. Thus he escaped real harm from the company of idle youths with whom he associated.

An elderly gentleman of Naples, Eubulus, one day approached Euphues and admonished the young man for his easy ways, warning him of the evil results that were sure to follow and urging him to be merry with modesty and reserve. In a witty reply Euphues rebuffed the old man's counsel and told him that his pious urgings only resulted from his withered old age. So in spite of the sage warning, Euphues remained in Naples, and after two months there he met a pleasing young man named Philautus, whom he determined to make his only and eternal friend. Philautus, impressed by the charm of Euphues, readily agreed to be his firm friend forever. Their friendship grew, and the two young men soon became inseparable.

Philautus had long before earned the affection and trust of Don Ferardo, a prominent official of Naples, and had fallen in love with his beautiful daughter Lucilla. While Don Ferardo was on a trip to Naples, Philautus took his friend with him to visit Lucilla and a group of her friends. After dinner Euphues was given the task of entertaining the company with an extemporaneous discourse on love. He declared that one should love another for his mind, not for his appearance. When the conversation turned to a discussion of constancy, Lucilla asserted that her sex was wholly fickle. Euphues began to dispute her, but, suddenly struck by Lucilla's beauty and confused by his feelings, he broke off his speech and quickly left.

Lucilla discovered that she was attracted to the young Athenian. After weighing the respective claims of Euphues and Philautus on her affections, she convinced herself that it would not be wrong to abandon Philautus for Euphues, however, she decided to pretend to each that he was her only love. Euphues, meanwhile, had persuaded himself that Lucilla must be his in spite of Philautus' friendship must give way before love. In order to deceive his friend, Euphues pretended to be in love with Livia, Lucilla's friend. Philautus was overjoyed and promised to help him win Livia.

The two young men went immediately to the house of Don Ferardo. While Philautus was attending the governor, who had finally completed arrangements for his daughter's marriage to the young man, Euphues and Lucilla engaged in a subtle debate about love and finally declared their passion for each other. When Don Ferardo told his daughter of his plans for her marriage to Philautus, she told him of her love for Euphues.

Philautus, betrayed at once by both his friend and his beloved, blamed now one and now the other. He wrote a scathing letter to Euphues, saying that they were friends no longer and that he hoped Euphues would soon be in his own unhappy situation, for Lucilla, having proved untrue, might be faithless again. Euphues replied in a taunting letter that deception in love is natural. He expressed confidence that Lucilla would be faithful to him forever

After what had happened, however, it was impossible for Euphues to visit Lucilla while her father was at home. During her lover's absence she fell in love again, this time with Curio, a gentleman who possessed neither wealth nor wit. When Euphues at last went to apologize for being away so long, Lucilla replied curtly that she had hoped his absence would be longer. Admitting that her new lover was inferior to both Philautus and Euphues, she supposed God was punishing her for her fickleness. Although she realized that her life was likely to be unhappy, a fate she had earned, she did not hesitate to scorn Euphues. Don Ferardo argued that it was her filial duty to give up the worthless Curio. When she refused, her father died of grief not long after.

Having renewed his friendship with Philautus before departing from Naples, Euphues left with his friend a written discourse against the folly of love. Saying that love, although it started with pleasure, ended in destruction and grief, he urged his friend to forget passion and to turn his attention toward more serious pursuits.

After returning to Athens, where he engaged in long hours of study, Euphues wrote a treatise on the proper way to rear a child. With the weakness of his own upbringing in mind, since it had not steered him away from the shoals of sloth and wickedness, he urged that a young man should be legitimately born and should be brought up under the influence of three major forces: nature, reason, and use. In this manner the young man would be educated in the ways of virtue as well as in the customs of use.

Euphues wrote many other letters and treatises. In one he urged the gentlemen scholars of Athens to study with the laws of God in mind, in another he debated with an atheist and converted him to godliness, a letter to Philautus encouraged him to abandon his dissolute life in Naples, in a letter to Eubulus, Euphues thanked the old man for his good advice and told him of his return to righteousness. Another letter to Philautus expressed regret at the death of Lucilla and at the irreligious character of her life. Two letters to a pair of young men told them to accept their destiny and to live virtuously, in response to a letter in which Livia told of her intention to be virtuous, Euphues praised her and told her of Philautus' possible visit to Athens.

Cervantes, the great novelist of Spain's Golden Age (1554-1616), had two ambitions: to compose deathless poetry, and to write excellent drama. As a poet, he finally confessed that he was "more experienced in reverses than in verses." In drama he was no more fortunate. In spite of such confidence that he once signed a contract to supply the finest plays the manager had ever seen or not expect payment, he knew too little about dramatic technique to be successful. Only his short plays continue to be read as "slices of life" One of the most pathetic titles ever given a book was his Eight Comedies and Eight Interludes Never Performed, which he could publish only because of the fame acquired through the success of Don Quixote

In his fiction, the story was otherwise But Cervantes remained a nonconformist Don Quixote was conceived as a parody to laugh out of existence the romances of chivalry, though the last of that lot had appeared nearly half a century earlier It turned into a deeply human novel that is read today with never a thought of its author's avowed purpose

He was also the first writer of short stories in Spain, a form quite different from the ejemplo or instructive story of the early days of Juan Manuel and the Archpriest of Hita It was the romantic Italian novella that inspired Cervantes He added the adjective "exemplary," to indicate that his short fiction contained none of the immorality associated with his Italian models The modern reader will look in vain, however, for the "useful examples" that he proclaimed them to be

Of the twelve, some are built on complicated romantic plots that would naturally appeal to a thwarted playwright Others grew out of his own experiences Since Spaniards were enjoying tales in which rascally servants satirized the professions of their masters, Cervantes also wrote several picaresque stories, one with dogs as spokesmen Another deals with a crazy student who believed himself made of glass In the Exemplary Novels, which reveal a care and attention to style not found in Don Quixote, Cervantes established himself as a master of this genre

After a preface, worth preserving for the self-portrait of the author, Cervantes presents, in "Lady Cornelia," a cape and sword romance close to the Italian school Courtied and betrayed by an Italian duke, the hapless heroine was finally befriended by two Spanish students to whom a servant had delivered her newborn child, as they passed in the darkness Eventually they arranged a marriage between her and her betrayer "The Prevalence of Blood" also deals with a child born of violence, whose beauty, along with the virtue and charm of the wronged mother, won the heart of the libertine father seven years later

Another of the weaker stories in the volume is "The Spanish English Lady," about a girl of Cadiz captured by Admiral Howard and carried to England It, like "The Generous Lover," set in Cyprus and Algiers, reveals how uninterested the author was in authentic local color He made no attempt to capture the pomp of the Elizabethan court

"The Two Damsels" is the adventure story of Theodosia, disguised as a man On a journey in pursuit of the suitor who had promised to marry her, she was recognized by her brother Later the two came upon another masquerading damsel who was searching for the same vanished lover After adventures among robbers and a visit to the fleet as it was about to sail for Naples, Theodosia found and married her fleeing sweetheart, while her brother comforted the runner up in this matrimonial race

In "The Little Gypsy Girl," a story about idealized Preciosa, Cervantes revealed his ignorance of gypsies One of Preciosa's suitors, a rich nobleman who spent two years with the tribe in order to woo her, killed a bully After all the gypsy men had been taken to jail Preciosa visited the mayor's wife to vouch for their innocence Then came the explanation of her own charm and discretion The noble lady recognized Preciosa as her own long-lost daughter

In "The Illustrious Scullery Maid," one youngster, listing the attractions and adventures offered by various Spanish cities, echoes Cervantes' own nostalgic reminiscences of an ill-spent youth The youngster and another wealthy sixteen year old went disguised on a journey in search of thrills They stopped at an inn in Burgos because they had heard of a beautiful servant, Costanza, to be found there. So attractive was she that the young men took jobs at the inn to compete with the son of the mayor for her affection. When the mayor himself came to investigate the scullery maid, he was told that she was really the daughter of a wronged widow who had left her at the inn, with half a chain as identification. Shortly afterward, the father of one of the runaways appeared with the other half of the chain. The other runaway married her, his friend was paired off with the daughter of the mayor, and Costanza's original suitor had to be content with the sister of Costanza's husband.

For relief from these romantic cape-and-sword stories, Cervantes attempted a psychological tale dealing with his favorite theme, an April and December marriage. In "The Jealous Estremaduran," a seventy-year-old Spaniard, returning with a fortune from Peru, married a fifteen-year-old girl and shielded her so carefully that the air of mystery surrounding her aroused the curiosity of handsome Loaysa. By dressing as a guitar-playing beggar and drugging the husband with a sleep-producing ointment, he was able to enter the house. Although the girl was too noble to be tempted, the husband discovered them and died of jealousy. Before his death, to punish himself for thinking that at his age he could make a young girl happy, he willed his fortune to her so that she could marry Loaysa.

"A Decentful Marriage," the most unmoral of these Exemplary Novels, serves chiefly as introduction for a better one. A poor soldier married a fallen woman to reform her. She tricked him and got all his money, and he ended up in a Valladolid hospital, through whose window he heard and set down "The Dialog between Cipion and Berganza, Dogs of the Hospital of the Resurrection." In the same way that pícaros often satirized their masters' callings, Berganza told of the crookedness he had seen. As a pup, at the Seville slaughter house, he became acquainted with graft. As a sheep dog, he watched shepherds totally unlike the figures in the pastoral novels, men who killed the best sheep and put the blame on wolves. As the pet of a rich merchant, he mocked the ostentation he witnessed. Later, while helping a constable, he was a party to an agreement by which the students of Monipodio's school of crime were to fake a fight, thus enhancing the reputation of the police force. Berganza also served a soldier, a gipsy, a miser, a poet, and the company of actors with whom he had arrived in Valladolid. As he ended his autobiography, the dawn was breaking. The other dog promised to narrate his adventures on the following night.

"Doctor Glass Case" provided Cervantes with other opportunities to criticize social conditions of his time. Some students on their way to the University of Salamanca came upon Tomás Rodaja and took him along as their servant. During his spare time Tomás attended classes and after eight years attained a reputation for brilliance. But an unfortunate love affair drove him insane with the delusion that he was made of fragile glass. His agile mind, however, could still supply answers to any question, and people amused themselves by asking his opinions about professions and customs. Asked if he was a poet, for instance, he replied "I have never been so foolish as to be a bad poet, nor so bold as to think I could be a good one." Questioned how to avoid envying others, he advised "Sleep, for while you sleep you are the equal of everybody." Eventually Tomás was restored to sanity, but no one noticed him then. To make a living, he joined the army. He was killed in Flanders.

Best known of all the Exemplary Novels is "Rinconete and Cortadillo," an authentic story of customs which influenced Charles Dickens. Two fourteen-year-old boys, Pedro de Rincón and Diego Cortado, met on their way to Seville. Since they both boasted of their cleverness and ability as cardsharps, purse snatchers, and general rascals, they joined forces to fleece a mule driver with marked cards. Then they traveled on to the Andalusian capital where, under bad government, crime flourished. To meet competition, the boys enrolled in Monipodio's school for criminals and were nicknamed Runconete and Cortadillo. They saw flourishing a crime trust where rich people could hire bullies to beat up their enemies and police could pick up protection money. Only a few of the crimes of these rascals are narrated.

Cervantes declared the story already over long, but he promised a sequel later.

In Exemplary Novels there are stories whose invention and style would have established Cervantes' reputation among his contemporaries if he had never penned Don Quixote. Some are poetic, some realistic. It would be possible to compile a lengthy list of English and French dramatists and novelists who have drawn upon them for inspiration ever since.

James Joyce, one of the most influential writers during the first half of the century, was preoccupied, as were many of his contemporaries, with the creation of new and meaningful forms of expression and the effort to speak truly of his age. His constant themes were Irish myths and mores, art, sexuality, and aesthetic integrity. Within this pattern Exiles can be considered a part of the continuing development of his genius, since it falls in the period which saw the completion of A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and the beginning of Ulysses. As theater, however, the play lacks the force of Ibsen's work, by which Joyce was greatly influenced, and it lacks also the plasticity and vibrancy of his own fiction. Its importance lies in the fact that this is Joyce's last objective study of the conscience of the artist, his final portrait of the artist as man. The themes are expressed at various levels of conflict, the resolution, where effected, is through integrity and single heartedness. Both Beatrice and Robert are seen to have compromised with the world or within themselves, thus they are incapable of self fulfillment. Richard, as the artist, is dependent solely on his own intellectual and emotional values, and the same self reliance informs his love; he is thus armored against enervating sentimentality and the moral anarchy of the modern world.

The Story

Richard Rowan and Bertha, unmarried lovers, returned from Italy with their eight year old son Archie to Dublin, where, although physically at home, they were in spiritual exile. The two people most involved in their return were Robert and Beatrice, first cousins once engaged to be married. Robert, however, had always been dominated by Richard's ideas and was tenuously in love with Bertha. When he recognized Bertha's love for Richard, he had been gradually drawn to Beatrice, who was in love with him. But she too had always been fascinated by Richard, and had found that without him charming but weak Robert became a mere cipher. Finally, her engagement to Robert had been broken off—a situation from which Beatrice, as she told Richard, was still convalescing.

Richard had thus been the dominant force behind at least three sensitive and intelligent people in their youth. In maturity, his physical passions and his commitment to people still complemented his ideals of freedom and integrity. This fact was demonstrated in a conversation with Robert who, while explaining his eagerness to promote Richard's academic career, had declared that he found in Richard the same faith that a disciple has in his master. Richard answered cryptically that this was a master's faith in the disciple who would eventually betray him. In this fashion he was trying to indicate to Robert, who had uneasily become the editor of a conventional Dublin newspaper, his desire to avoid influencing those he loved while remaining wholly loyal to them.

In somewhat the same fashion Richard desired to be united with Bertha, but not to be bound or to bind, even in love. In Italy, Richard had been absorbed in his writing and Bertha was often sad and lonely. She had remained devoted to him but understood neither his aesthetic standards nor his ethics. In marked contrast was his wholly objective relationship with Beatrice. She had always understood what he wrote and was fascinated by his unique courage. Through his exile they had corresponded about his writing, and on his return Beatrice came to his house to give piano lessons to Archie. Upon renewed contact, Richard found that there was much in Beatrice's character that he could use in his current novel. This was the most vital bond between them.

Through perversity of passion Bertha identified herself with Richard and thus saw his relationship with Beatrice as a love affair. Her concern caused her to crystallize her feeling of loss toward him, and she turned to Robert, whom she had always liked because he too looked up to Richard. She subsequently explored Robert's feelings for her and for a time passively accepted his wooing. Once, when Robert visited the house, he brought Bertha roses, a gesture of courtship which confused and moved her. At that meeting they kissed and Bertha agreed that they must meet somewhere alone and talk together freely. She half promised to meet Robert at his house that evening.

When Richard questioned Bertha about Robert, she answered willingly. At that time he was distressed neither by her involvement nor by Robert's love for her, but he was angered to learn that she was to meet Robert at the same hour as he, at Robert's arrangement, was to meet the vice-chancellor of the university, where Richard was being considered for the chair of romance literature. He felt that this plan was a betrayal of everything that each of them stood for and that Robert was both a fool and a thief. Richard decided to see Robert himself. His intention infuriated Bertha, who felt that he would simply rob her of their friend's love and respect.

Having expected Bertha, Robert was disconcerted by Richard's arrival, but when Richard explained why he had come, Robert was most eager to talk to him. While they talked Richard revealed his own fears and doubts. He felt that by refusing to advise Bertha or to ask anything of her he might have neglected her, as she had accused him. The conflict between personal integrity and love for another person was very real to Richard, he realized that it was an inevitable one, yet he felt that his guilt had destroyed Bertha's innocence. He expressed to Robert his willingness to let her go if Robert felt that she would find fulfillment with him. Faced with this need to accept moral responsibility, Robert faltered. Richard feared that he would ultimately desert Bertha as he had other women in the past.

Richard admitted that he had desired some kind of betrayal that would enable him to redeem, through the rebuilding of his soul, his guilt and shame. In answer Robert wildly suggested a duel, but it would be a duel between the ghost of fidelity on one side, of friendship on the other. Richard declared wearily that such had been the language of his youth, expressing emotions of which he was no longer capable. Completely disoriented by Richard's rejection of his heroic pose, and distracted by his emotions, Robert fled when Bertha arrived.

The talk between Richard and Bertha in Robert's cottage led to a partial resolution of their conflict. Bertha was overwhelmed by Richard's apparent lack of faith in her, while he was angered that she was using Robert's love without herself loving him. For the last time she begged Richard to guide her; he merely repeated his statement of faith in her and left the house. When Robert returned, Bertha was uneasy with him and maintained against all persuasion that she could never betray Richard.

Having survived her period of crisis with Robert, Bertha was repossessed by the problem of Beatrice and Richard. After a sleepless night she told Richard that she wished she could meet her lover freely. Only later in conversation with Robert, who planned to leave Ireland, did Richard realize what Bertha had meant, that she wished she could freely revive her former relationship with him. Out of this desire she was able to accept Richard's account of his relationship with Beatrice. Thus they arrived at a point where they could stay together while continuing to live as independent individuals, self-exiled from the passions and the romantic notions of their youth.

The end of World War II was only a few months away when Faulkner started this novel about World War I. In search of a more universal background he left his native surroundings and the fictional world of his Yoknapatawpha County because the battlefields of France seemed more suitable for his religious allegory. Nine years later he completed the novel, probably the most thorough endeavor in the twentieth century to create a mythical work by using elements of the Gospel. Nowhere in the book does the author indicate that this represents a modern version of the Christ story, but it is quite obvious that parts of the story of the Passion and Crucifixion are methodically woven into the novel. It would be useless, however, to indicate comparisons between the New Testament and A Fable, as critics are likely to disagree for years to come about the intentions of the author. However, any attempt to describe the novel simply as a partial retelling of the Christ story fails to do justice to a book which, even in its mythical elements, points to the creative power of a strong individualist who defies all efforts of classification for himself and his work.

The Story

On a Monday in May, 1918, a most unusual event took place on a battlefield in France where French and German troops faced one another after four years of trench warfare. At dawn the regiment under the command of General Gragnon refused to attack. Another unbelievable event occurred when the Germans, who were expected to take advantage of the mutiny, did not move either. At noon the whole sector of the front stopped firing and soon the rest of the front came to a standstill. Division Commander Gragnon requested execution of all three thousand mutineers, he also demanded his own arrest.

On Wednesday the lorries carrying the mutinous regiment arrived at headquarters in Chaumesmont, where the dishonor brought on the town aroused the people to noisy demonstration. Relatives and friends of the mutineers knew that a Corporal and his squad of twelve, moving in a mysterious way behind the lines, had succeeded in spreading their ideas about peace on earth and good will toward men among the troops. Four of the thirteen men were not Frenchmen by birth, among those only the Corporal spoke French, and he was the object of the crowd's fury.

This situation created uncertainty among the allied generals because a war ended by mutiny was not reconcilable with military principles. To clarify the confusion a conference took place to which a German general was invited, and agreement was reached for continuation of the war.

To young Flight Officer David Levine the unsuspected pause in war meant tragedy. Determined to find glory in battle, but realizing that he might miss his opportunity he committed suicide. To another soldier, the Runner, the truce at the front was a welcome sign. A former officer, he had rejected submissive principles and abuse of authority by superiors, and he had been returned to the ranks. Having heard about the Corporal from the Reverend Tobe Sutterfield, an American colored preacher who had arrived under unexplainable circumstances in France, the Runner tried to show once again the power of the Corporal's ideas. He forced a sentry, who profited by collecting fees for life insurance among the soldiers, to leave the trenches and join a British battalion in a peaceful walk toward the German line. When they showed their empty hands, the Germans also came unarmed to meet the French. A sudden artillery barrage by French and German guns killed the sentry and crippled the Runner.

The man to decide the fate of the mutineers was the Commander in Chief of the Allied Armies, an aged French Marshal. The orphaned son of a prominent family, he had attended France's St Cyr. There his unselfish attitude combined with his devotion to studies had made him an outstanding and beloved student. Especially attracted to him was the man who was now his Quartermaster General. After leaving school, the Marshal had been stationed in the Sahara, where he incurred blood guilt by sacrificing a brutal legionnaire to tribal justice. Later he spent several years in a Tibetan monastery. In the Middle East he had met a married woman with two daughters. This affair resulted in the birth of a son in a stable at Christmas. The mother died in childbirth, and Marthe, one of the daughters, cared for the boy. When World War I broke out, the Marshal became the Allied commander and the hope of France.

The mutinous troops were kept in a former factory building while awaiting trial. The Marshal, not surprised by the court proceedings, seemed to anticipate all answers. Marthe and Marya, the Corporal's half sisters, and his wife arrived in Chaulnesmont and in an interview with the Marshal revealed that the Corporal was his son. Marthe had married a French farmer, Dumont, and the boy had grown up on her farm. Soon after the outbreak of war, he had enlisted in the army and received a medal for bravery in action. He had married a former prostitute from Marseilles. Again the old Marshal was not surprised and seemed to know every detail.

On Thursday a meal was served to the squad during which it became known that soldier Polchek had betrayed the Corporal. Another soldier, Pierre Bouc, denied his leader twice. After the meal the Corporal was called away to meet the Marshal. On a hill overlooking the town the Marshal tried to explain the futility of his son's martyrdom. When he promised a secret ocean passage to escape the death penalty, the Corporal refused the offer. Later the Marshal made a last attempt to influence his son with the help of an army priest. Recognizing his own unworthiness before the humble Corporal, the priest committed suicide. On the same evening General Gragnon was executed by an American soldier named Buchwald.

On Friday the Corporal was tied to a post between two murderers. Shot, he fell into a coil of barbed wire that lacerated his head. The Corporal's body and his medal were buried on the Dumont farm near St Mihiel. After the burial a sudden artillery barrage plowed the earth leaving no trace of the Corporal's grave.

After the war a unit was sent to reclaim a body to be placed in the Unknown Soldier's tomb under the Arc de Triomphe in Paris. As reward they were promised brandy. Near Verdun they obtained a body and drank the brandy. While they were guarding the coffin, an old woman approached. Having lost her mind because her son had not returned from the war, she had sold her farm in order to search for him. Knowing about the mission of the soldiers, she wanted to look at the body. Convinced that the dead soldier was her son, she offered all her money for the corpse, the soldiers accepted and bought more brandy with the money. They secured another body from a field adjoining the Dumont farm. Thus the body of the Corporal reached Paris. Four years later the Runner visited the Dumont farm and picked up the medal.

Six years later the Marshal's body was carried to the Arc de Triomphe, with dignitaries of the Western world following the coffin on foot to pay their respects to the dead leader. As soon as the eulogy started a cripple made his way through the crowd. It was the Runner, who threw the Corporal's medal at the caisson before an angry mob closed in and attacked him. Rescued by the police he was dragged into a side street, where a few curious onlookers gathered around the injured cripple. While he lay in the gutter a man resembling the old Quartermaster General stepped forward to comfort the Runner, who declared that he would never die.

Type of work Didactic poetry

Author Jean de La Fontaine (1621 1695)

First published Books I VI, 1668, Books VII XI, 1673 1679, Book XII, 1694

Jean de La Fontaine was an easygoing absent minded, middle class Frenchman who became one of the literary ornaments of France's Golden Age Impervious to discipline—except in his writing—he was a lover of pleasure, a vagabond and dreamer, who had a special talent for attracting the patronage and protection of important people Thus, he became a hanger on of Fouquet while that minister of Louis XIV was still wealthy and powerful and when fate caught up with Fouquet, La Fontaine drifted on to other alliances, chiefly with women, which allowed him to work and live in comfort and security

The literary career of La Fontaine was somewhat slow in getting started First, he played with the idea of becoming a churchman or a lawyer Then he contracted an ill-advised marriage with a romantic adolescent ten years younger than he Turning his back on these early distractions, he began to write at the age of thirty, encouraged and stimulated by his friendship with Racine and Molière The first result of his efforts was a fairly successful adaptation of the Eunuchus of Terence This was followed by various short poems and by lively verse tales translated from or inspired by Ariosto and Boccaccio La Fontaine's career was climaxed by his election to the French Academy, a victory somewhat dimmed by the reaction of Louis XIV, who withheld his confirmation until after the Academy had first installed Boileau

The celebrated Fables of La Fontaine, remarkable for both their range and their poetry, have come to be recognized as their author's greatest achievement These animal stories in verse, after the style of Aesop and Phaedrus, brought him his greatest contemporary popularity and his surest hold on lasting fame Public reaction to the Fables was immediate and enthusiastic, though some classical critics disapproved of La Fontaine's liberties in versification and his use of colloquial language His style, however, was perfectly fitted to his subject matter, and Charles Perrault, a contemporary writer of fairy stories and the originator of Mother Goose, declared him greater than the fable writers of antiquity

The twelve books of the Fables were issued at intervals over a period of years which extended from 1668 to 1694 Books I VI, dedicated to the young Dauphin appeared in 1668, Books VII XI, bearing a prefatory eulogy to Madame de Montespan, occupied the period between 1673 and 1679 and the final volume, inscribed to the young Duke of Burgundy, was added the year before the author's death

Born storyteller though he was, La Fontaine was not a particularly original one It is the pleasure of recognition rather than the joy of discovery which awaits most readers of his early fables A volume by Phaedrus, published in 1596, has been found to supply most of the stories in his first six volumes, with French folk tales providing the rest Also, scholars have traced many of the fables in the last six books to translation of some Persian tales in Le Livre des Lumières (1644) To compensate for any lack of originality, La Fontaine generally improved on his sources One critic has summed up the appeal of his fables by commenting on their threefold attraction children delight in their freshness and vividness adult readers recognize their subtle reflection of life and character, and critics admire the consummate art of their narration

Lessons are inherent in the fables, as the first three are quick to show "The Grasshopper and the Ant" (the rewards of diligence), "The Fox and the Crow"

(the dangers of flattery), and "The Frog Who Would Be an Ox" (the error of striving to keep up with those higher placed socially or financially). Yet, since La Fontaine was obviously epicurean by instinct, the "morals" of his fables were far from his chief concern. Always the shrewd, amused observer rather than the preacher, La Fontaine devoted himself to the pictures he could sketch and to the truth he could disclose. Sometimes he omitted the moral entirely, on other occasions he gave it a new twist. For instance, in the second fable of Book II, the author told of the rooster who took a pearl to a jeweler, offering to trade it for a grain of millet. Instead of belaboring the point of the story, La Fontaine reinforced it by adding a parallel (and original) example. In the latter a Blockhead was bequeathed a valuable manuscript which he took to a nearby connoisseur, remarking that he would rather have a halfpenny than the rarity which he had inherited.

After 1668, when La Fontaine brought out the first six books of the Fables, several years elapsed before he resumed this type of writing. When he eventually did the fables were longer and more elaborate than the earlier ones. Often based on Persian originals, they contained subject matter more unfamiliar. They still, however, served the author well in his role as observer and critic, as the introductory fable of Book VII demonstrates. A terrible plague brought the animals together to discover whose sin was being punished by heaven. The lion admitted to serious crimes, including the senseless killing of sheep and shepherds, but no one dared suggest that he be made a sacrifice to placate the gods. Other animals, almost as fierce and strong as the lion, told of their misdeeds but were likewise absolved. Finally the inoffensive ass acknowledged that he had once nuzzled grass beside a church. Then the beasts all joined in a clamor for his death, and La Fontaine concluded with these words, in a biting comparison with human courts of justice:

Thus human courts acquit the strong
And doom the weak as therefore wrong

La Fontaine had apparently abandoned his fables permanently after 1679; however, in 1694, Volume XII appeared in response to a request made by the Duke of Burgundy. This final section showed that the seventy-three-year-old teller of tales had lost none of his former skill. The initial poem, serving as an introduction to the remainder, told of the men of Ulysses' crew and of their transformation into animals. When Ulysses wanted them restored to human form they protested that they were better off as animals. Using this incident as a springboard, La Fontaine then offered stories, with animals in the leading roles, on which the duke might use his judgment in accepting or rejecting. One of these fulfilled a special desire of the duke, who had asked La Fontaine to write a fable called "The Cat and the Mouse." In it, a young mouse tries to argue a veteran mouser out of eating him, only to be told:

"Youth always hopes its ends to gain,
Believes all spirits like its own
Old age is not to mercy prone."

Works as widely read as the Fables naturally inspired many cross currents of discussion and comment. One interesting speculation, now generally discounted, was Taine's idea that La Fontaine's parables consciously satirized the monarchy of Louis XIV. The more plausible view, however, is that the author was an observer of mankind at large—a gently humorous one, given to a tolerant attitude and dedicated to the glorification of common sense. Fortunately for the effective projection of these qualities, La Fontaine also employed a painstaking art and care which have placed him in the front rank of French literary craftsmen.

Critique

Sir Walter Scott in this novel sets his finely drawn fictional and historical characters against the background of the rise to power of the Earl of Douglas, the Scottish leader who fought against Percy at the famous battle of Chevy Chase. The author is justly praised for his ability to create living beings. The characters of The Fair Maid of Perth do not stand out among Scott's greatest creations, but they are believable and interesting, good and bad exist among both the nobility and the citizenry and are present in each individual in varying degrees. It is his picture of human nature that makes Scott's novels worth rereading many times.

The Story

As Catharine Glover and her father Simon walked to Mass, an unidentified young nobleman, muffled in a cloak, joined them and asked the girl's permission to come to her window the next morning to take part in the traditional Valentine ritual. When she sensibly refused to make any alliance above her social standing, he left her in anger.

A welcome guest, Henry Gow, appeared at the Glovers' that evening, he had just returned from a trip on which he had sold armor throughout Scotland. Although Simon approved heartily of Henry's suit for Catharine's hand, she was disturbed by his propensity for quarreling. His fiery spirit led him to rise up vigorously that evening against Conachar, Simon's Highlander apprentice, who jealously poured a tankard of beer on the armorer and then tried to stab him.

Henry's martial bent was put to better use the next morning when, coming to present himself to Catharine as her Valentine, he discovered a party of men attempting to climb into her room. While fighting them off, he severed the hand of one assailant. Again a mysterious nobleman was involved. When Simon heard his voice he sent Henry into his house and freed the other. In gratitude for Henry's protection, Catharine agreed to be his Valentine, but she would not promise to marry him, even though, as she assured him, she was not in love with Conachar, who had just returned to his Highland home, or any other man.

King Robert was discussing with his confessor the rising power of the Earl of Douglas when that great nobleman arrived at the castle in time to see his son-in-law, the Duke of Rothsay, kiss a traveling glee maiden The "Black Douglas," infuriated, threatened to kill both the prince and the innocent girl The Duke of Albany, King Robert's brother James, and another nobleman calmed the two men, and Rothsay committed the girl to the care of Henry, who had just entered the courtyard engaged in a scuffle with some of Douglas men Although he was reluctant to accept such a charge, especially on the day he had become Catharine's Valentine, he took the girl home with him and sent her on to Dundee the next morning

The council which followed Rothsay's foolish flirtation revealed the tensions surrounding the weak and easily influenced king After King Robert had prevented a duel between the arch rivals, the earls of March and Douglas, March stalked out to join the English Albany and the prince, too, were obviously struggling for control over king and country

As these personal conflicts smoldered, the men discussed the enmity between Clans Quhele and Chattan and decided to settle it by setting the bravest men from each group against each other in a combat to be fought before the king After Douglas had gone, the king and Albany questioned the prince about the early morning disturbance at Simon's house, reported to them by Sir Patrick Charteris, provost of Perth Confronted with a ring found at Simon's house, Rothsay confessed that he had been present, the ring belonged to Sir John Ramorny, his Master of Horse Rothsay agreed to dismiss Ramorny, whom both older men regarded as an evil influence over the young prince

Conachar came back to Perth briefly at Catharine's request that he give refuge to Father Clement, her confessor, who had been accused of heresy The Highlander told her that he was the son of the chief of Clan Quhele and that his real name was Eochin (Hector) MacIain As he promised protection for Father Clement he hunted also at his love for Catharine

Ramorny, owner of the hand cut off in Perth, planned vengeance on his assailant with Henbane Dwining, an apothecary who was jealous of Henry's power and influence Having gained only a mild revenge by spreading the tale of Henry's association with the glee maiden, he was eager to help Ramorny plot Henry's assassination

That night, as Shrovetide revelers milled about Perth, Oliver Proudfoot, a well meaning but tactless burgher assured the still angry Simon that Henry was not hiding the glee maiden, he had seen him send her to Dundee Then, fearing that he had made matters worse, he escaped from a group of taunting masquers and went to Henry to apologize Proudfoot, who liked to think of himself as a hero but who was really a timid soul, avoided the subject of his visit as long as possible His belated and sheepish confession served only to deepen Henry's depression over his relationship with Catharine, Henry ordered his friend out, after granting the burgher's request for his helmet and jacket to frighten away assailants Ironically, these garments caused Proudfoot's death, for as he walked down the street imitating Henry's swagger he was struck down from behind and killed

Rothsay, who had been among the masquers, went to Ramorny's to rouse him to join the gaiety He was horrified to learn of his missing hand, and he suspected him of attempting revenge when he noticed the surly murderer Bonithron in the room Ramorny's suggestion that they "allow" Albany to die and force King Robert to abdicate shocked him further The prince left immediately, vowing to see Ramorny no more and arousing the bitter hatred of his former friend

When the discovery of Proudfoot's body the next morning set off a rumor that Henry was dead, Catharine flew disheveled through the streets to see whether he was safe Henry's joy at this evidence of her affection was marred by the news of the murder and his realization that he must ignore Catharine's feelings and declare himself the champion of Proud fute's widow

The provost suspected after a brief investigation that Proud fute's death was the result of the enmity aroused during the Valentine encounter between Henry and Ramorny. The council decided to determine the identity of the murderer by an ancient test, the bier right, based on the superstition that a body bleeds in the presence of its killer. Ramorny's household was later marched by Proud fute's body but with no result until Bonthron refused the test and chose the alternative, trial by combat. Henry defeated the murderer, who in his confession followed the instructions of Ramorny and Dwining and laid the principal blame on Rothsay. Albany immediately put the prince in the hands of the High Constable to protect him and keep him out of further trouble.

Sir Patrick Charteris came to tell Simon and Catharine that they were to be arrested for heresy. Simon planned to seek asylum with his old friend, Conachar's father, in the Highlands, however, knowing his former apprentice's feelings, he was relieved when the provost offered to take Catharine to Lady Marjory, Duchess of Rothsay.

When he reached his destination, Simon learned that his friend had died, but he was received courteously by the young chief. Conachar confessed to him that he feared the coming combat with Clan Chattan, a coward was not a fit leader for a brave clan. He begged Simon to let him marry Catharine, for he felt that her love would strengthen him. Simon refused, however, to break his word to Henry.

Meanwhile, Ramorny had enticed Rothsay to flee to the former residence of his duchess by telling him that Catharine was coming there. When the girl arrived, thinking Lady Marjory was still there, the prince at first tried to seduce her, but later gave in to her appeal to his honor. He entrusted her to Louise, the glee maiden, whom he had encountered again by chance.

Ramorny and Dwining starved the prince to death, at the same time spreading a rumor that he was ill. Louise and Catharine discovered what was happening, and the glee maiden escaped to bring Douglas to the rescue while Catharine tried to get food to Rothsay. Douglas arrived in time to force Ramorny's surrender and save Catharine's life. Dwining poisoned himself to avoid his confederate's fate of death by hanging.

Douglas and Albany decided to keep Rothsay's death secret until after the clan combat on Palm Sunday. That morning Henry volunteered to take the place of a missing Chattan warrior and fought valiantly in order to have a chance to meet Conachar, whom he believed a rival about to wed Catharine. Conachar's foster father sacrificed his eight sons and himself in an endeavor to protect Conachar, but their efforts were useless. When the young leader faced Henry at last, the Highlander fled across the river Tay. Late that day he went to Catharine to tell her of his cowardice before he plunged to his death in the torrent.

Catharine and Henry were married a few months later. Although she was by that time reconciled to her husband's warning impulses, he vowed to take up arms again only in behalf of his country. Their first son had as godparents the Earl of Douglas, Lady Marjory, and Sir Patrick Charteris.

King Robert died soon afterward, broken hearted by the death of one son and the capture by the English of the other, later James I of Scotland, whom he was sending away to protect him from Albany's power. Albany, acquitted by Parliament of the charge that he was responsible for Rothsay's death, nevertheless did penance for his guilt. His son, who inherited the regency, paid for his father's sins on the scaffold when James I came to the throne, years later.

Critique

According to John Fletcher's introduction to the play, The Faithful Shepherdess was unsuccessful when it was presented on the stage. The reasons are not difficult to find. The characters are highly formalized and completely flat, the plot is very intricate and yet almost entirely predictable, and the verse, although technically of a high order, is hardly robust enough for public performance. Judged by the standards of the masque, however, the play comes off much better. Fletcher is obviously attempting to explore different aspects of love and to extol the virtue of chastity. His characters thus become symbols for certain chaste or unchaste states and the plot a vehicle for juxtaposing, for purposes of comparison or contrast, various carefully balanced sets of characters. The pleasure lies in seeing the theme worked out on these terms, a process which is all the more satisfying because it is made to take place within the narrow and artificial limitations of the pastoral convention.

The Story

Clorin, who had buried her sweet heart in a woodland arbor, vowed to forsake all of the pleasures of a shepherd's life and devote herself to chaste vigil over his grave, relinquishing it only to cure sick men and beasts through her knowledge of the secret virtues of herbs. So great was the power of her virginity that nothing in the woodland could harm her, and her mere presence had tamed a rough and brutish satyr who became her servant. Among the other shepherds and shepherdesses, however, love affairs of various kinds were progressing. The beautiful Amoret agreed to meet her sweet heart Perigot that night within the wood so that they could plight their troths there beside a sacred well. But Amarillis, a rejected admirer of Perigot, also had plans for the evening. Hoping that Perigot might accept her if he could only be parted from Amoret, she promised the Sullen Shepherd her love if he would break up the meeting. The Sullen Shepherd, who wanted only to satisfy his lust, agreed to carry out any plan she might propose.

Cloe was also seeking a partner for the evening. First she approached Thenot, but he declined her advances because he was in love with the unattainable Clorin. Daphnis, whom she next met, agreed to meet her in the wood, but his modest bearing promised so little that Cloe also made an engagement with Alexis, a youth with a much livelier manner.

After nightfall Amarillis and the Sullen Shepherd prepared to deceive Perigot. Following a magical formula, the Sullen

Shepherd lowered Amarillis into the sacred well, and when he drew her out again she had taken on the form of Amoret. In this shape she met Perigot and attempted to seduce him, but he was so offended by her conduct that he attempted to kill her. Seeing her danger, the Sullen Shepherd used another charm to change her back into her true appearance. Perigot rushed off into the dark wood to find and kill the supposedly lustful Amoret.

Cloe, meanwhile, had met Daphnis and found his intentions to be purer than she had hoped. Making an appointment to meet him later at a certain hollow tree, she went in search of Alexis. This swain's desires were in perfect accord with hers, but their embraces were interrupted by the Sullen Shepherd, who attacked and wounded Alexis. Undoubtedly Alexis would have been killed but for the arrival of Clorin's satyr, who frightened both Cloe and the Sullen Shepherd away and bore Alexis off to his mistress to be healed. Perigot during this time had found the true Amoret, stabbed her, and left her for dead. In this woeful condition she was discovered by the Sullen Shepherd who, wishing to make sure of his bargain with Amarillis, threw her into the sacred well to drown. From this fate she was saved by the river god, who also healed her wounds.

Perigot, thinking Amoret dead, was about to take his own life when Amarillis, seeing that things had gone much too far, attempted to explain the deception that had been worked upon him. In order to convince him, she asked only an hour in which to reappear in Amoret's shape. She had hardly left him, however, when she came upon the true Amoret. Realizing that virtuous love could not be frustrated, she directed the unfortunate shepherdess to the place where Perigot waited, but when Amoret arrived, her sweetheart took her to be Amarillis transformed and, wishing to be revenged, he again stabbed her. Once more the satyr arrived opportunely. As the frightened Perigot fled, the satyr bore Amoret off to Clorin's arbor.

There Clorin had nearly effected Alexis' cure by purging him of lust, but her treatment of Amoret was interrupted because of intemperate influences in the atmosphere. Seeking them out, the satyr found Daphnis and Cloe in the hollow tree. Being innocent of lechery, the young man was dismissed, but Cloe failed the test of chastity to which she was put and was kept for Clorin's ministrations. Perigot, meanwhile, arrived to be cleared of the blood he had shed and to his astonishment found Amoret alive and well. The two were happily reunited. Alexis and Cloe, having been purged of lust, also swore a chaste love to each other.

THE FEDERALIST

Type of work Political essays

Authors Alexander Hamilton (1755-1804), James Madison (1751-1836), and John Jay (1745-1829)

First published 1788

Seventy-seven of the eighty-five essays which comprise The Federalist were printed serially in New York newspapers between October, 1787, and May, 1788, the remaining eight first appeared in the two-volume edition published in March and May of the latter year. In an attempt to preserve secrecy of authorship, all were signed with the masking signature of "Publius." Although historians are still in dispute over the writers of certain of the papers, the claim has been made that Hamilton wrote sixty, James Madison, fourteen, John Jay, five, and Hamilton and Madison together, sixteen. Lengthy, repetitious, and partisan, they are never theless unrivaled as the classic exposition and defense of the principles on which the United States of America was founded

In the first and concluding essays, Hamilton declared the constitution proposed by the Philadelphia Convention of 1787 to be energetic, perfectly republican, conformable to the state constitutions, and able to guarantee property and liberty. He urged the electorate to shun demagogues who disparaged its proponents as the "wealthy, well born, and the great," to rise above "obstinate adherence to party," and to fulfill America's destiny as perceived by the framers. Madison joined him in rejecting objections that the new constitution contained no bill of rights or limitation on the reeligibility of presidents. They urged its ratification and subsequent amendment as freer or less crippling compromises than attempts at revision before submitting it to the states. Madison exhorted Americans to fulfill their limitless personal and national personalities, to "improve and perpetuate" the "one, great, and flourishing empire" won by the revolutionary patriots, to compromise a "decent regard for former times" with a rejection of "blind veneration for antiquity," and to be "manly" enough to test innovation and set a "new and noble course." Hamilton admitted that the new constitution was not perfect, but he hailed it as "the best that the present views and circumstances of the country will permit."

Hamilton and Madison cited as authority for the proposed constitution the Continental Congress' summons of the convention to establish "a firm national government" on the one hand, "for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of Confederation" on another, but above all to achieve a constitution "adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union." Madison insisted that the new document merely expanded on the principles of the articles to invigorate at this "critical" juncture the existing union with "powers commensurate with its objects." He averred that the new method of ratification was more practicable and that the old Congress and the states should not charge with unconstitutionality the convention which they had unconstitutionally summoned. The proposed constitution should be ratified, he said, if only because "it would accomplish the views and happiness of the people," consistent with the assertion in the Declaration of Independence that they could "abolish or alter" governments to effect their safety and happiness. Limiting this right to changing governments by "some solemn and authoritative act," not by transitory whims of the populace or of legislative "cabals," Hamilton denied "that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact" by legislative or popular acts. He would, however, exchange the old confederations shallow foundation of authority delegated by the state legislatures for the constitution's firmer basis of "CONSENT OF THE PEOPLE."

Madison scorned "theoretic" politicians who believed that "reducing mankind to perfect equality in their political rights" would equalize and assimilate their possessions, opinions, and passions. Pronouncing a democracy appropriate to small areas capable of direct government by all citizens, he endorsed a united federal republic, governed through popular representatives, as appropriate to the country and its future growth. He declared this government one of mixed national and federal characteristics because both central and state governments were derived "directly or indirectly from the great body of people" and because the voters' ratification of the new constitution would not be an act by citizens of a consolidated nation, but of independent states. Although the central government would be national in its operation upon citizens as individuals, its extent would be federal in its limitation to "certain enumerated objects." Both Madison and Hamilton envisaged a union more federal than national, in which each state would play a large corporate role in federal elections

Although Hamilton agreed that the new government would deal with "enumerated and legitimate objects," he emphasized that its laws would be "the SUPREME LAW of the land." As state officials would be bound to its observance by oath, they would become "incorporated" into its operation and "auxiliary to the enforcement of its laws." He discouraged "fettering the government with restrictions that cannot be observed," lest one departure from the "sacred" fundamental law breed precedent for constant infraction. Both he and Madison believed a military establishment necessary to national power and harmless to the states and people because of its dependence on state militia and biennial congressional appropriations. Hamilton frankly urged the use of federal force to suppress insurrections stirred up by demagogues and "desperate debtors" who, like Shays in Massachusetts, might "provoke the people to wild excesses."

Madison foresaw federal improvement of communication by roads and canals, but he denied that the "general welfare" clause added to the government's "few and defined" powers enumerated in the constitution. However, he and Hamilton agreed that the "necessary and proper" clause bred constructive and implied powers useful in achieving the "particular powers" and the overall goal of an efficacious government, saying "No axiom is more clearly established in law or in reason, than that whenever the end is required, the means are authorized."

Although agreeing that constitutional laws of the union were the "supreme law of the land," they believed that neither that provision nor complicated and indirect legislative devices could usurp popular liberty, supplant state power, or cloak encroachment on the coordinate departments, because all government action was ultimately limited by popular acceptance and because the new distribution of powers between the executive, judicial, and legislative branches was so well balanced.

Hamilton and Madison agreed that the new government should be furnished with sure financial sources to accomplish its goal of a more energetic government, whose power to tax was actually less potentially onerous than that of the old one, which had "complete power to REQUIRE of the States indefinite supplies of money for the common defence and general welfare." Hamilton exceeded Madison in advocating an "unqualified" power of taxation, in dismissing distinctions among external, internal, direct, and indirect taxes, and in demanding a power to tax "at least equal" to the union's resources and sufficient to establishing its credit in any contingency, and he candidly disagreed with Madison's contention that federal taxes would fall mainly on foreign trade. He assured those fearful of federal usurpation of taxation that "the prudence and firmness of the people" would safeguard "the constitutional equilibrium between the general and the State governments." Believing that the states' ultimate activity and need for revenue would become "very narrow" after the liquidation of revolutionary debts, he willingly conceded them "independent and uncontrollable authority to raise their own revenues," provided the central government had a monopoly on external taxation and concurrent jurisdiction in internal taxes. He promised that the central government would not attempt to abridge the states' tax resources but would restrain itself to powers "exclusively delegated" to it or forbidden to the states.

Hamilton's preference for a more centralized government and a limited electorate made him see indirect election of presidents and senators for rather long terms of office, the limited presidential veto, the life tenure of judges subject to good behavior, and the freedom of the states to set voting qualifications as valuable safeguards against egalitarianism. Although admitting that judicial review was not directly' authorized by the constitution, he praised this process of measuring legislation against that document as consistent with colonial practice, the framers' intent, and common sense. He considered it to be the best means 'to secure a steady upright, and impartial administration of the laws,' without which they would be dead letter, and to be an "excellent barrier" against legislative tyranny. He declared such an independent but coordinate judiciary could never endanger liberty or the rights of states because of its interdependence on the executive and legislative branches, which were subject to election by the people and by states. Only such a court, he said, never realized by the Confederation, could secure the constitutional guarantees against ex post facto laws and bills of attainder. Life tenure subject to good behavior for judges was justified, he averred, by the scarcity of men of "sufficient skill" and "requisite integrity."

He considered the federal courts essential to the maintenance of the "majesty of the national authority," brooking neither 'NON COMPLIANCE' nor "DIRECT and ACTIVE RESISTANCE" by individuals or states to the laws of the central government, which operated directly upon the citizens themselves, and from compliance with which states could relieve their citizens, not by "omission or evasion" but only by encroaching upon the union.

Although Madison recognized men's economic motivation, Hamilton made blatant appeal to their materialistic aspirations in which he saw those of farmers and merchants "blended and interwoven." He promised that the new government would multiply the national wealth by providing uniform and sound currency, uniform taxes (mainly on foreign goods, disregarding his own inconsistency), economy in government, and avoidance of excise or sumptuary taxes.

Hamilton and Madison agreed that no one or the "whole mass" of the powers of the new government was unnecessary, improper, or too dangerous to the states. They held that the states would have a constant advantage over the central government through their corporate role in elections, control of militia, and larger bureaucracy. Madison declared that the central government would be "more obsequious than overbearing" toward the states, and that this circumstance accorded with their closer proximity to the people and greater ability to achieve the "supreme object" of securing the "solid happiness" of the people. He and Hamilton agreed that in federal state controversies the "predilection and probable support" of the people would go to the states.

In such controversies Madison held that the "ultimate authority" for both union and states was the "great body of citizens." If some "madness" drove the federal government to an "unwarrantable" act, he believed that popular 'disquietude' and "refusal to cooperate with the officers of the Union" would be accompanied by "obstructions" thrown up by state officials, neither of which the federal government would long risk. Madison declared the constitutional provision for settling such controversies before the Supreme Court to be the essential alternative to civil war or disunion and to be consistent with the federal nature of the new government.

It was Madison who dubbed opponents of the proposed constitution "Federalists." Unlike Hamilton, he did not fear "faction," which he defined as a number of citizens united to action by common passions or interests "adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interest of the community." Fearing faction less than its eradication either by loss of liberty or imposition of conformity, he insisted that political diversity would best maintain a government protective of men's diverse and disparate faculties. But he alleged that governmental regulation of conflicting economic and political interests was necessary to achieve approximate justice through the rule of the majority in order to avoid either anarchy or tyranny

Claiming that essential agreement among the framers had caused them to bury reservations and to sign the proposed constitution, all three authors urged quick ratification of that document as originally submitted, avoiding "delays of new experiments" and disregarding the inconsistent and disunited critics of the federal constitution. Only such a federal union, they agreed, would be energetic enough to maintain any union, only it could achieve for Americans prosperity at home, respect abroad, security against foreign pressures, settlement of international disputes, regulation of foreign trade, and avoidance of unjust wars

Centered around a political election in a rural area of England at the time of the Reform Bill of 1832, Felix Holt, Radical provides a vivid picture of the society of the times. As always in George Eliot's best work, all classes of the society are included in a thorough portrait of rural English life. The novel hinges on character, although it also uses such standard plot devices as an unknown ancestry and a strange will which settles important property in an unexpected way. The characters are skillfully presented: the energetic and unconventional young radical, Felix, the sharp and generous Dissenting minister, Rufus Lyon, the competent, self-satisfied master of Transome Court, Harold Transome

In depth of insight and complexity of character, the novel looks forward to the later Middlemarch. Like Middlemarch, also, Felix Holt, Radical ends in the affirmation of a transcendent love affair, the mating of two people, Felix and Esther, who see beyond the common and trivial experiences of men and share a kind of spiritual force. The romantic hero and heroine transcend the limitations, sympathetically depicted, of the earthbound characters around them.

The Story

Mrs Transome, who had long held Transome Court together in spite of financial and legal difficulties and an incompetent husband, eagerly awaited the return of Harold, her younger son Harold, who had been building up a fortune in Smyrna for the preceding fifteen years, had been called home to take his place as heir to Transome Court after the death of his weak older brother, Durfey Harold, whose wife was dead, also brought with him a young son

Mrs Transome was soon disappointed in Harold. Although he was kind and promised to renovate the somewhat shabby mansion, he did not seem willing to fit into Mrs Transome's pattern of genteel country life, particularly when he announced that he intended to run for Parliament as a Radical candidate. He seemed, to his mother, to show a surprising knowledge and shrewdness about contemporary English life. In his campaign he received the support of his family's lawyer, Matthew Jermyn, and his uncle, the Reverend John Lingon. Neither had thought of deserting the Tory colors before his arrival.

More understandably committed to the Radical cause was Rufus Lyon, the local Dissenting minister. One day he received a visit from one of his parishioners, a Mrs Holt, who complained that her son had deliberately stopped the business in patent medicines that she and her late husband had painstakingly established. Her son, Felix, claimed that the business was fraudulent, Mrs Holt, on the other hand, was convinced that God would not have allowed a fraudulent business to prosper. The minister later sent for young Felix, whom he found highly intelligent, energetic, honest, and independent. Although well educated Felix was working as a watchmaker in order to feel himself close to the people. The two men soon became close friends. At the Lyons', Felix also met Rufus' daughter Esther, a slight, refined girl educated abroad, who was now teaching the daughters of the rich and reading Byron's poems. The energetic and socially conscious Felix railed at Esther's refinement and aestheticism, but as time passed a strange attraction between the two began to grow. Esther, although she did not know it at this time, was not the daughter of Rufus Lyon. Her mother had been a Frenchwoman, alone and destitute, whom Rufus had found wandering the English streets. Her soldier husband had sent for her, but he had died before she could find him. With her child, she was befriended by Rufus Lyon, who gave up a successful post for her and later married her.

Harold, beginning his election campaign, left the organizing to his lawyer, Matthew Jermyn. Jermyn hired another lawyer, Mr Johnson, to go to a workers' pub and stir the men into active support of the Radical candidate Felix Holt. He was in the pub at the time. Although a Radical, he objected strongly to the rabble rousing technique used by Johnson and carried his protest directly to Harold. Harold, although sympathetic to Felix' point of view, felt himself somewhat indebted to Jermyn, who had helped his mother retain her property through difficult years and an earlier lawsuit. While walking home through the woods, Felix found a purse belonging to Christian, one of the Debarry servants as a practical joke, the purse had been stolen from his pocket and tossed away while Christian was asleep in the woods. Along with the purse were some papers belonging to Philip Debarry, the Conservative candidate for Parliament.

When Felix took the papers to Rufus Lyon, his friend was amazed to discover evidence that Christian was the first husband of Rufus' French wife and the father of Esther. Through Jermyn, however, Rufus learned that Christian was really a scoundrel named Henry Scaddon who had in order to save himself, exchanged identities with Maurice Christian Bycliffe, Esther's real father, just before Bycliffe's death. Jermyn also knew that Bycliffe, and therefore Esther was the real heiress of Transome Court should an old and senile bill pasting Transome, who had moved to Treby, die. Although Jermyn kept his information for possible use against the Tran-

some family, Rufus Lyon told his daughter of her origins. Meanwhile, Harold Transome kept on campaigning and the friendship between Esther and Felix grew.

On the day of the election, as Felix had feared, the workers noted Felix, hoping to quell the riot, led it for a time in a futile effort to lead the workers away from the town. Unsuccessful in his purpose, he was charged with killing a constable. Also trampled in the riot was the old bill pasting Transome. Esther was now legally the heiress of Transome Court.

Harold Transome, who had lost the election, now turned his attention to Transome Court. Discovering that Jermyn and Johnson, Jermyn's henchman, had been cheating the estate for years, he decided to get rid of Jermyn at once and sue him. Jermyn tried to avoid the suit by telling Harold that the estate really belonged to Esther and that the lawyer would remain silent if Harold dropped proceedings against him. Harold refused to accept the bribe. Later he and his mother invited Esther to live with them at Transome Court. Both were charmed with Esther, and Harold fell in love with her.

Meanwhile, Felix' case was announced for trial. Rufus Lyon, Harold, and Esther testified to Felix' attempts to quell the riot, but he had, though inadvertently, killed a man, and so he was sentenced to four years' imprisonment. Esther's plea was so powerful that it moved even the arch Tory, Sir Maximus Debarry, who helped petition Parliament to grant Felix a pardon. Felix was soon released.

In the meantime Mrs. Transome had been unhappy that Harold had rejected Jermyn so thoroughly and was attempting to sue him. Harold, claiming that Jermyn was a thief, intended to carry out the suit. In a final burst of fury, Jermyn told Harold the truth that he was Harold's father and had, during his long affair with Mrs. Transome, saved the estate during several difficult times. Harold was crushed, and only Esther was able to reconcile him to his unhappy mother.

Feeling his illegitimacy keenly, Harold told Esther that he could not, as he had intended, ask for her hand. This declaration saved Esther much embarrassment, for she had already acknowledged her love for Felix. To solve problems for all concerned, Esther signed over all her rights to Transome Court to Harold, returned to her father's house, and soon married Felix.

FÊTES GALANTES and OTHER POEMS

Type of work: Poetry

Author: Paul Verlaine (1844-1896)

Principal published works: Poèmes saturniens, 1866, Fêtes galantes, 1869, La bonne chanson, 1870, Romances sans paroles, 1874, Sagesse, 1881, Jadis et naguère, 1884, Amour, 1888, Parallèlement, 1889, Bonheur, 1891.

The importance of literary groups or "schools" has always been greater in France than in England or America, and much of French literary history can best be understood through the reaction of one school against another. Thus, after the great wave of Romanticism in the 1830's and 1840's, a counterwave was inevitable. This originated in the group known as the "Parnassians," led by Le conte de Lisle (1818-1894) and continued by José Maria de Heredia (1842-1905), which first made itself known in 1866. The members of the school had two objectives, the first of which was the reformation of the loose metrical methods of the disciples of Hugo and Lamartine and a return to something like the traditional strictness of French prosody. More important, they were reacting against the excessive subjectivity and emotionalism of Romantics like Musset, who in his verse exploited for all it was worth his famous love affair with George Sand. Poetry, according to the Parnassians, should aim at an "abstract beauty" and avoid the cultivation of "private sorrows and their lamentation"; it should be cold and aloof purely objective. For example, in the famous "Les éléphants," by de Lisle, the great beasts solemnly march across the desert of red sand and as solemnly disappear "and the desert resumes its immobility." That is all. As James Elroy Flecker, one of the group's few disciples in England, wrote, for a Parnassian "to overlay fine work with gross and irrelevant egoism," as Hugo had done, would be "abhorrent", and had the movement existed in England, Tennyson "would never have published 'Locksley Hall'."

It was in the spirit of this school that Verlaine wrote his early poems. But he was never a thoroughgoing Parnassian, occasionally, as in "Un dahlia," he achieved something of the desired objectivity, but even in his first volume there were hints of the much more characteristic manner that was to appear three years later in Fêtes galantes. In such a poem as "Nuit du Walpurgis classique" with its description of the garden designed by Le Nôtre, "correct, ridiculous, and charming," there is a distinct foreshadowing of the eighteenth century fantasies of the subsequent volume. Also included in this first book was one of his most famous poems, "Chanson d'automne," one of those almost wordless little songs that are associated with his later manner.

The publication, between 1857 and 1875, of three books by the brothers Goncourt on various aspects of life and art during the eighteenth century marked another sharp break with the Romantics. As had happened earlier in England, the French Romantics had turned violently against the preceding century, detesting what they considered to be its coldness and artificiality. But as a result of this latest turn of the wheel of taste, this very artificiality became the eighteenth century's greatest charm, and some writers were fascinated by the brilliant, stately society that their grandfathers had overthrown. Verlaine's Fêtes galantes—probably his best-known book outside France—was a part of this pattern, in it, as Holbrook Jackson said, "Watteau became literature." It is an evocation of the world of Boucher and Fragonard: the formal gardens, the silks, the fluttering of fans, the tinkling of mandolins in the eternal twilight or moonlight, while abbesses, shepherdesses, Pierrot and Columbine stroll along the paths beside the fountains.

This eighteenth century bric à brac was very charming, but it does not represent Verlaine's most important contribution to French poetry. His chief significance, at least for the literary historian, lies in his connection with the Symbolist movement, which began as an unconscious protest against what has been called the "Spartan creed" of the Parnassians and which had links with the work of the Impressionist painters. Arthur Symonds, who knew many of the writers involved and who translated a few of Verlaine's pieces, called the whole body of late nineteenth century French literature the "Decadent Movement," which he then divided into "Impressionism" and "Symbolism." It is difficult and perhaps unnecessary to make a distinction between the two. According to Symonds, Impressionism gives the truth "of the visible world to the eyes that see it", Symbolism, "the truth of spiritual things to the spiritual vision." Yet Symonds himself cited Verlaine's Romances sans paroles the book which is usually considered the beginning of the poet's Symbolist period, as an example of Impressionism.

It was, then, the effort of the Symbolists to see through outward appearances to inward reality by trying to express "the secret affinities of things with one's soul." It is customary to say that the germ of this point of view is to be found in Bau-

delaire's poem "Correspondences" The poet saw nature as a "forest of symbols" where "perfumes, colors, and sounds answer one another" This approach resulted in poetry in which the "subject" becomes unimportant or disappears altogether The "meaning" of the poem is of no more significance than in a musical composition A remark of Pater's is frequently quoted in this connection "All art constantly aspires towards the condition of music, and the perfection of poetry seems to depend in part on a certain suppression of mere subject, so that the meaning reaches us through ways not distinctly traceable by the understanding" "Music before everything," Verlaine said in his "Art poetique", and then, "no color, only the nuance," the finest, most delicate shade, for it is this "nuance" that weds "the dream to the dream" So his later poems became almost literally "romances sans paroles," songs without words in which the content consists only of half hints and vague suggestions

In France, this kind of poetry led to the work of Mallarme, who carried the method much further by composing poems so filled with symbols within symbols, written in a private language in which hardly a word is to be taken in its customary sense, that each poem can mean almost anything—or nothing—and the French claim that his verse is better understood by foreigners In England, Verlaine was much admired by the minor poets of the 1890's, several of whom—Symons, John Gray, Ernest Dowson—translated some of his poems And it is certainly possible to see his influence, or that of his school, on some of the early poems of Yeats

Although Verlaine experienced a religious conversion which found expression in many of the poems in Sagesse, his life was a tragic one He has been called a modern Villon Almost everyone who has written about him has referred to his childlike qualities François Coppe said "Alas, like a child he was without any defense, and life wounded him often and cruelly But suffering is the ransom paid by genius, and this word can be uttered in speaking of Verlaine, for his name will always awaken the memory of an absolutely new poetry which, in French literature, has acquired the importance of a discovery"

The Finn Cycle, which is also known as the Fenian Cycle, is a series of ballad tales celebrating the deeds of Finn, a third century Irish hero, and his band of warriors Their organization, known as the Fianna Erin, fought and hunted under service to the king of Ireland. The warriors were quite respectable and enjoyed privilege and wealth. The tone of these ballad stories is romantic and the stories show a delight in sensuous details, with deep feeling for the Irish country side and glen. Finn himself stands out as a strong, courageous leader who inspired devotion in his men, but he is not without a touch of cunning and treachery. In many respects he is like Robin Hood and King Arthur—a bold hero, a capable leader, a tender lover. Like them, he witnesses the passing of his strength, the dissolution of his band, and the waning of a heroic era.

The Story

Long ago in Ireland, Cumhal was the leader of the Fianna Erin, the king's warriors. A rival clan in this group grew envious of Cumhal, took up arms against him, and slew him at the battle of Castleknock. Cumhal's wife Morna gave birth to a boy shortly thereafter. Fearing for his life now that Goll Mac Morna was in power, she gave him to two wise women to rear.

Under these two women the child grew to be a handsome lad. He learned to run faster than the rabbit, to kill deer without hounds, and to bring down birds with his sling. One day, while roaming in the fields, he found a group of boys playing. He joined them and it was soon obvious that he was a match for all of them. In envy the boys tried to kill him, but he overcame seven of them and chased the rest home. From that day he was called Finn, meaning the fair. However, his two nurses felt that since the warriors of the Morna clan would kill him if they found him, he must start off on his own.

Finn gathered a group of youths about him and began to seek adventure. His first exploit was to avenge a woman whose son had been killed by the Lord of Luachar. Finn and his companions stormed the ramparts of the chieftain's castle, recovered jewels Cumhal had lost in battle, and slew the Lord of Luachar and his men. Finn then returned the jewels to the old men who had fought with his dead father in battle.

Finn set out to learn wisdom and the art of poetry from the sage Finegas. While he was with the sage, he caught the salmon of wisdom and accidentally tasted it. Having learned wisdom and the art of poetry, Finn composed a song in praise of May and then set out to become the leader of the Fianna Erin.

At that time Conn was the ruler of Ireland. He held an annual banquet at which peace was declared among the various clans. When Finn entered the banquet hall unknown, Conn asked him who he was. The king accepted him immediately because he was the son of an old friend. Soon Finn inquired whether he would become captain of the Fianna Erin if he rid the royal town of the goblin that now haunted it. The king said yes, and Finn set out with a magic spear to slay the goblin. The goblin appeared with his magic harp and enchanted Finn with the music, but with the aid of his spear Finn slew the spirit and returned victorious. Conn kept his word and Finn was made captain of the Fianna Erin. Faced with the choice of serving his clan enemy or leaving Ireland, Goll Mac Morna chose to serve Finn, and the rest of his men followed him.

Finn was a strong, generous, wise captain who drew the best poets and warriors of Ireland around him. There was his gallant son, Oisín, one of the finest fighters and poets. There was Oisín's son, Oscar, the fiercest fighter of the group. There was Goll Mac Morna, strong and loyal. There was Dermot of the Love Spot, the fair ladies' man of great endurance and agility. There was Keelta, another strong warrior and fine poet. There was Conan the Bald, full of trickery, gluttony, and sloth. There was also Mac Luga, whom Finn instructed in the art of courtesy, and many another brave warrior. Finn was generous to all. But to enter the Fianna Erin, it was necessary to pass extremely rigorous tests of strength, skill poise, and poetic ability

There was the time Finn and his companions gave chase to a doe. The doe far outstripped everyone but Finn and his two hounds. When Finn reached the doe he found his two hounds playing with her and he gave orders for no one to hurt her. That night Finn awakened to find a beautiful woman standing by his bed. She informed him that she had been changed into a deer by the Dark Druid because she would not give him her love and that Finn had restored her to her original form. Finn took her to live with him as his wife. After a few months of happiness Finn was called away to fight the Northmen. Returning victorious, he found his new wife gone. The Dark Druid had come for her in the shape of Finn and unwittingly she had rushed to greet him and he took her away. For three days Finn mourned before returning to his band. Seven years later Finn found a brave young man fighting off a pack of hounds. On calling off the dogs and questioning the boy, Finn learned that this was the son he had had by his wife and that the Dark Druid had come again and taken her away forever. Finn took his son and trained him to be a great warrior poet.

There was the time Finn and his men were hunting and the giantess Vivionn came seeking Finn's protection from her scorned lover. As she was talking, her lover appeared and thrust his spear into her breast. While Finn and Goll stayed by the dying giantess, the rest of the company set out after the giant. They chased him over hill and plain to the sea, where he escaped after they had gained his sword and shield. Returning, they found the giantess dead. They buried her and mourned her death.

There was the time Finn and his companions were hunting and saw an ugly, clumsy giant coming toward them with an equally ugly old nag. The giant told Finn in an unmannerly way that he wanted to join his band, and Finn reluctantly agreed. Finn's companions turned the giant's horse out to pasture with the other horses, and it immediately began injuring them. Finn told one of his men to ride the nag to death. When the animal refused to move, thirteen men got on its back in jest. Seeing that they were making fun of him, the giant ran off in fury and his nag followed with thirteen of Finn's men on its back. Finn and the rest of his men followed, but they were soon outdistanced when the giant and his nag crossed the ocean.

Then Finn outfitted himself and his men with a ship, food, and gold, and set out across the sea in search of his missing men. At last they came to a huge, slippery cliff. Since Dermot was the ablest, he was sent to investigate the land. Before long Dermot came to a woodland pool where for three days he fought an armed warrior. On the third night he dived into the pool with the warrior and found himself in a land of wonders. He was soon beaten by the men of this land and left for dead. Presently Dermot was awakened by a man who led him into a friendlier kingdom. There he was welcomed by the king, who himself had served in the Fianna Erin under Finn. In the meanwhile Finn and his men had entered the underground kingdom by another route, and he and his warriors were reunited. They learned that they had been brought there to fight in the service of this underground king against the King of the Well and his allies. In battle Finn and his men proved matchless. After winning the enemy king's daughter, Finn defeated the foe and restored peace to the land. Finn asked for no reward from the king, but when Conan made a jest the king transported the band back to the Irish hills in the space of a second. The whole adventure seemed but a dream.

There was the time the old feud between Finn's clan and Goll's clan reawakened over a dispute about booty. A battle started in the hall and blood was shed until Fergus, the minstrel, awoke and reminded them with his music of the dangers they had shared. So peace was restored.

For many years Finn and his men passed their lives in adventures, in hunts, and in enchantments. But there came a time when the Fianna Éirinn began to disintegrate, when Finn's men became unruly and dishonest, and when Finn lost his honor through treachery.

When Finn was an old man, he planned to marry Grania, daughter of the King of Ireland. Grania fell in love with Dermot, the ladies' man, however, and begged him to run away with her. Dermot was extremely reluctant to do so, but Grania bound him by the laws of Fian chivalry and he was forced to abduct her on her wedding night. Finn jealously chased the pair over Ireland. At length Dermot made peace with Finn. One day, while Finn and Dermot were hunting, a boar fatally wounded Dermot. The only way to save Dermot was for Finn to bring him water. Remembering his hurt pride, Finn let the water fall and Dermot died. The King of Ireland then ordered the Fianna Éirinn to disband forever. The final blow to the company came at the battle of Gabhra in which Oscar, Finn's grandson, was killed and the Fenians were all but wiped out.

Niam, a fairy princess, then came to take Oisín to an enchanted land where all wishes came true. She sang a magic song to him and he bade farewell to his companions forever. In this land Oisín could love, hunt, and fight without growing old. The time came, however, when he longed to return to Ireland to see his old companions. Niam tearfully let him go, but warned him not to set foot on the soil. On returning to Ireland he found a degenerate race that was both smaller and weaker than the lowliest men of his time. Impetuously, Oisín dismounted from his horse to help the weaklings move a stone and immediately he became an old man. He soon learned that his companions had been dead for three hundred years. Oisín was taken to Saint Patrick. At first there was strong distrust between the two men, but gradually the saint grew to love Oisín's tales of the Fianna Éirinn and recorded them. Oisín, on his part, was baptized into the Church.

JERRY, also SHEEM THE PENMAN DOLPH, and GLUGG their twin sons

From that wonderful passage of revelation and recall as Molly Bloom hovers on the edge of sleep in the closing section of Ulysses, there was for James Joyce only one short step to the conception of Finnegans Wake. Ulysses, centering on the events of a specific day and place, presented an exploration of the thoughts and myriad impressions of the waking mind. Finnegans Wake, to which Joyce devoted seventeen years of concentrated effort, attempts to create a total world of nightmare fantasies and half-conscious dream sensations experienced in the sleeping mind during an interval which stretches out to enclose all space and time.

Like Ulysses, this novel has called into being an extensive literature of criticism and explications, a process of exegesis needed if the majority of readers are fully to understand Joyce's purpose and accomplishment. In the stream of consciousness content of Ulysses, however, Joyce had kept the edges of thought and imagery bright and sharp, here everything is blurred and muffled by physical sleep sensuously recorded as well as by the kaleidoscopic nature of Joyce's dream world and the shifting identities of his people as the dreamer pursues erotic fancies or is oppressed by feelings of guilt. Baldly stated Finnegans Wake is the story of a man who in the course of a single night dreams of everything that has ever happened in the world. The dream shapes and memories set free in sleep float up from the subconscious not only in accordance with Freud's principles but also in keeping with Jung's, so that the episodes of the novel and the bewildering array of cross references go beyond the experience of the individual to reflect a state of being which may be vaguely referred to as the collective consciousness of the race.

Some facts about the dreamer are easily ascertainable. He is a man, apparently of Danish descent, named Humphrey Chimpden Earwhicker, and he keeps a pub, the Bristol, somewhere between Phoenix Park and the River Liffey, in Dublin. To Dubliners his name has always been a matter for joking, in addition to its foreign sound it suggests an insect, the earwig and he is sometimes referred to as H. C. Earwigger. He has a wife, Ann, and three children—Isobel, a daughter now in her teens, and twin sons, Kevin and Jerry. At some time in the past Earwhicker had been involved in a scandal which is never really explained. Apparently he had accosted someone in Phoenix Park, but whether that person was a young girl or a man is never made clear. Although the incident happened a long time ago, Earwhicker still fears investigation by the authorities.

Now his old feeling of guilt has been renewed by the fact that on a rowdy Saturday evening in the pub Earwhicker had drunk too much. There had also been some kind of altercation—possibly a drunk had been forcibly ejected—in which insults were exchanged and stones thrown, and this disturbance had reminded Earwhicker of his earlier trouble. When Earwhicker went to bed he was still drunk, and the events of the day disturb his troubled sleep. Since he and his wife no longer feel the passion they once had for each other, his dream does not turn toward her but involves his children. His feeling of guilt is again aroused by the incestuous nature of his dream, but the incest taboo intervenes to transform Isobel into Iseult la Belle and Earwhicker into Tristram, thus severing the father-daughter relationship. By much the same process the other figures in the dream assume different personalities and meanings. Toward morning Jerry, one of the twins, calls out and the mother goes into another room to comfort the child. Earwhicker, only half aware of her going, goes to sleep once more. As the book ends day is breaking and Earwhicker and his wife are about to awake.

But to approach Joyce's novel in this fashion, in terms of narrative and character, is to do violence to his structure and style. Finnegans Wake is composed of many elements: an exile's memories of Dublin in his youth, theories of modern psychology, the substratum of myth and legend underlying the history of the race, and Joyce's marvelous command of the resources and texture of language. The book takes its structure from the Principi d'una scienza nuova by Giovanni Battista Vico, an early eighteenth-century Italian philosopher. According to Vico's theory, human societies follow a progression of three distinct cycles, the ages of the gods, of great heroes, of ordinary men. Vico also believed that each cycle created its appropriate institutions and forms of government, autocracy gives place to democracy and democracy at last becomes anarchy before the cycle begins again. In the beginning, however, is Godhead, revealed in lightning and the crash of thunder, which leads man to restrain his brutish acts and appetites.

In the opening paragraphs of Finnegans Wake such a polysyllabled thunder clap suggests the Viconian cycle, but it is also associated with the fall of Finnegans the hod carrier. His wake is a noisy affair satisfactorily ended, even though at one stage the corpse, reanimated by the Gaelic word for whiskey, threatens to rise and walk once more. The interment of Finnegans—the Finn MacCool of Irish legend—fades into the landscape of Howth Castle and Environs from which, bearing the same initials, Humphrey Chimpden Earwhicker emerges. Like Finnegans, Earwhicker is a figure of mythopoetic stature and in the novel he takes on a more universal significance indicated by his successive appearances as Here Comes Everybody and Haveth Childer Everywhere. His transformations on the universal and spiritual level are the essence of the novel. At the same time he functions on a different level indicated by ambiguous family relationships—as Adam fallen from grace because of the incident in Phoenix Park, as Tristram who loved the two Iseults, as Swift, the Irish dean who loved Stella and Vanessa, as the father of Shaun the Postman (Kevin) and Shem the Penman (Jerry).

Anna the wife also undergoes a transformation in the course of the novel. She becomes identified with the River Liffey, personified as Anna Livia Plurabelle, the stream of life eternally flowing toward the sea—the feminine principle into which all the women in the novel finally merge, just as in the end the river merges with the sea. The stream is time to Earwhicker's history, and the Anna Livia Plurabelle sections are not only the finest in the novel but the particular triumph of Joyce's poetic prose.

cance in the symbolic texture of the novel: the four old men who act as a kind of chorus but who may be identified at different times as the four apostles, the four points of the compass, the four ancient Irish kingdoms, the Four Masters of Irish legend, the four waves of myth: Shaun the Postman, who is Kevin and also Chuff, Jaun, and Yawn, the practical man who carries on tradition without knowing the nature of the message he bears any more than the postman knows the contents of the letter he delivers, Shem the Penman, also Jerry, Dolph, and Glugg, who is the writer, the maker of tradition. These figures are at all times surrounded by the history of past and present, shapes of legend and symbol in a dream vision which Joyce attempted to convey by a dream language to which he brought all the resources of his logopoetic faculty.

The style of Finnegans Wake represents a virtual recreation of language. In this work Joyce exhibits every variety of style in the range of literature and, in order to achieve his multi-leveled effects, a battery of technical devices—the pun, the play on words, telescoped and portmanteau words, parodies, and connotations, to name only a few of the hundreds employed. Because so much of the understanding of the novel depends on linguistic techniques, its effects are auditory rather than visual. It is a book to be heard as well as to be read, for its structural devices within its cyclic outlines are more those of music than of narrative and drama.

Finnegans Wake is a bold experiment in form, meaning, and style. It is repetitious and irritating in its fragmented episodes and its efforts to push language to the limits of expression. Yet it is a tremendous if imperfect fable of the whole of mankind that carries man backward through the history of his moral and social habits to the mystery of his origin, tells the story of his fall, and affirms the promise of his rebirth. From the unfinished final sentence of the novel to its continuation in the first paragraph with its images of the flowing river, Adam and Eve, and the circle of Howth Castle and its environs, the cycle runs its never ending course of life, history, and time

The Japanese writer Ibara (sometimes Ihara) Saikaku was both a poet who wrote a prodigious number of seventeen-syllable haiku and the leading novelist of the Genroku Period (1600-1868) in Japan. The subjects of his fiction fall chronologically into three distinct types: those dealing with matters of love and the pleasure quarter, those dealing with life among the warrior class, and those dealing with the lives of the merchant class. The Koshoku Gonnin Onna, which has been translated as Five Women Who Loved Love, obviously belongs to the first group, and all five of the novelettes of which this work is comprised are based upon actual happenings. The work was first published about 1685. Each story is divided into five chapters. The plots are simple and, with one exception, tragic. The strength of the work lies in its evocation of character and scene. The five heroines are not languishing, leisurely ladies but rather women of character who almost seem to create their tragedies instead of being helplessly fated. Only Oman, the heroine of the last story, is allowed to live happily ever after, and she, in her charming determination to win her love, resembles in some respects Shakespeare's Rosalind.

The Stories

THE FIRST STORY

Seijurō, handsome, gallant young man disowned by his wealthy father for his profligacies, apprenticed himself to a shopkeeper and proved hard working and reliable. When Onatsu, his master's younger sister, fell in love with him, he, after some reluctance, at last fully returned her affection. As an apprentice he was far from an eligible suitor, and so the lovers were forced to elope. Seven hundred gold pieces disappeared at the same time. When the lovers were discovered, Seijuro, condemned for theft as well as for seduction, was executed. The gold was later found where it had been mislaid. Onatsu went mad for a time. Later she entered a nunnery.

THE SECOND STORY

Osen, a country girl, was married happily to a cooper. When Chozemon, the yeast maker, was planning to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his father's death, Osen offered to help in the preparations. While she was arranging sweet meats, Chozemon accidentally dropped a bowl on her head, disarranging her hair. Chozemon's suspicious, jealous wife accused Osen of adultery. Because she had been unjustly accused, Osen impulsively decided to revenge herself on the wife by truly making love to Chozemon, although she cared nothing for him. When her husband, the cooper, discovered the lovers, Osen committed suicide and Chozemon was executed.

THE THIRD STORY

Osan's husband had gone to Edo on business. Her maid Rin, was in love with Moemon, a clerk. Moemon, however, felt coldly toward Rin and only reluctantly agreed to visit her bed. Together, Rin and Osan decided to punish him, and Osan took Rin's place in the bed. The trick had other results, however, when Osan and Moemon found themselves hopelessly in love. After pretending to commit suicide together, they hid in a faraway village for a time. Eventually they were discovered and executed.

THE FOURTH STORY

Oshichi, an innocent young girl, was taken by her mother to find refuge in a temple after their house had burned down. There she met and fell in love with Onogawa Kichisaburo, a young samurai. When Oshichi and her mother returned to their home, the lovers were not able to meet in secret. Oshichi remembering how she first met her lover, decided to start another fire, but she was discovered, arrested, exposed to shame and burned at the stake. Kichisaburo, who had been ill, did not know of her death until he accidentally saw her grave stone. At first he planned to commit suicide, but he was persuaded to delay his design until after a talk with his mentor and sworn brother. As the result of his friend's advice Kichisaburo decided to become a monk.

THE FIFTH STORY

Gengobei, a pederast, took priestly vows after the death of Hachijuro, his lover. Later he fell in love with another boy who returned from the dead to see him again. In his grief Gengobei retired to a mountain hut. Meanwhile, a young girl, Oman, had seen and fallen in love with Gengobei. Determined to win him, she disguised herself as a boy and visited his retreat. There she succeeded in winning Gengobei's love, even after her sex had been revealed. Gengobei left the priesthood and the lovers lived in great poverty together until Oman's parents finally found her. Rejoicing at her recovery, her parents decided to have the two lovers marry and then give their family fortune to Gengobei. Thus Oman's love story came to a happy ending.

FLOWERS OF EVIL by Charles Baudelaire. Translated by George Dillon and Edna St. Vincent Millay. Excerpts reprinted by permission of George Dillon. Published by Harper & Brothers. Copyright 1936 by Harper & Brothers.

"Small hands washed, scoured, cared for like the hands of a woman—and with that, the head of a maniac, a voice cutting like a voice of steel"—thus did the observant but uncharitable Goncourt brothers describe Charles Baudelaire, who had already become the subject of innumerable legends in the Paris of the Second Empire. It was said that he had dyed his hair green, that he had been heard to remark in a café "Have you ever eaten a baby? I find it pleasing to the palate!" But unfortunately for seekers after the sensational, most of the Baudelaire legends have been disproved by later research. Like Poe, he enjoyed creating mystifications about himself.

Flowers of Evil, the volume on which Baudelaire's fame rests, was published in 1857, although some of the poems had appeared in magazines as much as fifteen years earlier, when the author was running himself financially by attempting to be a dandy of the boulevards. The book immediately became famous—or notorious—because of a prosecution brought against author and publisher on the grounds of offense against public morals. In the same year a similar charge had been brought against Flaubert for his Madame Bovary. Possibly because of the ridiculous position in which the government had found itself in the earlier case, the prosecution of Baudelaire was half hearted, and the fine of three hundred francs imposed was never paid. Actually, there were only six poems found to be objectionable (the subject of two of them being lesbianism), they were reprinted in a new edition published in Belgium, and are now included in all the standard texts and in some of the English translations.

When Barbey d'Aurevilly wrote of Baudelaire "His present book is an anonymous drama in which he takes all the parts," he was saying no more than that the poet was a Romantic. No young man of his generation could escape the "Byronic attitude" that had been the Englishman's legacy to Europe. To be grand, gloomy, and peculiar was expected. But in addition to international Byronism, Baudelaire had been exposed to other influences at that time unusual in France. As a boy, he had learned English, hence, he came to know authors such as De Quincey and the Gothic novelists. But most important, he encountered the works of Poe about 1846 and translated much of that work between 1856 and 1865. It was through this translation that Poe began to have an influence upon French literature far greater than any he has ever exerted in America. Baudelaire's admiration of Poe was immense; he called him "the incomparable Poet, the irrefutable philosopher—who must always be quoted in regard to the mysterious maladies of the mind."

The Master of the Horrible, the Prince of Mystery." And yet a reading of Baudelaire's poetry does not greatly remind us of that of Poe, the American was not so preoccupied with sex nor do his ethereal, idealized females suggest the tigerish women with smoldering eyes whose nude charms—"ingenuousness united to lubricity"—Baudelaire loved to describe. What Poe gave him was a general interest in the macabre and a feeling for compression, the latter a welcome reaction against the overwhelming verbosity of much Romantic poetry.

Baudelaire's style, at least as it appeared to a contemporary, was described by Gautier as "ingenious, complicated, learned, full of shades and of investigations, always pushing back the limits of language, borrowing all technical vocabularies, taking its colors from all palettes."

This decadent style is the last word of language called upon to express every thing and pushed to the utmost. It is a "gamy" style like that of late Latin, suitable for the "haggard phantoms of insomnia." This, it must be confessed rather melodramatic description well indicates the peculiar appeal that Baudelaire held for his contemporaries, who felt that "since Louis XIV French poetry has been dying of correctness."

As for his subject matter, the word

"morbid" has been applied to it with unflinching regularity. D'Aureville called Baudelaire an "atheistic and modern Dante" whose Muse descended into Hell as surely as Dante's had ascended there from. The Romantic indulgence in sensation for its own sake he carried to the point at which pleasure becomes revulsion. In what is perhaps his most famous poem, "A Voyage to Cytherea," after the gay opening of the ship setting sail for the island of Venus, we are brought up sharply by

Look at it, after all, it's a poor land, and are carried remorselessly through the description of the gibbet from which dangles a 'ridiculous hanged man' torn by birds, to the final stanza

In thine isle, O Venus I found only upthrust
A Calvary symbol whereon mine image hung —Gave me, Lord God, to look upon that dung,
My body and my heart without disgust!

Added to all of this was the attitude of world weariness inherited from Byron. Baudelaire compares himself to a king in whose veins "the green waters of Lethe flow", to someone who, in a former life, lived among "vast porticoes" tended by slaves whose only task was to discover their master's secret grief. There were also the blasphemies ("Les Litanies de Satan") and the meticulous descriptions of the revolting ("Une Charogne").

Much of Baudelaire's pyrotechnics—even that part which was sincere and not merely intended to shock the bourgeoisie—has lost its effect. A modern reader, accustomed to clinically precise analyses of sex, is not particularly shocked by his lubricities, his blasphemies seem rather juvenile. One wonders what all the fuss was about. But to contemporary poets, English as well as French, he is important as a counter Romantic in a Romantic age as the first modern. To quote Peter Quennell: "He had enjoyed a sense of his own age, had recognized its pattern while the pattern was yet incomplete." He enormously extended the frontiers of poetry by showing that it need not be limited to the conventionally "poetic." And there are few readers who will not be forced to admit the truth of the last line of his "Preface":

Hypocrite reader—my likeness—my brother!

FOUR QUARTETS

Type of work Poetry

Author T. S. Eliot (1888)

First published 1943

Four Quartets is T. S. Eliot's last book of nondramatic poetry. Written over a period of eight years and published separately, each quartet has the same structure and helps to develop cumulatively the same themes. Eliot has said that transitions in poetry can be similar to those in a symphony or quartet, and these quartets are written in the five movement sonata form.

The personal and historical significance of the place names which title the poems are the points of departure for the themes developed in the first part of each quartet. The theme of "Burnt Norton"—an old Gloucestershire house—is the nature of time and of personal memories and experience. "East Coker," which is the name of the English village from which Eliot's ancestor left for America in the seventeenth century, is a consideration of the meaning of history and an explanation

tion of the idea of spiritual rebirth "The Dry Salvages," a group of rocks off the coast of Massachusetts which Eliot knew as a boy, continues the meditations on time and history and includes reflections on human endeavor and further statements on the nature of experience. These themes are all, again, present in "Little Gidding," the name of an Anglican lay community founded by Nicholas Ferrar.

All themes are thus present in each quartet with different emphases, the subsidiary themes are aspects of the major ones and are directly related to them. A difference in these poems from Eliot's earlier verse is that here, although the elements of surprise and rapid transition are still present, the transitional passages are included, whereas in The Waste Land they were not. The same symbols also occur in each of the quartets; their multiple and shifting meanings are resolved in "Little Gidding."

In "Burnt Norton" he writes

What might have been and what has been Point to one end which is always present

Here there is no placing of experience in time ("do not call it fixity") it is instead a "stillness." The stillness is the point beyond experience "into the rose-garden." To reach it requires the negation of flesh and spirit. This way of purification is repeatedly considered and what is required for it is release from desire and compulsion. Meaningful experience is both in and out of time, and life is too full of distraction for this end to be often attained. The description of this distraction is a vivid realization of the contemporary predicament.

Only a flicker
Over the strained, time-ridden faces
Distracted from distraction by distraction

The passage following these lines on suburban Londoners presents "the way down" towards the dark night of the soul,

"desiccation of the world of sense." But there are times in the realm of art when the moment can be prolonged

as a Chinese jar still Moves perpetually in its stillness

A further theme in the quartets, the nature and difficulty of poetic creation, follows in contrast to the image of the jar. The struggle with words which "decay with imprecision" introduces the Word which is subject always to temptation. "Burnt Norton" ends with a repetition of the vision of hidden children laughing in the rose garden, a motif which occurred in the first movement. Such immediacy is contrasted with the usual bleakness of existence.

Time in "East Coker" involves the consideration of the history of man. This, the most despairing of the quartets, comes closest to complete and unredeemed bitterness. The cyclic nature of life and experience is stressed: fields give way to factories which crumble to dust. The life cycle of man and earth is presented as if in a vision after the poet has gone down the dark lane into the somnolent village. The second section begins with a lyric on November, which is followed by a characteristic reversal.

That was a way of putting it
A penphrastic study in a worn-out poetical fashion

The theme of the bitterness and deception of time mentioned in "Burnt Norton" is expanded here, the wisdom of old men is really folly, and

The only wisdom we can hope to acquire
Is the wisdom of humility

The concrete description, which in these poems always either immediately follows or precedes the abstract thought, is here that of the descent into subways, which were also used as air raid shelters during World War II. Thus negation and stillness are combined and the necessity for "waiting" is introduced.

The fourth movement is a lyric on the Christian paradox of life in death and death in life. The symbols are those of a hospital with a "wounded surgeon" and "a dying nurse."

Wherein, if we do well we shall Die of the absolute paternal care

Fire and roses are multiple symbols of destruction and salvation, purgation and resurrection. After the cold fever of death there is purgatory.

Of which the flame is roses and the smoke is briars

The fifth section despairs of poetic creation, which, at "every attempt/Is a wholly new start" because the difficulties once conquered are no longer those that face the poet. The resolution of this dilemma is similar to that for the soul: "For us there is only the trying." The final section inverts the opening statement: "In my beginning is my end", the poet concludes, "In my end is my beginning."

The superb pictures of the Mississippi River and the Atlantic Ocean in "The Dry Salvages" show an increase in the music of the verse which is sustained in "Little Gidding." The river is "a strong brown god" and the sea has "Many gods and many voices." The sea time "is not our time", "time stops and is never ending." The lyric in Section II speaks of the grief of shipwreck and of those things thought "most reliable" which are "therefore the fittest for renunciation." There is no end to this pain, only the possibility of prayer.

The pattern of the past with its content of meaningful experience is seen here in its historical perspective.

And approach to the meaning restores the experience
In a different form, beyond any meaning
We can assign to happiness

This passage connects with the reference to Krishna in Section III, one of the many allusions to and quotations of other authors in the quartets. The theory of time is drawn from the philosopher Heraclitus and part of the conclusion of "Little Gidding" from Dame Julian of Norwich. The rose and fire symbolism is reminiscent of Dante, and the conception of the dark night of the soul is that of St. John of the Cross. While awareness of these sources adds considerably to the enjoyment of the quartets, Eliot integrates them so completely and so perfectly controls their place in the poetry, placing them where they have such an exact significance, that the poems can be appreciated and understood without knowledge of source or influence. The poet Krishna is mentioned by name, however, and his words, "fare forward, voyagers" instead of "fare well" are important, as they indicate the essential release from desires and are an exhortation to unselfishness or selflessness.

Section V contains the meaning of the explanation of time's paradoxical aspects.

But to apprehend
The point of intersection of the timeless With time, is an occupation for the saint

The images of flowers, sunlight, and music which have recurred throughout these poems symbolize the ordinary man's experiences which, although fragmentary, nevertheless are "hints of grace." "The hint half guessed, the gift half understood, is Incarnation."

The resolution of themes in "Little Gidding" is accomplished by semi-repetitive exposition and some further development. The chapel at Little Gidding is a place "where prayer has been valid." The many allusions to writers and saints and saints who were writers is explained.

the communication Of the dead is tongued with fire beyond the language of the living

The death of the four elements in Section II opens the way to spiritual resurrection This lyric is followed by the poet's meeting, after an air raid, with a 'familiar compound ghost'—the shade of all his past teachers—who tells him of the grief and failure of old age unless restored by that refining fire

Where you must move in measure like a dancer

The historical theme is restated in the relationship of the present and the past as a reconciliation of opposites 'History may be servitude,/History may be freedom' And

Whatever we inherit from the fortunate
We have taken from the defeated

The solution of the dilemma of the burden of Divine care for humanity, so bleakly felt in 'East Coker,' is here seen to be love, which binds us in our desires and alone is able to give the essential release from them

The end of exploration, of the struggle with words and of all human actions

"Will be to arrive where we started/And to know the place for the first time" The moments of personal and historical experience are never lost

The moment of the rose and the moment of the yew tree
Are of equal duration A people with out history
Is not redeemed from time for history is a pattern
Of timeless moments

The way of purgation which requires the whole being has led to "complete simplicity" where "the fire and the rose are one"

For all their complexity, Four Quartets contains Eliot's most explicit poetry The poems are specifically Christian, recording the progress of the soul toward salvation The way in which the themes are at various levels interwoven to augment and illuminate one another, the control of language and rhythm, and the beauty and precision of the images allow some critics to call these quartets Eliot's finest achievement

The French Revolution is a landmark in the history of nineteenth century English literature, the work that, after the comparative public failure of Sartor Resartus (qv), helped to establish Carlyle's star in its ascendancy In its dramatic picture of the French Revolution

it offered the general reader an estimate of an event that had disturbed and shocked the consciences of his grand parents It offered a measure of revolutionary and socially disruptive movements that was neither optimistic and blindly trustful of progress (here Carlyle differed from Utilitarian friends) nor pessimistic and horrified, as Edmund Burke had been at the time of the Revolution. Finally, and perhaps most important for us, The French Revolution was a more successful self-realization for Carlyle than the comparatively nebulous explorations of ideas which we find in Sartor Resartus. That earlier work presents us Carlyle's ideas in a kind of cloud formation that conceals whatever terrain of fact and real human experience they float over, The French Revolution presents the same ideas brought into relation to and supported by a bewilderingly rich body of facts: the day by day events of the disturbing French years.

Impressive as is Carlyle's method of digesting and arranging the body of facts, still more memorable is the way he commands the facts to do his will. Like an Old Testament prophet, Carlyle rides the hurricane and directs the storm of the fall of absolute monarchy in France. He produces not just another history of a vexed period, full of rationalized information. It is true of Carlyle that his view of one period of history is always on the verge of becoming a vision of all human history. The French women who march on Versailles stand for the passionate outbreak of all oppressed human beings, and the sorrows of Marie Antoinette in the Conciergerie stand for the agonies of all trivial human beings carried to their doom by forces they cannot dominate.

It is possible to indicate some of the means that Carlyle employs to create his apocalyptic vision—a vision, not of last things, but certainly of the forces that combine to drive history onward. The arrangement of the facts is rigorously chronological. The book begins with the death pangs of King Louis XV, these are at once represented as the death throes not of one aged monarch but of a regime or way of life that once justified itself but which is now a hollow reality. The book continues with an account of the suicidal follies of the young king, Louis XVI, and his pretty and thoughtless wife, Marie Antoinette. It notices the efforts of some of the king's ministers, Necker, Turgot, and others, to stem the advancing tide to restore financial soundness and yet provide money for all who thought they had a right to spend it. Carlyle, often with a somewhat uneven pace which permits him to stop for angry or compassionate meditation when he wishes to point out the "inevitable" chain of disaster and struggle, continues his year by year and month by month account. He tells of the meeting of the Estates General, the Tennis Court Oath, the march on Versailles, the various attempts to frame a constitution, the degeneration of the relation between the royal couple and the Revolutionary Government, the royal family's attempted escape to Varennes, the successive decapitations of king and queen, the succession of leaders who could not lead but had to dictate by harangue and outright terror, and, finally, the end of the revolution at the hands of Napoleon Bonaparte who brought order with a "whiff of grapeshot" in 1795.

Carlyle, at the end of his work, speaks of a ship that finally is over the bar after much labor and peril from counter winds, and this is certainly the effect of his narrative. Despite its complexity, his story is the single account of a set of events that give a full demonstration of the glories and horrors of revolution, a period of history that was inevitable but not because of its inevitability, admirable.

In dramatizing a mighty and perilous passage that involved not the French nation alone but all humanity, Thomas Carlyle was able to transform his account of actual events into an apocalyptic statement about man that does not seem to belong to any particular time at all. He did so by means of his style of presentation and by passages of direct, explicit interpretation. Perhaps it is the style that is most decisive. Never before or since has an English writing historian written a book like this history of Carlyle's. The narrative is couched in the present tense, wearing but hortatory, what occurs happens not in a safely distant past, but here and now. The sentimentality of the French philosophes and the ignorant and brutal enthusiasms of the mob threaten us the readers, as Carlyle drags us through mountains of detail and event. Moreover, Carlyle frequently interrupts the forward movement of the narrative to harangue some of the chief actors in his story—Danton, Mirabeau, Marie Antoinette—and as we read it seems possible that they may listen to him and escape what we well know was their historical fate. Some of the harangues, of course, speak not to the historical personages but to us and suggest that we (even more than a century after the appearance of the book) may escape our historical fate if we will but listen to Thomas Carlyle. Or if we may not escape it, we shall understand it better after reading The French Revolution.

Implication becomes explicit in innumerable passages like the following brief one:

Or, apart from all Transcendentalism, is it not a plain truth of sense, which the duller mind can even consider as a truism, that human things wholly are in continual movement and action and reaction, working continually forward, phasis after phasis by unalterable laws, towards prescribed issues? How often must we say and yet not rightly lay to heart: 'The seed that is sown it will spring!' Given the summer's blossoming, then there is also given the autumnal withering: so is it ordered not with seedfields only, but with transactions, arrangements, philosophies, so cieties, French Revolutions whatsoever man works with in this lower world.

A great body of French fact attests to what the drifting clouds of Sartor Resartus suggested. It is the 'law' of life that social forms become old clothes unless they are worn by the people who have some kind of faith: faith in duty, faith in silent work, faith in, finally, the transcendental, self-realizing movement of some force, some kind of deity which is realizing itself in the total movements of human history and particularly in the great men who rise above themselves and command the attention of the rest of mankind, pointing a finger to show the way all men should "now" go.

Carlyle devoted later books to such demonstration: Cromwell, Frederick the Great, and a whole company of great men in On Heroes and Hero Worship (1841)—all of these so exhort us. The essential tragedy of the French Revolution, as Carlyle saw it, was that here was a congenes of events that cried out for a hero and found only destruction and social chaos. It lacked, among other things, a contemporary like Carlyle to annotate that chaos. But the French people's loss is our gain. Upon their agonies Carlyle rests a view of history as a scroll of events always on the verge of parting and revealing to us—in the heavens or in the depths of our beings—the essential divine plan. The French Revolution was actually written and rewritten at 5, Cheyne Row, in London. In spirit, however, it was written on the isle of Patmos in the Aegean where, we were told, a still more famous revelation was composed.

Critique

In this novel Edith Wharton is true to form in her investigation of a society of constricted ideas and stillborn inspirations, in which the women are pampered and the men are sheltered from the realities of basic life. More than that, the contrast between the rich who waste themselves in frivolity, and the workers is brought into painful relief by Edith Wharton's refined but direct prose style. The contrast is embodied in Amherst, who wants to bring his sophisticated intelligence to bear upon the very real problems of the workers, and who is therefore bound to be misunderstood.

The Story

When Justine Brent, a nurse who was visiting Mrs Harry Dressel at Hanaford, volunteered to care for Dillon, an operator who had been injured at Westmore Mills, she was approached by John Amherst, the assistant manager of the mills. Amherst deplored the miserable living and working conditions of the mill workers and, since Dillon's accident had been the result of these conditions, wanted to use his case to show the need for improvement to Bessy Westmore, the newly widowed owner of the mills who was due to make an inspection tour the following day.

The next day Amherst conducted Bessy Westmore through the mills. Bessy, touched by Dillon's case, decided to stay at Hanaford for a while. She recalled that she and Justine had attended school together before Justine's parents had lost their wealth.

Bessy and Amherst made plans to improve the living conditions of the workers, and this association finally led to their marriage. Amherst, hoping to make Westmore Mills a model of human itarianism, was disillusioned to learn that Bessy was not willing to sacrifice the time or the money to accomplish this end.

Some time later, Justine came to Lynbrook, the Amherst country house, to be a companion to Bessy, who was not feeling well. Amherst, meanwhile, spent most of his time at the mills in Hanaford.

Bessy, to compensate for Amherst's long absences, began to entertain lavishly, at the same time confiding her bitterness and loneliness to Justine. Later, Amherst decided to manage a friend's cotton mill in the South.

Justine wrote to Amherst saying that Bessy needed him. Amherst replied that he would not return and, in a postscript, asked her not to permit Bessy to ride a particularly spirited horse they owned. Bessy, learning of his request, later took the horse out into the frost-covered countryside. There Bessy suffered an accident which seriously injured her spinal cord. She was taken home and looked after by Dr Wyant, a local doctor whose proposal Justine had refused some time before. A surgeon and various other consultants were also summoned. Bessy remained paralyzed after an operation. Justine knew that the sick woman would never recover.

By this time Amherst was on a business trip into a remote part of South America, and Bessy's father was in Europe.

One day while Justine was caring for her alone, Bessy regained enough consciousness from her opiate state to plead with Justine to relieve her pain. Justine, convinced that she was doing the right thing, later gave Bessy an overdose of morphine. When Dr Wyant came into the room, Justine told him that

Bessy was dead Dr Wyant seemed to sense what had happened

A year and a half later, Amherst was back at the Westmore Mills Bessy had left half her fortune to Cicely, her daughter by her first marriage, and the other half to Amherst He lived at Hanaford and continued his plans of reconstruction

In the meantime Justine was taking care of Cicely and an intimate friendship developed between the two Later, when she went to visit Mrs Dressel in Hanaford, Justine met Amherst again, a romance developed between them, and they were married Cicely went to live with her grandfather Justine took an active part in Amherst's work

Dr Wyant, who had left Lynwood and married, now needed money, and he came to Justine and threatened to expose her mercy killing of Bessy unless she arranged to have Amherst write him a letter of recommendation to Mr Langhope, who could give him a responsible hospital post Justine, realizing that Dr Wyant had become a narcotic addict, could not in her conscience arrange a recommendation for him When she went out of the room, Amherst came in Learning that Dr Wyant was in financial straits, Amherst wrote him a letter of recommendation in gratitude for his services to Bessy On her return Justine told her husband that Dr Wyant was not qualified for the hospital post Dr Wyant, in retaliation, charged Justine with the mercy killing, and left

Intellectually, Amherst approved of Justine Emotionally, he was horrified at what she had done Their relationship became strained

When Dr Wyant was appointed to the hospital post, Amherst remembered the letter of recommendation He knew that if Mr Langhope were told about

Dr Wyant's addiction to narcotics, the doctor would in turn disclose Justine's crime Amherst told Justine that if Mr Langhope thought that she had been in love with Amherst when she killed Bessy, he and Justine would have to give up the mills, go away, and start a new life Justine secretly went to New York to see Mr Langhope and told him the truth about Dr Wyant and herself She then promised to disappear if Mr Langhope would continue on his former terms with Amherst Mr Langhope agreed

Justine, returning to Hanaford, told Amherst that Mr Langhope had taken the news very well In the course of the following months Amherst's horror of Justine's crime caused their relationship to deteriorate even more At last Justine went to Michigan to resume her nursing career, thus fulfilling her promise to Mr Langhope

A year later Cicely became ill Mr Langhope, realizing that she needed Justine's love, asked Justine to come back to Amherst so that she could be close to Cicely When Amherst learned why Justine had left him, he felt love for her and remorse for his attitude They continued, however, to feel somewhat estranged

About a year later Amherst, speaking at the dedication of the mill workers' new recreational center, gave a stirring tribute to Bessy who, he said, had herself drawn up the plans Justine realized that Amherst was referring to the plans for a gymnasium that Bessy had intended for her own pleasure at Lynbrook, in open defiance of Amherst's wishes Although angry, Justine kept Bessy's secret

As they left the dedication, Amherst told Justine how good he felt over improved conditions at the mill They walked away hand in hand

Critique

The "Genius" traces the career of Eugene Witla, an artist haunted by a search for beauty which leads him to fall in love with many women during his lifetime. Yet the search for beauty brings no more enduring peace or value than do the searches for material security or social success that mark other Dreiser novels. Beauty, in Dreiser's terms, is transitory and relationships shift back and forth so that the artist, like the ordinary human being, is unable to alter any of the significant circumstances of his experience or control his own destiny. The novel contains a great deal of social detail in its pictures of the worlds of art and publishing and of New York life in the early years of this century. Another theme is the tendency of money and commerce to corrupt art.

The Story

Eugene Witla, a sensitive seventeen-year-old boy, lived with his parents and his two sisters in Alexandria, Illinois. Eugene had little idea of what he wanted to do, although his aspirations were vaguely artistic. His father, a sewing machine agent and a respectable member of the middle class, got him a job setting type for the local newspaper. His first enthusiasm was for a local girl named Stella Appleton, but even this affair did not keep Eugene, unhappy in his restlessness, from leaving the small town and going to Chicago to seek his fortune.

When he first went to Chicago, Eugene supported himself by moving stoves, driving a laundry wagon, and collecting for a furniture company. While at the laundry, he met the passionate young Margaret Duff and began his first real love affair About this time he also met, through mutual friends, a schoolteacher named Angela Blue, a fair haired beauty who represented everything fine and elegant to impressionable young Eugene

Eugene began attending art classes at night at the Chicago Art Institute There he demonstrated some talent, particularly in his class in life drawing, for he seemed to have a special sensitivity in conveying the beauty of the human form While at the Art Institute, he met a model, Ruby Kenny, and she soon became his mistress But Ruby, like Margaret, was from the lower classes and made her charms easily available to men Eugene finally left them both, preferring the finer and more fragile beauty of Angela Engaged to the young teacher, he left Chicago to seek his artistic fortune in the wider world of New York

In New York, Eugene painted powerful and realistic pictures of what he saw in the city, and began, from time to time, to sell a few of his paintings After several years he became moderately successful Some of the women he met, like Miriam Finch and Christina Channing, began to educate him in the well read and knowledgeable polish of the New York artistic world Christina became his mistress for a short time, that sophisticated affair somewhat baffled Eugene But in spite of his new polish and elegance, he still remembered Angela Returning to the Middle West to visit her, he seduced her and then, feeling his responsibility, married her and took her back to New York Angela felt that all her dreams of happiness had been fulfilled

Eugene's work impressed M Anatole Charles, manager of a distinguished firm of art dealers in New York M Charles held an exhibit which, a great success, marked Eugene as a powerful and rising young artist Full of enthusiasm, he and Angela went to Paris The show held when he returned was less successful, people felt that his work in Paris had not been fresh or unusual While in Paris,

Eugene had also begun to suffer a vague malaise, a lack of energy and purpose He did not, at that time, realize that his marriage was causing his uneasy and restless feeling

Eugene and Angela returned to Alexandria for an inexpensive rest While there, Eugene met eighteen year old Frieda Roth and found her attractive Since he was twenty nine by this time, Frieda represented for him a renewed interest in youth and beauty Angela was able to stop this relationship before it advanced further than a few kisses stolen under the trees Afterward Eugene and Angela left Alexandria and stayed at several resorts until their money ran out Angela then returned to her parents, while Eugene returned to New York to reestablish his reputation as an artist

Eugene, still restless, found himself unable to paint, and he took a job doing manual labor for the railroad in a town near New York While there, he met and had a passionate affair with his land lady's married daughter, Carlotta Wilson Again Angela heard of the affair and came to reclaim Eugene They decided to try to start again in New York

Eugene worked for a newspaper and then as art director for an advertising agency His boss there, Daniel Summerfield, was a tyrant who broke his promises and failed to pay Eugene adequately Eugene left for another job with the advertising department of the North American Weekly, under the directorship of Obadiah Kalvin Successful there, he moved to Philadelphia to accept a $25 000 job as head of the advertising for all books and publications directed by Marshall P Colfax When Eugene was made a vice president, the other vice president, Florence J White, felt that Eugene's job and salary were unnecessary White was jealous of Eugene and the two became enemies

Eugene became greatly successful, both financially and socially His marriage was hollow, but both he and Angela seemed to accept the situation and to cope with it fairly well. Although Eugene had money enough to retire, his financial success had bred in him a desire for greater financial success, and he had lost the will to paint. His artistic lassitude was matched by the emotional emptiness of his marriage.

About this time Eugene met Mrs Emily Dale, a rich socialite. They exchanged visits and became friendly. One day, Mrs Dale brought Suzanne, her eighteen year old daughter, to tea. Eugene fell in love with Suzanne at first sight, and all the yearning of his search for beauty returned. Soon Eugene and Suzanne were meeting and they confessed their love for each other. Brought up a cultured and sophisticated young woman, Suzanne was willing to become Eugene's mistress. Filled with romantic ideas about becoming an artist's mistress, she insisted, however, on telling her mother of her plans, for she thought that her mother would surely approve. But Mrs Dale did not approve. Angela, when she discovered the affair, decided that the only way to hold Eugene was to have a baby, despite the fact that doctors had warned her against having children. Angela, who had become a Christian Scientist, believed that her firm faith and will would permit her to have the child. Mrs Dale took her daughter to Canada to get her away from Eugene. When he tried to follow Suzanne to Canada, Mrs Dale, through Florence J White and the threat of scandal to the firm, was able to have him fired from his job. Eugene, having lost both his job and Suzanne, returned to comfort Angela during her ordeal.

After Angela died giving birth to a daughter, also named Angela, Eugene had his sister Myrtle come East to help him make a home for the child. For a time in his desolation, Eugene began to read Christian Science, but he failed to find comfort or salvation in its message.

When Eugene and Suzanne met by accident on the street two years later, they were each too self conscious to acknowledge the existence of the other. Living sanely with his daughter and Myrtle and her husband, Eugene began to paint again. He had several shows, was sponsored again by M Charles, and became a popular and fairly successful artist. He began to weave romantic dreams around his daughter Angela, thinking of the time when she would grow up and they could search for beauty together. In spite of his new awareness of man's inability to control his fate, of the delusions that belief in beauty or belief in Christian Science represented, Eugene's emotional impulse toward beauty was still strong enough to keep him fashioning impossible dreams for himself and his daughter.

Critique

This play, the second produced by Wycherley and the most derivative of the four, takes its title and its general theme from a play by Calderon. The style of the play, too, is somewhat in the manner of Molière and through him goes back to the commedia dell' arte, with its brisk criticism of affectation and its elaboration of the gulled father, the saucy maid, the languorous lover, and other farcical types. Wycherley possessed sufficient talent, however, to convert his borrowed materials into a play much copied in later years, particularly by Sheridan, and one still appealing to a modern audience or reader.

The Story

Mr James Formal, who made his living in trade with the Spanish and who admired their pride and gallantry to the point of affecting their manners, had confined his fourteen year old daughter Hippolita, recently returned from boarding school, to the house for a period of a year. During his absence his sister, the widow Caution, acted the part of a duenna to see that Hippolita's virtue was protected in the Spanish manner. In spite of the soured old woman's puritanical wishes—she was adept at sensing sin since it was always on her mind—from her balcony the young girl carried on a flirtation with a young gentleman who frequented a neighboring inn.

Several days before Mr Formal was due to return, Mr Paris, his nephew and a suitor for the hand of Hippolita, arrived in London after a brief stay in France which had made of him a slavish imitator of French dress, manners, and idiom without in the least understanding his own ridiculousness. Since only he had access to the young lady's presence, she made of him a willing dupe in order to make the acquaintance of the tall, handsome Gerrard. As a jest, M de Paris—as the silly coxcomb called himself—challenged Gerrard to contrive a meeting with the young lady whom he had seen only from a distance but of whom he was enamored.

Accepting the challenge, Gerrard broke into Hippolita's chamber, proposed a hasty elopement, and was caught in a near embrace by her returning father Hippolita, her actions always covered by her resourceful maid, cleverly pretended that Gerrard, who was unable to dance a step, was the dancing instructor hired at the behest of her husband to be, who would not have a wife without such French refinement as the ability to dance. The deception was further extended by M de Paris who, blinded as he was by his own ego and splendor in dress and speech, helped the lovers at every turn. Mrs Caution, immediately suspicious of the true situation, repeatedly warned the affected Spanish grandee of a father, who proudly protested that he would never permit such an affair to occur under his roof. Mr Formal, in fact, took a liking to the supposed dancing master and urged him to come three times a day in order that his daughter could learn as rapidly as possible before her imminent marriage. At the same time he took a dislike to his ridiculous nephew and forced that embarrassed but docile young man to change to a Spanish costume and English speech, a calamity in the eyes of the young Gallophile. Meanwhile, Hippolita carried off her flirtation to the point of elopement, a conspiring innocent who allowed herself to be pursued only to become the pursuer. Paris, in turn, had become embroiled in an affair with Mistress Flirt, begun in the inn where he went to scheme against Gerrard.

The dancing lessons were never taken, thanks to the modesty of the young woman who at first would not dance before witnesses and who later plotted to pit her father against her aunt and her betrothed in order to get them all out of the way. The insistence of the suspicious aunt only aroused Mr Formal's ire, he was sure that he could protect the honor of his daughter as well as manage family affairs. His dislike for Paris, who ridiculed his Spanish ways, dress, and attitudes, and his admiration for the punctual dancing master further misled the proud father, who postponed the wedding for another day in order that skills might grow apace.

Plans for the elopement were hastened by Gerrard's interest in Hippolita's twelve hundred pounds and the hiring of a coach and six, the romantic young girl's dream of the perfect rig in which to flee with her lover. The young gallant, in spite of his attempts to learn dancing between lessons, felt also that he would soon be discovered as an impostor and would then find himself the victim of Spanish revenge. Confiding in Paris, Hippolita begged him to maintain the deception lest the whole compromising situation be disclosed. Paris, ironically, played the part of the jilted lover without knowing it. Spanish care, prudence, and circumspection were his allies.

Only the slight diversion of family strife protected the lovers on the night of the planned elopement. Mr. Formal, not satisfied with his prospective son-in-law's loss of French affectations, made him learn Spanish ways as well, to the tune of dance instructions from a blackamoor. The ridiculous young man was so disconsolate that he repulsed even the advances of Hippolita's maid, the designing Prue, who, being better acquainted with the comforts of love, suffered more than the others did from the household restrictions. Sibling rivalry now reached a climax when Mr. Formal convinced himself that what Mrs. Caution had said all along was true. Furthermore, Hippolita took Gerrard's haste to elope as an indication he was marrying her only for her money, and she refused to leave with him as they had planned. When Gerrard, believing that the game was lost, revealed to all that his plans had gone awry, his remarks were interpreted to mean only that his pupil would not learn. He then escaped the threat of exposure by breaking the strings of a fiddle which would have proved him unmusical. Reinstated in Mr. Formal's good graces, he was asked to bring the musicians for the wedding celebration.

When he appeared for the last lesson, Gerrard and Hippolita were reconciled. Convinced that he loved her for herself alone, she assured him that she did, after all, have twelve hundred pounds—a fact she had denied earlier to test his devotion. Gerrard no longer needing obsequious, dandified Paris as an ally, cuffed him soundly, treatment which the craven fellow did not take amiss, so sure was he that this was his wedding day. In fact, he blunderingly helped the lovers by protecting Hippolita, the parson, and Gerrard from the wrath of the rightfully indignant father and held Mr. Formal off long enough for the marriage ceremony to be performed.

Mr. Formal, unwilling to admit that he had been duped, acted the part of willing collaborator and told his spiteful sister and the effeminate Paris that he planned the wedding especially for their discomfiture.

Paris was outdone a second time when Mistress Flirt bound him to so many illicit promises as to make matrimony seem much less binding by comparison.

Critique

Though not the equal of Shakespeare's great comedies, The Gentleman Usher approaches them in richness and variety. Delightful comic scenes are interwoven with the serious story of a father and son's rivalry for a young girl. The play contains a wide range of successful characterizations, among them the figure of Bassiolo, the self-satisfied and gullible usher, is especially memorable. The action, slow in starting, moves rapidly from the middle of the play to the conclusion.

The Story

Prince Vincentio was deeply in love with Margaret, a gentlewoman of the court, but his courtship was inhibited by the fact that his father, Duke Alphonso, was also in love with the girl. Since the duke was not a man to tolerate opposition, it was unthinkable for Vincentio to become his father's open rival. When he disclosed his feelings to his close friend, Count Strozza, his friend encouraged him to carry on his suit in secret.

Meanwhile, the duke was planning a boar hunt near the home of Count Lasso, Margaret's father. It was not the hunt that interested the duke, but the festivities at Lasso's house that would follow, for he hoped that he would be able to advance his cause with Margaret during the feast. The duke's chief ally in this cause and his favorite courtier at the moment was Medice, a base lord noted for his poor apparel and his illiteracy. Confronted with the upstart, Strozza and Vincentio grasped every opportunity to ridicule him.

When the duke arrived at Lasso's castle, where elaborate preparations had been made for his entertainment, he was bound as a captive. His men, dressed in costumes, explained to Margaret that he was a captive to her charms. She unbound him and though she fully understood the duke's intentions, treated the matter as a compliment and jest.

Acting for his master, Medice sought information about Margaret. Aware of her coolness toward the duke, he believed that she must have another lover. To discover the name of this person, he plied Margaret's aunt, Cortezza, with sack. For his troubles he got some shameless flirting from the old hag and also a hint that Vincentio might be the guilty person.

During the festivities Vincentio himself was seeking the services of a go-between. Finally, acting on Margaret's suggestion, he approached her father's usher, Bassiolo, a pompous fool quite susceptible to Vincentio's flattery. Vincentio, treating Bassiolo as an equal, embraced him and asked that he be called Vince. He gave the usher a jewel and hinted that Bassiolo could expect a high position when Vincentio became duke. Bassiolo, because of his self-conceit, had no idea that Vincentio was secretly laughing at him. When the prince brought up the subject of exchanging letters with Margaret, the usher immediately volunteered his services.

As arranged, Bassiolo brought Margaret a letter from Vincentio, but she, wishing to implicate the usher, refused it on the grounds of her attachment to the duke. After an argument against her marriage to an old man, Bassiolo forced Vincenzio's letter upon her. When she had read the letter, she told Bassiolo to answer it. His missive, indited in a turgid style, she declined to send, telling him that it sounded too good for a woman's writing. Her own letter to Vincenzio, she dictated to the usher.

Medice, angered by Strozza's mockery, also felt that Strozza stood in the way of his advancement. He decided, therefore, to get rid of him by having one of his men kill the young count during a hunt. The man succeeded in hitting Strozza with an arrow, but failed to kill him. The doctor who treated him said that he would have to cut the flesh around the wound in order to remove the arrow, but Strozza, in a highly agitated state, refused this operation. Cynanche, his wife, counseled Christian patience, but with no immediate effect.

When Bassiolo brought Margaret's letter to Vincenzio, the prince pretended to believe that it did not really come from her. The usher, responding exactly as Vincenzio hoped he would, offered to bring Margaret to prove her authorship. Vincenzio, meanwhile, had decided that the only way to forestall his father's plans was to marry Margaret immediately. When she came, they performed their own marriage ceremony by knitting a scarf around each other's arms and making their vows. As they were completing their simple rite, news came of the wounding of Strozza.

As a result of his wife's ministrations, Strozza's spirits had improved. Freely submitting himself to the will of heaven, he had been relieved of pain. His humility had also brought him new powers of understanding. He predicted that the arrow head would fall out of his side on the seventh day.

Medice, pursuing his investigations in the meantime, had Cortezza rob Margaret's jewel box. There the letter from Vincenzio was discovered. When the affair was revealed to Duke Alphonso, he thundered enraged threats against his son Cortezza, believing that she knew the secret trysting place of the two lovers, offered to reveal it, and Medice and the duke made plans to discover Vincenzio and Margaret at their next meeting.

Lasso, in the meantime, had also begun to suspect his daughter, and a conversation in which he threatened her and her supposed lover was overheard by Bassiolo. The usher, terrified at the prospects of punishment for his complicity, began to suspect that the prince had been making a fool of him. When he notified Margaret that he intended to reveal the truth to her father, she reminded him that he had railed against the duke, forced Vincenzio's letter upon her, and written a letter for her to Vincenzio, a letter still in her possession. Realizing that he was trapped, Bassiolo claimed he had spoken of betrayal only in jest. When Margaret ordered him to arrange a meeting for her with Vincenzio, he immediately complied.

Hidden in the room where the two lovers met were Duke Alphonso, Medice, Lasso and Cortezza. Bassiolo, again proud of his part in the intrigue, freely insulted the unseen duke and Medice. At last the eavesdroppers revealed themselves. Vincenzio, warned by the usher, made his escape. The duke, saying that his son would suffer death or banishment or dered Medice to capture him. After Medice had left and the duke had taken time for reflection, he sent a man after Medice to see that Vincenzio was not harmed.

Margaret, determined that she would not be forced into marriage with the duke, borrowed from Cortezza an ointment that would cause horrible blisters on the skin. After covering her face with this ointment, she visited Alphonso, revealed her disfigurement, and denounced him for his actions. This blow to the duke was followed quickly by a second one: news was brought that Medice, against his orders, had wounded Vincenzio. With Vincenzio, when he was brought in, was Strozza, who had recovered, the arrow having fallen from his side as he had predicted Strozza charged the duke with being a tyrant, and Duke Alphonso, seeing before him the consequences of his deeds, humbly accepted the rebuke and expressed his fervent wish that he could undo his actions. So possible tragedy was averted. Vincentio, although seriously wounded, would recover, and he desired to marry Margaret in spite of her terrible disfigurement. She at first refused his offer because she felt he could only pity her, not love her. But this obstacle was removed when a doctor revealed that he could remove the blisters from her face. Bassiolo, expecting punishment, received instead the commendation of the duke. Medice, after admitting that he had misrepresented himself as a nobleman, was exiled. Duke Alphonso, happy at the turn of events, gave his blessing to the marriage of Vincentio and Margaret.

GEORGIA SCENES

First published 1835

It was an auspicious moment for American literature when the presses of the Augusta State Rights Sentinel issued a collection of pieces that had appeared in that newspaper, for this book, born in obscurity, was Georgia Scenes, Characters, Incidents, &c., in the First Half Century of the Republic by "A Native Georgian." The author was not a professional man of letters, but rather one of those wonderfully versatile gentlemen who flourished in nineteenth-century America: lawyer, judge, politician, Methodist minister, newspaper publisher, and educator (at various times president of Emory College, Centenary College, the University of Mississippi, and the University of South Carolina). Augustus Baldwin Longstreet was ideally suited to the task of writing an informal social history of the southwestern frontier. An educated man (Yale), but no scholar, his activities brought him into personal contact with the whole range of men and manners in the growing country. Although Georgia Scenes now enjoys a position as a minor classic, it appealed to its own times as a new and exciting vein of writing. Edgar Allan Poe heralded it as an "omen of better days for the literature of the South," and the reading public called for twelve editions by 1894.

Georgia Scenes is significant on several counts. It is a pioneer work of realism and one of the milestones in the local color movement. Longstreet's careful use of dialect foreshadows a whole school of writing that reached a culmination of sorts with Joel Chandler Harris' Uncle Remus tales. As a humorist, Longstreet is intimately connected with the great tradition of rough and tumble frontier humorists. In this category he is a real precursor of Mark Twain, and there is much in Georgia Scenes that would not be out of place in Huckleberry Finn. Finally, Longstreet wrote with satirical intent and an argument can be made for his claim to a position among the forerunners of the revolt from the village movement.

Although he was not a literary theorist, Longstreet seems to have worked out a rough theory of realism. It would be folly to consider Georgia Scenes an accidental combination of lucky hits. The preface to the first edition shows that the author's aim was to record accurately the details of the life he had observed. "They [the sketches] consist of nothing more than fanciful combinations of real incidents or characters. Some of the sketches are as literally true as the frailties of memory would allow them to be. The reader will find in the object of the sketches an apology for the minuteness of detail into which some of them run, and for the introduction of some things into them which would have been excluded were they merely the creations of fancy." However, Longstreet was a reporter with a purpose, he applied realism as the handmaiden of social criticism. Like The Spectator, which he appears to have admired, Longstreet exposes the follies and vulgarities of his times for the purpose of reforming men and manners. A number of the sketches close with didactic tags. But the author was too much of "A Native Georgian" to advocate replacing good American social norms with foreign modes. He wishes to see a standard of natural, unaffected American manners prevail. Rarely, if ever, does Longstreet miss an opportunity to ridicule or scorn European manners or even imported culture. On the subject of greetings between women he remarks: "The custom of kissing, as practised in these days by the amiables, is borrowed from the French, and by them from Judas." The whole of a rather thin sketch, "The Song," is devoted to the horrors of Continental music and the absurdity of American girls who study it.

The nineteen sketches of Georgia Scenes are roughly divided into two groups—those dealing chiefly with men and those which deal with women. In their original periodical publication, the sketches appeared as two series signed with two pseudonyms. These general categories do not circumscribe the material. A whole world of rural and urban life is packed into the fairly slim volume: brawls, shooting matches, horse races, balls, inns, old wives, young bloods, country schools, high society, and Negroes. As Longstreet noted in his preface, there is an abundance of detail. But it is not intrusive, for these are not tightly plotted stories. The term sketches describes them perfectly: generally brief descriptive pieces which excel at catching atmosphere, very much like the form of Washington Irving's Sketch Book pieces.

The two best known and most frequently anthologized sketches in Georgia Scenes are concerned with the cruder aspects of rural life. In "The Horse Swap," a professional trader called the "Yellow Blossom" is outduded while trying to pass off a horse with a terrible sore under the saddle. In this sketch Longstreet shows a sympathy for animals that is completely characteristic of the volume. Not only does he pity the suffering of dumb beasts but he also sees that savage treatment of animals brutalizes the human beings who inflict it. There is probably nothing else in American literature, before Jack London, quite like "The Fight." In the story two bully boys who have always avoided an encounter are pushed into a brawl by a disagreement between their wives. During the course of the knock down and drag out fight an ear, a finger, part of a nose and part of a cheek are bitten off. A minor character in "The Fight" is of considerable interest. Ransy Sniffle is a diseased runt whose greatest delight is starting fights between other people. The brutality of fights is also scored in "Georgia Theatrics," which shows a man rehearsing all the parts in a bloody fight.

Although Longstreet never uses a Negro as a leading character, he takes great pains to transcribe the speech of Negroes, and in this respect he was ahead of his time. The practical joker of "The Character of a Native Georgian" asks a colored woman to sell him half a live chicken, and she protests: "Name o' God! what sort o' chance got to clean chicken in de market house! Whay de water for scall um and wash um? Ech ech! Fedder fly all ober de buckera man meat, he come bang me fo' true. No, massa, I mighty sorry for your wife, but I no cutty chicken open." Longstreet is equally careful to reproduce the dialect of backwoods whites. In "A Sage Conversation" he records the talk of three old women sitting by the fire. "Indeed, I have a great leanin' to sweats of yerbs, in all ailments such as colds, and rheumaty pains, and pleurisies, and sich they're wonderful good" This interest in colloquial speech is closely associated with the author's interest in folk customs, as can be seen in "The Turn Out," which describes the custom of giving pupils a holiday if they can turn out (barricade out) the teacher

Longstreet's crusade against the barbarity of rural sports is most evident in "The Gander Pulling" and "The Turf" In the latter a Negro jockey is killed, and the comment Longstreet puts into the mouth of a woman spectator is worthy of Mark Twain at his bitterest "I declare, had it not been for that little accident, the sport would have been delightful"

One sketch in Georgia Scenes is not by Longstreet "The Militia Company Drill," by Oliver Hillhouse Prince, gives an account of a wildly undisciplined muster It is as good as the other pieces and merits inclusion in the volume

After Augustus B Longstreet mounted the ladder of respectability he came to feel that Georgia Scenes was an undignified work Though he continued to write, he wrote nothing else that has survived only one book gives him a literary eminence he probably never expected

THE GLASS MENAGERIE

Type of work Drama

Author Tennessee Williams (1914-)

Time 1930's

Locale St Louis Missouri

First presented 1945

Principal characters

AMANDA WINGFIELD, a woman who lives in illusion

TOM, her son

LAURA, her crippled daughter

JIM O'CONNOR the gentleman caller

This drama of illusion has been much praised for its tenderness gentleness, and fragile charm The first of Williams' plays to achieve commercial success, it launched him upon a spectacular career in the American theater Some have claimed that he never again succeeded in regaining the height that he here attained, and that his subsequent work, popular though it may have been is anticlimactic

The action of the drama, involving only four characters, is built around Amanda and her effect upon her son and daughter Infuriating and pathetic by turns, Amanda, an incurable romantic, lives by and for the illusions of her youth, when she was—or thinks she was—the belle of a small Southern town in the Delta region It is the ghost of this lost past that she constantly conjures up in a pitiful and futile effort to obliterate the grim reality of lower middle class life in St Louis She has been deserted by her husband, she now lives only for her children, for whom she sincerely wants happiness and security It is the irony of the story, however, that, by her insistent nagging, her endless repetition of anecdotes from her romanticized version of her girlhood, and her inability to face the actualities of her situation, she has crushed her daughter and alienated her son At one moment she can envelop herself in exaggerated "Southern charm" at the next, she can be an unbearable shrew

Laura the daughter, is the most pitiable of the three members of the family A cripple and so abnormally shy that she cannot have even the most ordinary relationships with people, she takes refuge in her "glass menagerie," a collection of small glass animal figurines that symbolizes the fragility of her life and her retreat from reality She is hopelessly inadequate to play the role of "Southern belle" that her mother wishes her to as sume or even to make a marriage that will give her security. She has cared for only one boy during her life—a pompous high school hero. Jim O'Connor is the type, to be found in every school or college, who never in later life measures up to his youthful promise. He is now working in a warehouse, trying hard to improve himself, but still only a clerk. When Tom, who does not know that his sister had ever known Jim, brings him home to dinner, Laura has her one moment of happiness and her one escape from the world into which she has retreated.

After the dinner that Amanda has produced in a desperate effort to impress him, Jim, in his awkward fashion, does give Laura a flash of self-confidence, enough to enable us to see what she might become if she could ever break out of her shell. Too unworldly to handle the situation, she is dazed with happiness when Jim kisses her. But Jim, crude as he may be, is fundamentally honest enough to confess that Laura can expect nothing of him, for he is engaged and will be married soon. And so the momentary illusion of happiness collapses around Laura just as the illusion of success collapses around Amanda. It is the final irony of the play that Amanda, who blames the entire catastrophe on her son, drives him from her in their final quarrel with the accusation that he is a dreamer who lives in a world of illusion.

Tom, the frustrated son, is the least successful of the characters, for he is the familiar type of the young man with literary ambitions imprisoned in the deadly monotony of a job in a warehouse. Indeed, with his anguished revolt against his family, his furious outcries against his fate, and his final escape, he seems to have stepped out of a novel by Thomas Wolfe. We can feel desperately sorry for him because he is burdened with the care of a nagging mother and a crippled sister, however, since his inner life and his literary gifts are described rather than seen, he remains unconvincing and shadowy, even though the whole story of the play is seen through his memory.

From the point of view of theatrical technique, the play holds much of interest. Williams uses the long and involved stage directions first made popular by Shaw plus a very elaborate and complicated set of stage devices. The question of the validity of such technical tricks remains an open one. Shaw's use of elaborate stage directions, which all too frequently turned into lengthy and tiresome preachments, succeeded in splitting a play into two aspects: the play as produced in which these little essays naturally could not appear, and the play as published, in which these comments were extremely important. In the printed version of The Glass Menagerie, Williams makes a modified use of this device. His elaborate stage directions comment on the situation as well as give the reader some of the advantages of the spectator.

He also employs the device of using Tom as both the narrator of and commentator on the action, somewhat as in the role of a Greek chorus, and as a character in the play. Further, Williams has devised a complicated set of stage effects—rather like the tricks used in a Dos Passos novel—to point up the mood of his play. The question might well be raised of how legitimate this theatrical sleight of hand may be. Should not a dramatist be able to rely on the significance of his fable without calling on so much mechanical ingenuity to get it presented?

Although, in a pantomime scene at the end of the play, Amanda achieves something like dignity as she comforts Laura, it cannot be said that the play reaches the heights of genuine tragedy. The characters, pathetic though they may be, are too shallow, too trivial, to have in them the qualities of tragic greatness. The point has been made that this is a story of "lives of quiet desperation" and that the choice of the 1930s for the setting deliberately contrasts these lives with an increasingly violent world in which illusion can have no place. Perhaps this is part of the human condition of our times and therefore the only possible subject for a serious dramatist Yet it remains true that the mood of the play is pathetic, not tragic, and that Williams has created a drama of gentle pathos rather than one of high tragedy

Critique

The Gods are Athirst is a satire dealing with the Reign of Terror which followed the French Revolution. Although the excesses of the period are satirized, the satire also delves more deeply, demonstrating the folly and the inhuman brutality of a mind committed to a political cause or party. The romantic artist, Évariste Gamelin, begins by feeling a genuine desire to commit himself to the cause of the revolutionary Jacobins and ends by ordering the execution of his closest friend. From a rational and humane point of view, Anatole France deplores the idiotic barbarism of causes and the self-righteous cruelty of those convinced that they were reforming society. The characters are primarily abstractions, each designed to represent an idea current at the time. Évariste is the foolish romantic swayed into inhumanity by his allegiance to the cause, his friend

Brotteaux is the atheist and intellectual executed because he will not join and will not abandon his integrity. Élodie, a kind of symbol of France itself, is purely physical, without ideals or convictions or fidelity to anything, and she, alone of the three principal characters, survives. In brilliantly satiric fashion, Anatole France probed the excesses of devotion to the cause of the state but in probing them he made it clear that their origin was the brutal, self-deceiving, self-glorifying, irrational nature of man himself.

The Story

Évariste Gamelin, a young man who lived with his mother, was a not very talented pupil of Jacques David, the painter. The only one of Évariste's paintings that gained any recognition was a canvas depicting the story of Orestes and Electra.

THE GODS ARE ATHIRST by Anatole France Translated by Mrs Wilfrid Jackson By permission of the publishers Dodd Mead & Co Inc Copyright 1913 by Dodd Mead & Co Inc Renewed All rights reserved

People claimed that Évariste's painting of Orestes was really a self portrait

An older artist, Maurice Brotteaux, lived in the garret of the Gamelin house in 1793. A former nobleman, he made his living creating Punch and Judy dolls.

Évariste became an active member of the Jacobins, genuinely believing that their success and complete control would bring about a new and better era for all the people in France. He even had a plan to change playing cards from pictures of kings, queens, and jacks to symbols of liberty, equality, and fraternity, but his fellow revolutionaries would not finance his designs. Brotteaux, on the other hand, was an atheist, an intellectual, a skeptic without faith in the goodness of the masses.

Évariste tried, unsuccessfully, to sell his new designs for playing cards to Jean Blaise, a printseller. Évariste was in love with Blaise's daughter Élodie, who finally got Évariste, far more naive than she, to propose to her. When Élodie confessed that she had had a lover, Évariste was certain that it must have been a cynical aristocrat who had used her cruelly. On political grounds he forgave her.

One day, while Brotteaux and Évariste were waiting in a breadline, a woman screamed that her purse was gone and pointed to a cleric, Père Longuemare, as the thief. People, all excited, ran about accusing Longuemare of being a Capuchin, a member of an order opposed to the Jacobins even though, by his speech, he was clearly a Barnabite. Brotteaux defended the cleric but to no avail until the woman found that she had had her purse all along. The idealistic Évariste believed the incident demonstrated that in the new society, people were so eager for justice they would leave their places in the breadline to find a thief. The wiser Brotteaux realized that they simply wanted to accuse others. He later gave Père Longuemare a place of refuge in his garret.

Mme de Rochemaure, whose late husband had been a procurer for the king, was an intriguer who pretended revolutionary ardor. She, trailed by Henry, a young dragoon, was interested in using her new revolutionary connections to make more money. She wanted to meet Marat, who she had heard was easily swayed by flattery, to interest him in some Swiss financial speculations, but Marat was killed by Charlotte Corday before Mme de Rochemaure had her chance. She did, however, manage to use her connections to get Évariste a post as a juror on the Grand Tribunal, the group of Jacobins responsible for trying political crimes. On his first day on the Grand Tribunal, Évariste made an impassioned plea for justice and the tribunal then voted not to execute an innocent man. Évariste was so excited that, later, he allowed the experienced Élodie to seduce him; the corruption of the innocent had begun.

Tiring of Henry, Mme de Rochemaure wrote a letter to an old friend who had left France. In it she quoted a few of Brotteaux's witty remarks about the new state. Henry, jealously believing that Mme de Rochemaure had become Brotteaux's mistress again, stole the letter and turned it over to the authorities. Both Mme de Rochemaure and Brotteaux became politically suspect. In addition, the loyal "citoyens" began to say that Brotteaux's dolls were really meant to be caricatures of Jacobins. When Brotteaux was arrested, a prostitute named Athenais, whom he had once befriended, protested and cried out, "Long live the king!" as the soldiers took Brotteaux away. Athenais was also arrested.

The Grand Tribunal became far less just and bloodier. Trials were no longer held, prisoners were brought up in lots of fifty, convicted, and sent away to be executed. Évariste applauded the efficiency of the new arrangement.

Évariste's sister Julie had, a few years earlier, run away to England with her lover. When they returned to France, they were captured and the lover was condemned to death. Even old Mme Gamelin tried to intercede for Jules.

lover with Évariste But Évariste was an adamant supporter of the new justice, confirming the symbolic fact that his portrait of Orestes was really a self portrait Besides his cruelty to his sister Évariste was obsessed with the desire to discover and punish Élodie's first lover He thought that the man must be Jacques Maubel, a quiet but aristocratic young gallant There was no evidence to support this claim, but Évariste irritated by Maubel's lack of faith in the people, had Maubel arrested and executed In reality, Élodie's first lover had been Henry, now a dragoon but in those days a clerk Élodie, the symbol of France itself, was so impressed by Évariste's cruel power in having Maubel killed that she loved her tribune more than ever

convicted without trial, and executed in the same lot of fifty Évariste did not say a word A short time later Robespierre, feeling that enough blood had been shed, tried to reform the Grand Tribunal, but the people turned on him and killed him Soon the mob switched again and killed the members of the Grand Tribunal, including Évariste For a time, Paris was bathed in anarchy and chaos

The mob, as irresponsible as the tribunes had been, killed many, both aristocrats and peasants, political supporters and opponents After Paris had become quiet and orderly again, Élodie became the mistress of a calm, nonpolitical, young engraver named Philippe Desmahis Two people entirely unconcerned with politics or causes, governments or liberty, they managed to survive the grim Reign of Terror

Clifford Odets began his theatrical career as an actor with the Theatre Guild and was later one of the founders of the Group Theatre, which presented some of his plays His early work was received with enthusiasm by the critics, but his later efforts have proved disappointing Golden Boy, written in 1937, was described by Odets as an allegory, and some of the individual scenes and much of the dialogue represent him at his best Dealing with a young Italian violinist who becomes a prize fighter in order to gain money and fame, the fable reflects the fight of every individual for a place in the world The play has been praised as good entertainment, but it has also been denounced for its episodic, movie-like construction

Tom Moody, a fight manager, and Lorna Moon, his mistress who wanted to marry him, were having an argument about Tom's wife, who would not give him a divorce. Tom, wanting money for the divorce, needed to find a winning fighter. While they were talking, Joe Bonaparte arrived to tell them that Moody's fighter had broken his hand and could not fight that night. Joe, whom nobody knew, persuaded them to let him substitute and he won.

Joe, a musician, had always wanted a good violin, and his father had bought him one for his twenty-first birthday. When Joe returned home, his father, who had not been told of the fight, had read of it in the papers and was very much distressed. He tried to persuade Joe to give up fighting and continue his study of music, but Joe wanted to fight. His father, hurt, did not give him the violin.

Joe fought well after that, but there was a serious conflict between the sensitive musician that he truly was and the brutal fighter he had to be. He held back in the ring, fearing that he would ruin his hands for the violin. When Moody tried to persuade him that fame and money would be more important than music, he succeeded only in antagonizing Joe, who threatened to quit. Lorna agreed to try to persuade Joe to reconsider. Joe was basically a musician, but he had been laughed at and hurt by people. Fighting was not a part of his nature, but he wanted to fight back and music could not do that for him. While he was explaining all this to Lorna, he had already decided to remain in the ring.

When Joe was preparing for a fight tour, Mr. Bonaparte asked Lorna to help the young man find himself. When he tried to give Joe the violin, the boy refused it. Then he asked for a blessing, which his father refused to give.

Joe's tour was a great success except for one fight. He had not fought well on that occasion because he had seen a man with a violin and was reminded of his music and his own past. Moody realized that Joe had to be prevented from having any contact with his family and his past.

The fight world changed Joe's personality. He liked the money and the notoriety. He bought a Duesenberg, which he drove recklessly, and he became difficult to manage. Eddie Fuseli, a gambler and a gunman, wanted to buy a piece of Joe, and Joe agreed, to Moody's dislike. He told Lorna to take care of Joe in her own way.

Joe fell in love with Lorna and asked her to give up Moody. She denied loving Joe and said that she could not leave Moody because she felt sorry for him. Joe knew that she was not telling the truth when she began to cry. They talked about their love and Joe demanded that she tell Moody at once. She said that she would, but when she went to tell him she learned that his wife had agreed to a divorce and that they could be married in a few months. With this knowledge she was unable to tell him about her love for Joe. Later Joe had an argument with Moody and demanded that Lorna tell Moody about their love. Although Lorna denied that there was anything between them, she confessed the truth to Moody when they were alone again.

One night Mr. Bonaparte came to see Joe fight. Fuseli was disturbed because he did not want Joe to see his father, but Joe saw him anyway. He also saw Moody and Lorna together. Mr. Bonaparte, seeing that Joe had completely changed, finally gave his blessing to Joe's career. Joe cried after his father left. During the fight Mr. Bonaparte went back into the dressing room rather than see the fighters hurt each other. Joe returned after he had won the fight, but when his trainer attempted to remove the gloves, Joe told him that he would have to cut one of them off. His hand was broken.

Now that he could never be a musician, Joe was all fighter. Moody and Lorna announced that they were getting married in a few days. Because Joe was still in love with Lorna, it was obvious that his unhappiness was hurting his career. While Joe was fighting badly in his most important match, Fuseli blamed Lorna and threatened to kill her. But

Joe returned to the dressing room a victor. A few moments later they were all told that the other fighter had died after being floored by Joe's knockout punch. Everyone left the dressing room except Lorna and Joe. She told him that she loved him and asked him to go back to his music. He showed her his mutilated hands. However, he decided to give up fighting, and he and Lorna went for a wild ride in order to celebrate.

Fuseli, Moody, and the others, not knowing where Joe and Lorna had gone, went to Joe's home and drank and talked while they waited for his return. The telephone rang in the middle of an argument to decide who would own Joe in the future. Joe and Lorna had been killed in an automobile accident. Mr. Bonaparte left to claim Joe's body and bring him home where he belonged.

Gone with the Wind, one of the best selling novels of all time, is the story of the subjugation of a proud people by war and the harsh 'reconstruction' that followed. Swept along with these events is the beautiful, headstrong daughter of a wealthy plantation owner who, when reduced to poverty and hardship in the wake of Sherman's cruel and vicious destruction of the countryside, used her feminine wiles to regain her lost wealth. Having at last attained this goal, she was unable to hold the one man she really loved.

A historical romance of prodigious proportions, this first novel by an unknown author went through twelve printings within two months of publication. Its 1,037 pages enthralled millions, the sales in a single year exceeding two million copies. The novel has been translated into two dozen languages and even after more than twenty years, sales continue at a pace brisk enough to please any publisher. The motion picture lived up to Hollywood's most studied superlatives and no other photoplay has even approached its world-wide popularity.

The unprecedented success of Margaret Mitchell's only novel may be attributed to a combination of the author's style—a sustained narrative power combined with remarkable character delineation—and the universality of her subject, the struggle for survival when the accustomed security of civilized life is abruptly swept away and the human spirit suddenly stands alone. In spite of the fast-moving narrative, one is aware of this underlying thread of universality, this familiarity with human tragedy that all men can understand

Perhaps the most lasting impression one gets from the novel however, is the skill with which Miss Mitchell handles her characterizations. Scarlett O'Hara is, without question, one of the memorable characters in fiction. So lifelike did she become in the public mind that the producers of the motion picture preferred not to risk an established actress in the role and be accused of miscasting, they sent to England for a relatively unknown young actress to portray the fire and passion flashing from the tempestuous Scarlett.

The story of Scarlett O'Hara alone would be reason enough for a best seller, many books have achieved such eminence on far less. This daughter of Irish temper and French sensibilities displays stark and bold emotions that grip the reader. He follows her intense, futile love for Ashley Wilkes, her spiteful marriage to Charles Hamilton, her opportunistic stealing of her sister's fiancé Frank Kennedy, her grasping arrangement of convenience with Rhett Butler. He is sometimes appalled at her callous use of her sex to gain her ends, he looks in vain for some sign of lofty ideals in this woman, and yet, in spite of all this, he finds laudable her will to survive and her contempt for her conquerors.

Three other characters stand out, admirably drawn but not quite inspiring the amount of interest created by Scarlett. Rhett Butler, dissolute son of Charleston blue bloods, is a cynical, materialistic blockade runner who consorts openly with the enemy and scoffs at patriotic ideals. Forceful, masculine, he is accustomed to taking what he wants. His one unfulfilled desire is the love of Scarlett and this frustration finally breaks his spirit. When at last, after several years of unhappy marriage, he gains her love as Ashley defaults, Rhett, now a bitter, fleshy toper, has already reached his decision to leave her.

Ashley Wilkes, the weak-willed object of Scarlett's misguided passion, depicts the impractical idealist dependent on a stronger will to solve life's problems for him. When Scarlett observes his unstable reaction to his wife's death she is finally able to see him as he really is. Shorn of his cavalier manners and the aura of courtly romance she had bestowed upon him, he becomes in her eyes an ineffectual weakling and the sterility of her forbidden love is at last apparent.

Melanie, in a way the winner despite her death at the end of the novel, found happiness and tranquility in her devotion to her insecure husband. Retentive, ladylike, saccharine, but intellectually attuned to Ashley, there is never any question that she, not Scarlett, should be Ashley's wife.

High-spirited Scarlett was sixteen when the Civil War began. She fancied herself in love with Ashley Wilkes, the sensitive, sophisticated son at a neighboring plantation, but he did not acknowledge her love. Upon the announcement of his engagement to his soft-spoken cousin Melanie Hamilton, Scarlett impetuously married Melanie's brother Charles, to that surprised young man's pride and delight. Less than a year later Scarlett was a war widow and an unwilling mother.

Here the novel loses the tempo of leisurely plantation life and takes on the urgency of a region at war. Leaving her father's plantation, Tara, Scarlett traveled twenty-five miles to Atlanta to stay with her dead husband's relatives. Later, as Atlanta was besieged by Sherman's troops, Scarlett returned home to Tara through the battle lines at night in a wagon provided by Rhett. With her were Melanie and Ashley's day-old son whom Scarlett had delivered as guns sounded in the distance.

Approaching Tara through the battle-scarred countryside she saw that most of the plantation mansions had been looted and burned by the enemy. Tara had been spared as a headquarters, though the outbuildings and baled cotton had been burned and the hogs, cows and chickens killed Scarlett's mother, too ill with fever to be moved as the soldiers approached, died with her beloved Tara filled with Yankee conquerors. Her father's mind unable to stand these shocks, was gone. Now the sheltered Southern belle was faced with the formidable prospect of feeding, from a plantation stripped bare by the ruthless invaders, her father, her child, two sisters Melanie, and the few servants who remained faithfully behind when the others ran off.

These are the events that helped to shape the character of Scarlett O'Hara and they explain the hardness, the aversion, that prompted many of her actions. For example she was determined to hold on to Tara and when the carpetbaggers arbitrarily levied an extra three hundred dollar tax with the expectation of taking over the property for unpaid taxes, Scarlett unhesitatingly married storeowner Frank Kennedy, who was engaged to her sister Suellen, and he dutifully paid the three hundred dollar tax.

The art of Margaret Mitchell makes such reprehensible acts seem normal under the circumstances, for the author has skillfully brought us along the same harsh road Scarlett has traveled and we, being thus exposed to the same experiences, understand, even condone, her responses.

Once Scarlett had learned the law of the jungle her native abilities came into their own. Borrowing money from Rhett, she bought and operated successfully a sawmill and soon was financially secure. When Frank was killed by occupation troops she married Rhett, who had amassed half a million dollars during the war as a blockade runner. But even the birth of a child, Bonnie Blue, did not bring happiness to this union because of the love for Ashley to which Scarlett absurdly clung. Rhett, always jealous of this will of the wisp emotion, was unable to cope with what he could not understand. Ironically, Rhett overcame his love for Scarlett just as she was discovering that it was he, not Ashley, whom she loved. When she tried to tell him this, Rhett announced brusquely that she was too late, that he was leaving her forever. There was no mistaking the finality of his words but, characteristically, Scarlett, the self-confident schemer, would not accept them as such.

Gone with the Wind is not a happy book. There are flicks of humor, but for the most part a deadly seriousness pervades the novel and in the end the callous, grasping cynicism of the leading characters mocks them and, properly, only an empty loneliness remains.

A natural question concerns the position of Gone with the Wind and its author in world literature. On the strength of her one novel Margaret Mitchell certainly cannot be called a great author. Whether her outstanding book will rank as a great novel will not be decided by those who consider the question at this early date. If the work eventually achieves first rank, it will be because Scarlett O'Hara continues to convey to future readers the same essence of human behavior that we ourselves see in her now.

so doing gave to future generations an unrivaled glimpse into Paris at the end of the Middle Ages and a picture of the complete degradation of a human person.

ality Also, he preserved for us, like flies caught in amber, a score of men and women of the fifteenth century Paris underworld, who, but for him, would have been lost forever in the night of history

By 1456, Villon had written The Little Testament, a poem of forty eight line stanzas composed in the form of a mock will in which he could bequeath to friends and enemies gifts appropriate to each In The Great Testament he employed the same device, extending the poem to a hundred and seventy four stanzas interspersed with lais, rondeaux, and ballades, the most celebrated of the last being the Ballad of Dead Ladies, familiar to us through Rossetti's translation with the famous refrain, "But where are the snows of yester year?" The device of a testament enabled Villon to pay off old grudges by bequeathing, with mock solemnity, legacies that would illuminate the character of each recipient, as when he left to the Sieur de Grigny the ruined tower of Billy, Grigny being in all probability a corner and the tower an excellent spot in which to ply his trade

The months prior to the composition of the poem had been unhappy ones for Villon Having been banished from Paris and having barely escaped hanging, he had fled southward, only to become further involved with the law The summer of 1461 he spent as a prisoner, sentenced by Thibault d'Aussigny, Bishop of Orléans, to a dungeon in the castle at Meung sur Loire, a dungeon below the level of the moat, into which the prisoner was lowered in a basket The diet was bread and water, and additional water was supplied in the form of the dreaded "Question"—a distressing circumstance for a poet who did not care for water as a beverage at the best of times Release had come unexpectedly when the new king, Louis XI, passed that way and prisoners, in accordance with custom, were freed Thus the eminently unattractive Spider King won a fervent admirer

him up to posterity as the example of the merciless prelate who can himself expect no mercy Having thus disposed of the bishop, Villon next passes in review before us a strange collection of figures pickpockets, thieves, corners harlots, and murderers whom he had known in the Parisian underworld, for it is fairly certain that the poet belonged to a well organized and widely spread gang of criminals Much in the poem is purely conventional the complaints against fortune, the figure of Death, who brings high and low to the same end, even the "Ballad of Dead Ladies" is on the well worn theme of Time sweeping away all beauty But interspersed are the vignettes of Parisian lowlife and of Villon himself living on the earnings of Fat Margot, 'within this brothel where we keep our state'

The popularity of Villon's poetry is evidenced by thirty four editions before 1542 During the neo-classic seventeenth and eighteenth centuries he was almost forgotten, to be resurrected as part of the medieval revival during the nineteenth century His appeal to such diverse characters as Swinburne and Stevenson is understandable, for the nostalgie de la boue is a common phenomenon among members of a highly conventionalized society These men, moreover, could live vicariously and in safety the life that Villon had lived in grim reality Further, he provided a different view of the Middle Ages, his was not the world of The Divine Comedy or of the Arthurian romances, it was the world of the desperately poor and criminal classes and of the taverns and brothels that they frequented, and the prisons It is the great realistic work of the late Middle Ages

But Villon posed a difficult problem for the Victorian translators The passage of four hundred years had wrought a great change in what might or might not be said in poetry His frank obscenity grveled them, even Swinburne, in his rendering of the "Regretz de la belle Heaulmiere," took refuge behind six lines of asterisks. One might translate the charming "Ballad of Dead Ladies" or the touching "Ballad to the Virgin" that he wrote for his mother, but in many English editions the "Ballade de la grosse Margot" was omitted or discreetly altered. This attitude is to be regretted for, as Stevenson remarked, in this ballade Villon outdid Zola in naturalism four hundred years before Nana was written, the poem gives us an unforgettable picture of a man who has touched the bottom of degradation and who knows that the cause of his abasement lies only within himself. "Filth we love and filth follows us." It is this very frankness that explains much of Villon's charm. While he made the conventional gesture of railing at Fortune, who creates some men rich and some poor, he clearly recognized where the real blame should fall. For whether one gains money by honest or by dishonest means, where does it go?

To taverns and to harlots all!

And as for his future, he had a shuddering foreboding that he would be one of those Whose neck, in the bight of a rope of three Must prove how heavy my buttocks be

Among the Victorians, there was considerable sentimentalizing over Villon that might have astonished that "povre petit escollier." Of Swinburne's typically hyperbolic statement

A harlot was thy nurse, a God thy sire

the second phrase would surely have puzzled him. The first Villon would have understood very well.

Mary Johnston's fame in the early decades of the twentieth century was established by a long series of historical romances, most of them with Virginia backgrounds. The Great Valley is representative of a type of fiction which, though it has attracted scant critical attention, has enjoyed a long popularity among American readers.

The Story

John Selkirk and his family, including a spinster sister of Mrs. Selkirk, were bound for Virginia with a number of other immigrants in the small ship Prudence. Mr. Selkirk, a Presbyterian minister somewhat too liberal for his congregation at Thistlebrae Kirk, in Scotland, had decided to establish a new kirk in the Shenando or Great Valley of Virginia Arriving in Williamsburg, where his oldest son Andrew was already living, he was introduced to Colonel Matthew Burke, who was developing a large tract of land in the valley and seeking settlers for it John and Andrew Selkirk together purchased four hundred acres and prepared to set out for the valley John had asked Colonel Burke how the Indians felt about having their lands occupied by white men but had been assured that there would be no trouble, since the lands had been obtained through treaties and since many Indians had moved farther west to find better hunting grounds

Stephen Trabue, a friendly driver and guide, was to accompany the Selkirk family on part of the journey to the valley As they traveled, he explained to them many of the conditions and details of daily living which they might expect in their new homes Even Nancy Milliken, who had just become Mrs Andrew Selkirk, would find life in the valley very different from that in Williamsburg, her former home

Seven years later John Selkirk had a congregation of two hundred in his Mt Olivet Church, and Andrew had three hundred acres three indentured youths to help him farm them, a grist mill, and ambitious plans for increasing his holdings and obtaining more helpers, including Negro slaves John did not favor slavery, but Andrew saw nothing wrong with it as long as he treated his slaves humanely

A few of John's Calvinist church members objected to the joyousness in his sermons Liking fire and brimstone threats from the pulpit, they complained that their minister did not believe in infant damnation and was even scornful of those who thought that certain evil people were capable of practicing witchcraft

Shortly after Colonel Burke died during a visit to the home of his son Conan, who had married Elizabeth Selkirk and settled in Burke's Tract, both Conan and John Selkirk decided to move a day's journey west into Burke's Land an un developed tract which the colonel had also planned to fill with new settlers There John established Mount Promise Church and Conan looked forward to the growth of a thriving new community in what had been the wilderness Some excitement was caused by a visit from a young surveyor, Mr Washington, who reported that the French were expanding their colonization along the Ohio River and were moving eastward into Virginia lands Also, the French had stirred up the Indians, especially the Shawnees, so that they had become a menace to the English and Scots living in the western Virginia settlements

To the grief of her family, Jean Selkirk died after a brief illness The Selkirks were disturbed by reports of sporadic Indian massacres and revenge killings by whites Yet when Andrew Selkirk warned Conan to move back to Burke's Tract, Conan refused, believing that if proper precautions were taken there was no need to fear the Indians Not long afterward John Selkirk was tricked into following what he thought was a lost lamb into the woods where he was shot by an Indian

The increasing frequency of Indian attacks soon caused many settlers to flee south into North Carolina, and those who remained stayed on permanent guard No new people moved into such areas as Burke's Land, and a guerrilla war against the marauding Indians was kept up by the Virginians many of whose Scottish and Irish forebears had fought in much the same way to protect their Old World homes from English invaders

In a surprise attack on Conan's home stead a small group of Shawnees triumphed, murdering men women, and children, scalping their victims, and taking captive Elizabeth and two of her children, Eileen and young Andrew, Old Mother Dick, who had come with the family from their former home in Burke's Tract, and two of the Burke servants As the Indians and their captives moved westward, one brave, annoyed by young

Andrew's screaming, tore him from Elizabeth's grasp and threw him over a cliff into Last Leap River

For some time the five remaining captives lived with the Indians in a village near the Ohio River. Elizabeth, who had been taken as a squaw by Long Thunder, bore him a son, but she was biding the time when she might escape with Mother Dick and Eileen, who was still too young to be claimed by some other brave as his squaw. Elizabeth finally managed to slip away from camp with her daughter and the frail but undaunted old woman. Left behind was the half Indian baby whom a young Indian woman had promised to care for if anything happened to Elizabeth. Regretfully left with the Indians were also the Negro, Ajax, and the white servant, Barb, who might someday manage to return to Virginia.

The long, painful journey and the struggle against exhaustion and starvation were too much for Mother Dick, who died on the way. Elizabeth and Eileen, continuing their journey eastward into the rugged mountains, were constantly on guard against roving Indian bands and diligently seeking food from stream or forest to allay their hunger. At last they reached Last Leap River into which the baby Andrew had been thrown so long ago. Elizabeth, peering through bushes toward the river, saw a canoe heading down it, going westward. It was paddled, not by Indians as she at first feared, but by her brother Robin, the guide Stephen Trabue, and her husband Conan Burke. After the joyous reunion, Conan explained that though Elizabeth had seen him attacked by some of the raiders and apparently killed, he had actually been rescued by neighbors after having been gravely wounded. His slowly healing wounds and the continuation of the war against the Indians and the French had prevented his and Robin's pushing toward the Ohio to rescue, if possible, the Shawnees' captives. Finally peace had come—in America, though not yet in Europe between England and France—and the word had spread to all wandering bands that now it was safe to travel in Indian territory. As soon as possible he had set out with Robin and Stephen to search for his loved ones. As the happy group sat about a fire to eat a breakfast which was like a banquet to Elizabeth and Eileen, the famished girl clung to the belief she had had a short time before, when she awakened from a deep sleep to find her mother and her father standing above her. To her the reunion seemed miraculously wonderful.

Critique

Green Grow the Lilacs, upon which the phenomenally successful musical play Oklahoma was based, represents American folk drama at its best. The simple plot is like an expansion of the story in some mountain ballad, and the many ballads and folk songs which are introduced into the play greatly enhance its alternately romantic, suspenseful, rowdy, and sad scenes.

The Story

Curly McClain, a tall, curly haired young cowboy, called at the home of Laurey Williams and Aunt Eller Murphy to ask if Laurey would go with him to a play party at Old Man Peck's. Laurey, pretending indifference and even scorn for Curly, turned down the invitation and went back to her bedroom, reappearing later to say that she was going to the party but that Jeeter Fry, her hired man, was taking her. At first angry, Curly sat down at the small organ in the living room and played and sang the old song "Green Grow the Lilacs," which tells of a rejected lover. Then, quickly recovered from Laurey's rebuff, he asked Aunt Eller to go to the party with him in his hired fringe top surrey. He left, saying he would pay a little call at the smokehouse where Jeeter lived.

In Laurey's bedroom, a little later, Aunt Eller announced that she was going to the party with Curly. Laurey showed no great interest. Instead, musing on how much she loved her place, she confided her fear that Jeeter might some time burn it down. This fear of him was what made her accept his attentions and go to parties with him. Aunt Eller belittled her fears.

Ado Annie Carnes arrived with a peddler, from whom Laurey bought for Ado Annie a pair of garters and some liquid powder to hide her freckles. They were startled when they heard a shot from the direction of the smokehouse, and then another.

Meanwhile, before and during a card game in the gloom and dirt of the smoke house, Curly had learned that Jeeter's mind was obsessed by two things: lurid crime which he liked to read about, and sex, which dominated his thinking and his talk much of the time. As they played cards, Jeeter's two pistols lay on the table. Curly's persistent needling of him about his dirty, dark thoughts and his filthy personal habits so angered Jeeter that he suddenly picked up one pistol and fired at random, splintering the opposite wall. Curly picked up the other pistol and fired neatly through a knothole. Aunt Eller, Laurey, Ado Annie, and the peddler, hurrying in to learn what the shooting was about, were relieved to learn that no harm had been done. After the women left, the peddler remained to bring forth his wares of special interest to men. He praised the efficiency of a long bladed knife for Jeeter. Curly considered the possible advantage of buying a pair of brass knuckles—just in case.

At Old Man Peck's the party was already in progress when Aunt Eller arrived with Curly, followed a little later by Laurey, Ado Annie, and Jeeter, who complained to Laurey because she had invited Ado Annie to go with them. Keeping Laurey from entering the house, he asked why she tried so hard to keep from being alone with him. When tormented by desire, he caught Laurey, she slapped him hard, then told him that he was no longer her hired hand and that he was to leave her place forever. He slunk away with a dark look. Laurey asked Ado Annie, who had come back to complain about her tight garters, to send Curly out.

When Laurey was finally able to tell Curly her fear of Jeeter, he promised to get her a new hired hand, suddenly asked her to marry him, and as quickly found himself accepted. Jokingly, he asked if she would give him, a penniless cowboy, a new saddle blanket for a wedding present.

When the party crowd came out on the porch, they joked about the two love birds Jeeter, a bottle in his hand, looked broodingly at Laurey and Curly, started to drink a mocking toast to them, and then hurled the bottle across the yard where it crashed. The crowd, keeping Curly and Jeeter apart, began to sing "Skip to My Lou."

One evening, a month later, Laurey and Curly stole quietly across a hayfield toward the Williams house. They were whispering that they had given the crowd the slip after going to town and getting married. They headed for the house, followed, unknown to them, by a group of men bent on shivareeing the new couple. Their rude jokes were interrupted when Curly, angry and with his shirt ripped, was dragged from the house by several men. Laurey in her nightgown, frightened and ashamed, followed, surrounded by a wide circle of other men. To the accompaniment of bawdy taunts, Curly and Laurey were made to climb the ladder of a tall haystack, then the ladder was thrown down.

Suddenly, amid the obscene jesting, there was the cry of "Fire!" and Jeeter came up with a flaming torch. As he sprang to light the stack, Curly leaped down and knocked the torch from his hand. The fire was quickly doused, but the drunken Jeeter, his knife out, attacked Curly. In the struggle Jeeter tripped, fell on his knife, and lay still. Cord Elam suggested that Curly go and explain the fight to the law.

A few nights later Aunt Eller and Ado Annie sat in the Williams living room wondering when Curly would be let out of the Claremore jail. Laurey, coming from her room looking pale and much older, spoke of her fears for Curly, the shock of hearing the bawdy things the men had said at the shivaree, and the troubles that life brings people. Aunt Eller, citing many troubles, explained that one simply had to have the strength to endure such things. The lesson sank in, and Laurey apologized for being such a baby.

The dog Shep began barking outside, then suddenly stopped. A moment later Curly came in, he had broken out of jail the night before his trial in order to see Laurey. His pursuers would be after him in a little while, he said, but he had to know that she would wait for him, whatever might happen at the trial. When they let him free he would forget herding cows and learn to farm Laurey's beautiful acres.

Old Man Peck and several other deputies arrived to return Curly to jail, but Aunt Eller refused to let them have him before morning. When the others showed sympathy for Curly and Laurey, who had still not had their wedding night, Peck agreed, promising to return bright and early in the morning. Not too early, said Aunt Eller. From the bedroom came Curly's voice singing "Green Grow the Lilacs."

Critique

Gottfried Keller's Der grüne Heinrich (Green Henry), one of the great German Bildungsromane (educational novels), is frequently compared to Goethe's Wilhelm Meister. Its autobiographical content is unmistakable: the book is an almost authentic description of Keller's life in Switzerland, his struggles in Munich and his disillusioned return home. The first version of the novel, which appeared in 1854-1855, ends with Heinrich's death. After Keller became a respected county official in his native country, the second, and standard, version of Der grüne Heinrich appeared. This version, reflecting the author's new found security, ends on a fatalistic but not destructive note. Keller, as enthusiastic about description of nature as were his romantic contemporary writers, loved his native surroundings; however, he added strong realism to his stories, which was quite shocking to his romantically inclined audience. The value of the novel is increased by a dry sense of humor, which fills the basically tragic book with contrasts. Strong dependence of the plot on native elements may be responsible for the absence of an English translation.

The Story

Heinrich Lee lost his father in early childhood. Thereafter, with great love and a boundless faith in her son's future, Frau Lee devoted her life to his happiness. Methodically she used her small inherited fortune for his education. A rich supply of green cloth, left by the father, was continuously used for Heinrich's clothing, and he was nicknamed "Grüne Heinrich" (Green Henry).

After fifteen year old Heinrich had been dismissed from school for his part in a student prank, he visited relatives in the country and fell in love with his cousin Anna, a beautiful but frail girl. In the same village he met Judith, a well-to-do widow, who loved Heinrich. Although she knew about his love for Anna, she assured him that there was enough room for both in Heinrich's heart. Judith did not intend to leave their relationship on a platonic basis only. Thus Heinrich was drawn between his deep love for the frail Anna and the strange attraction of the sensual Judith.

Because it was impossible for Heinrich to complete his course of studies, his mother agreed to help him fulfill his dream of becoming a painter. All friends of Frau Lee opposed this idea; it was unthinkable that a child of a respected citizen should undertake such an insecure and uncertain career. In spite of these objections Frau Lee arranged Heinrich's apprenticeship in an etcher's studio. Thereafter, when he visited the village in which Anna and Judith lived, he enjoyed being called a painter.

Anna, after a time spent in a school in Switzerland, became ill and died. Heinrich guarded her body during the night before her funeral.

Before long Heinrich exhausted the knowledge he could gain in the etcher's studio. His luck changed when he met a professional painter named Roemer. From the start Roemer showed great interest in Heinrich's work and agreed to be his tutor for a reasonable fee. As usual, Frau Lee was willing to help her son and again she was in opposition to the townspeople. Herr Roemer was regarded as completely unreliable, and his talk about connections with members of the aristocracy made him unpopular among the liberal-minded citizens. Also, Roemer's financial situation seemed not to be as favorable as he tried to have it appear. Proof came when Heinrich, wanting to discontinue his lessons, was approached by Roemer for a loan. Heinrich received more lessons in return for money regarded as a loan.

One day Roemer sold a painting. He decided to use the money for a trip to Paris because life in the town had become unbearable for him. Frau Lee wrote a polite note in regard to the loan and Heinrich tried to appeal to Roemer's aristocratic code of honor in order to get the money. Surprisingly, Roemer paid without hesitation. Weeks later Heinrich received a letter, revealing that Roemer was dying in an insane asylum in Paris, the payment to Heinrich had left him without a single franc after his arrival there. Heinrich felt guilty because he believed that he had destroyed Roemer's only chance for a new life. To talk to somebody about his moral guilt he went to Judith. She declared bluntly that Heinrich had murdered Roemer and that he would be forced to live with his crime. Heinrich told Judith that he could not meet her any more, since he wanted to remain faithful to Anna. Disappointed, Judith decided to emigrate to America, taking Heinrich's diary with her.

Heinrich decided to go to Munich. Once more Frau Lee had difficulty persuading the trustees of Heinrich's inheritance to release the rest of the money for his study in Munich, and pessimistic predictions were made about Frau Lee's folly.

In Munich Heinrich met Ericson, a painter with a realistic attitude toward his art. Attracted to young and idealistic Heinrich, he introduced the young man to a respected Dutch painter, Lys, who saw promise in Heinrich's drawings. Ericson and Lys gave Heinrich the contact he desired with the artistic world. Ericson married a wealthy widow and left Munich. Once Lys' irresponsible behavior toward a girl irked Heinrich and a heated discussion followed. The Dutch painter was also an avowed atheist. Though Heinrich never attended church services he defended his "God exists" theory so strongly that Lys felt insulted and challenged him to a duel. The duel was never fought, however, for Lys left Munich.

Having lost his most valuable connections with artistic circles, Heinrich decided to attend lectures at the university. Living a carefree and cheerful student life, he soon exhausted his credit. Realization of his financial situation caused him to resume painting. When he approached a well known painter for help, the artist looked at his work and suggested that he show his paintings in a gallery. There Heinrich noticed that his work was placed in an obscure corner but a canvas by the other painter, based on one of his own landscapes, hung in a prominent place. Heinrich realized that any other attempt to exhibit his works would stamp him as a plagiarist.

Discouraged, he tried without success to sell his work to small dealers. For days he did not eat, each night he had apocalyptic nightmares. Money from Frau Lee brought temporary relief. After paying his debts, Heinrich had little left and he tried to sell the drawings which he had made before leaving home. A second hand dealer, Schmalhoefer, took a few of them. When Heinrich returned to the dealer, he was told that his drawings had been sold, and Schmalhoefer asked for more. Later Schmalhoefer offered him work as a flagpole painter, and he accepted, working steadily from morning to night. After this work came to an end he was able to pay all his debts, with some money left over to make a trip home.

On the way he accidentally found shelter at the estate of Count W. berg. To his surprise, he learned that the count was the unknown patron who had bought his drawings. Delighted when he learned the identity of his guest, the count offered Heinrich a chance to paint undisturbed. Soon Heinrich forgot his intention to return to his mother. Also, Count W. berg had an adopted daughter, Dorothea, with whom Heinrich had fallen deeply in love. It was impossible for him to declare his love openly, however, because he felt that to do so would abuse the count's hospitality

Having found a sponsor in Count W berg, Heinrich successfully exhibited a painting in Munich His old friend Ericson, after reading an account of the exhibit, wrote asking to buy the painting, regardless of price While in Munich, Heinrich experienced another great surprise when he was informed that Schmalhoefer had died leaving him a large amount of money The dealer had been impressed by an idealistic painter who was nevertheless ready to paint flag poles from morning to night The sale of the painting, Schmalhoefer's bequest, and additional payments by the count for the drawings Schmalhoefer had sold to him made Heinrich a fairly rich man But in spite of his good fortunes Heinrich was still not ready to declare his love to Dorothea Heinrich, who had not written to his mother for many months, decided at last to complete his journey home When he arrived, he found his mother dying

The neighbors informed him that a short time before the police, trying to contact him in connection with Schmalhoefer's bequest, had asked Frau Lee to appear at police headquarters to give information as to her son's whereabouts Because the police did not reveal the reason for their questions, his mother had believed rumors that a criminal investigation was the cause for the inquiries her fears and Heinrich's silence had broken her spirit After some time Heinrich was able to regain the confidence of the townspeople and was elected a county official Then a letter from the count informed him that Dorothea uncertain of his love, had married another Peace came into his life when Judith returned from America to be near him A realistic woman, she convinced Heinrich that marriage would not be advisable but she promised to be with him whenever he needed her After twenty years Judith died and he recovered his diary which he used to write the story of his life

Within the complex structure of a large Air Force base in wartime, James Gould Cozzens has evoked a world in miniature in which many of the major conflicts of life are discussed. In a flat but cogent style the author delineates the problems that attach to power relationships, to authority and suppression. Indirectly the book is a profound indictment of the self-willed agitator and nonconformist; directly it is a striking revelation of the way various types rise to and deal with the crises of life.

The Story

The huge and sprawling Air Force base at Ocanara, Florida, was almost a world in itself. At its head was Major General "Bus" Beal, a hero in the Pacific theater in the early days of the war and still, at forty-one, an energetic and skillful flyer. To keep the operation of the base running smoothly, the general relied heavily on his Air Inspector, Colonel Norman Ross, who brought to his military duties the same resourcefulness that had characterized his career as a judge in peacetime. And Judge Ross needed all his acumen to do the job.

Landing his AT-7 one night at the Ocanara Airstrip, the general came close to colliding with a B-17. The B-17, piloted by Lieutenant Willis, one of the Negro fliers recently assigned to Ocanara, had violated the right-of-way. Lieutenant Colonel Benny Carricker, General Beal's co-pilot, struck and hospitalized Lieutenant Willis and in return was confined to quarters by General Beal. The incident, while small, triggered a complex of problems that, in the next two days, threatened to destroy the normal operations of the base. On the following day several of the Negro fliers, incensed by Lieutenant Willis' accident and further outraged at the fact that a separate service club had been set up for them, attempted to enter the white officers' recreation building. This action came close to starting a riot. To complicate Colonel Ross's difficulties further, tension had developed between the Air Force base and some leading citizens of the town. Alone of General Beal's staff, Colonel Ross felt the hazards of the situation. For the others—in particular for Colonel Mowbray and his assistant, Chief Warrant Officer Botwinick—the difficulties seemed ephemeral and routine. Even General Beal was of little aid to Colonel Ross, for he was brooding unhappily over the arrest of Colonel Carricker and was further troubled by the recent suicide of an old friend.

Among the members of the Air Force base itself other forces were working to enlarge and compound the difficulties. For Lieutenant Edsell, the hospitalization of the Negro pilot was the springboard for agitation, and he helped arrange for a visit of Lieutenant Willis' father to the base hospital. Only a few of the base personnel understood the difficulties Colonel Ross faced and the skill with which he operated. Those who did like Captain Nathaniel Hicks, were too concerned with their own problems to be of much assistance.

On the day Mr. Willis was to visit his son, the Ocanara Base was host to another unexpected visitor, Brigadier General Nichols, the personal representative of the Commanding General of the Air Force. To the embarrassment of all concerned, General Nichols' purpose in coming to Ocanara was to award Lieutenant Willis a medal for bravery.

Whatever Colonel Ross may have dreaded from the visit, he was relieved to find General Nichols a not unsympathetic man. For the general had trained himself into a stoical and tolerant frame of mind. He understood the situation at a glance, and at the awarding of the medal at the hospital he conducted himself so well that Mr. Willis himself was charmed.

On the following day the base prepared for a birthday celebration. In honor of General Beal's forty-first year, Colonel Mowbray had organized a military parade which was to include not only marching men and WACS, but planes flying in formation and parachute drops. General Nichols shared the reviewing stand with General Beal and his staff. In the nearby field, near a lake, Captain Hicks and his friend from the WAC detachment, Lieutenant Turck, were posted as observers.

Soon the parade began, and from their observation post Captain Hicks and Lieutenant Turck saw hundreds of parachutists begin the slow descent into a simulated conflict. Then tragedy struck. A group of parachutists, having ill timed their leap, dropped into the lake instead of hitting the field. In horror Captain Hicks saw them struggle briefly in the water and then sink.

When knowledge of the disaster reached General Beal's office there was a moment of furious commotion. Charges and countercharges were flung about with abandon. To Colonel Ross it seemed that fate had ordained nothing but problems for him and for Ocanara. But it was now that General Beal shook himself out of his gloom and took command, directing rescue operations with precision and skill and revealing at the same time that throughout the hectic few days that had passed he had not been unaware of the conflicts going on.

That night Colonel Ross accompanied General Nichols to the plane that was to return him to Washington. Reviewing the difficulties of the past three days, the colonel saw that General Nichols was right: one could only do one's best and, for the rest, trust the situation to right itself.

In his fiction Gunnar Gunnarsson provides novels of traditional form and nobility, made particularly fascinating by their Icelandic setting. The atmosphere of the ancient sagas pervades his books, putting his characters into association with the past while making the present none the less convincing. The drama of the novels is essentially moral, and the ethical dilemmas into which the characters fall are neither gross nor abnormal. Gunnarsson is adept at recreating the Icelandic character and the Icelandic atmosphere, the human beings about whom he writes move with dignity and passion across barren, stony, but none the less attractive northern plains. One is reminded of Thomas Hardy's dark novels in which the brooding moors take on the pessimism and the courage of people challenged by fate.

Although Gunnarsson retains a tragic view of life, regarding human beings as helpless before forces more powerful than themselves, he never loses sight of the alleviating influences of love, humor, and tradition Generation succeeds generation in his novels, and although individuals fall, families persevere, so that Icelandic traditions are strengthened and, in turn, strengthen those who share them The History of the Family at Borg—in the original Af Borgslaegtens Historie—is a four part novel of this enduring type

Guest the One Eyed, abridged in English translation, is the story of the family at Borg, of a father and his two sons, and of the illegitimate child of one of his sons The Borg farm, portrayed as a refuge for anyone who needed help, is the home of Ørlygur the Rich, an energetic and compassionate Icelandic farmer sometimes spoken of as "the King" because of the vast number of servants he retains and the hundreds of cattle and horses and sheep he owns Ørlygur hopes that one of his sons, either Ormarr or Ketill, will become the master of Borg, but Ormarr is interested in playing the violin and Ketill decides to become a priest The issue is resolved when Ormarr, after throwing away an opportunity to become a world famous concert violinist and after achieving a remarkable financial success as a shipping magnate, returns to Borg in search of a new challenge

Gunnarsson quickly creates extremes of character in Ormarr and Ketill Ormarr is sensitive, intelligent, perceptive, creative, and honest, while Ketill is devious, jealous, destructive, blasphemous, and dishonest As the parish priest, secretly eager to seize control of the property at Borg, Ketill preaches a series of sermons which slowly encourage the peasants to believe that a great sin has been committed by one of the community leaders Finally Ketill charges his own father with being the father of a child born to Runa, the daughter of a poor farmer, Pall à Seyru The charge is coupled with the suggestion that Ørlygur also persuaded Ormarr to marry Runa in order to hide his crime of passionate lust The depth of Ketill's depravity finally becomes evident to the citizens of the community when Ørlygur, with convincing simplicity and wrath, reveals that the priest who would condemn his own father is himself the father of Runa's child

The elements of melodrama are here, but the effect is that of tragedy To have been able to portray such extremes of character—for Ormarr sacrifices his own concerns to marry Runa, while Ketill sacrifices his own family to win power and wealth—without making the characters mere devices for the development of plot is evidence of Gunnarsson's skill as a novelist

The author's audacity, so successful as to become a sign of his eminence as a writer, leads him to create a complete reversal in the character of Ketill Ketill, the cold, scheming Icelandic Judas, becomes someone very much like Christ Repenting his sins, Ketill leaves Borg and, having rejected the idea of suicide, becomes a wanderer, dependent for his board and lodging on the Icelandic farmers to whom he brings simple, soul restoring messages of love and compassion He regards himself as a guest on earth, and "Guest" becomes his name He has lost his eye in saving a child from a burning farm hence, he is "Guest the one eyed"

There is no more difficult task in literature than the portrayal of a saintlike character Readers are ready to accept the fact of evil, and there is no act so base that one cannot readily believe man capable of it But extreme selflessness, Christ like love, is an ideal, hinted at in the scriptures, and hardly to be found in the community of men The novelist presuming to create a character who, having been in the depths of sin, becomes a lovable, living incarnation of virtue, is a writer confronting himself with the final challenge of his craft Gunnarsson took up that challenge, Guest the One Eyed is his victorious response

The novel has at once the character of a myth and the character of a modern saga When Ketill finally returns to Borg, known only as Guest the one eyed, he carries with him the memory of the curses that everyone has put on Ketill, whom all believe dead His reconciliation with his family—something almost beyond hope, even for a saint, since Ketill's lying charge from the pulpit had both killed his father and driven Ketill's wife mad—is partly the result of his having destroyed the old Ketill by his life as a wanderer, but it is also a result of the readiness of the Icelanders to forgive for the sake of the family, that union of strength which makes life in Iceland possible

the younger, Ketill's son, and Bagga, the beautiful illegitimate daughter of the woman of Bolli who like Ketill, had known the fire and ice of passion and repentance Gunnarsson's pessimism is concerned with man's lot on earth, with his struggle and his ultimate death, but it is not a discouraging pessimism that extends to the spirit of man Iceland may be stony, misty, barren and demanding but it is also a land of sunshine and changing moods like the characters about whom Gunnarsson writes

Critique

Guy of Warwick was penned by more of an anthologist than a poet Undoubtedly French in origin, this metrical romance is made up of episodes from earlier romances, epics, and sagas The story was frequently rewritten throughout the Middle Ages, later reprinted in many languages, immortalized in a play in 1620, and even adapted into a popular children's adventure story in the nineteenth century In order to learn of all of Guy of Warwick's adventures, the reader would need to consult the earlier French poems, the English epics, the Irish translations, innumerable exempla, and patches of many other heroic poems and related legends The best edition of the work is by the late scholar Julius Zupitza (1844-1895), who collated the very early Auchinleck manuscript (believed to have been written 1330-1340) with the most complete manuscript, now preserved in Caius College, Cambridge (c 1400)

The Story

It was love for a woman that prompted Guy to inaugurate his long series of remarkable exploits. Guy, son of the steward to Rohaud, Earl of Warwick, was a very popular and handsome young squire. As the earl's principal cupbearer, he was instructed, on one fateful occasion, to superintend the service of the ladies during dinner. Gazing on Felice la Belle, Rohaud's beautiful and talented daughter, he fell desperately in love with the fair maiden. When he first declared himself to her, he was rejected because of his lowly birth and lack of attainments. Later, however, when from love sickness he was close to death, Felice, following the advice of an angel, offered him some encouragement. If he became a knight and proved his valor, she would reward him with her hand in marriage.

After receiving knighthood, Sir Guy set out to prove his valor. Accompanied by his mentor, Herhaud of Ardem, he spent an entire year attending tournaments throughout Europe. Pitted against some of the most renowned knights of Christendom, Guy was indomitable, in every encounter he took the prize. His reputation now established, he returned to Warwick to claim his reward from Felice. This fair lady, however, had decided to raise her standards. After acknowledging his accomplishments, she notified him that he must become the foremost knight in the world before she would marry him.

True to the laws of chivalric love, Guy returned to Europe to satisfy the fancy of his mistress. Again visiting the tournaments, again he was, without exception, victorious. But misfortune awaited him in Italy. His high merit having excited their envy, seventeen knights, led by Otous, Duke of Pavia, laid an ambush for the English champion. Before Guy won the skirmish, two of his closest companions were dead, and his best friend, Herhaud, appeared to be slain. As Guy, himself grievously wounded, began his return journey to England, he was filled with remorse for having allowed the wishes of a haughty lady to lead him to this sad result, but in Burgundy, where he was performing his customary deeds of valor, his spirits were considerably improved by his discovery of Herhaud, alive and disguised as a palmer.

As the two friends continued their journey homeward, they learned that Segyn, Duke of Louvain, was being attacked by Reignier, the Emperor of Germany, who wrongfully claimed the duke's lands. Assembling a small army, Guy defeated two armies that were sent against Segyn. With a larger force, the emperor then encircled the city in which Guy, Segyn, and their followers were quartered. During this blockade Reignier, on a hunting trip, was surprised by Guy, who led the unarmed emperor into the city. There, in the true spirit of chivalry, a rapprochement was brought about between the ruler, Reignier, and his vassal, Segyn.

Soon after rendering these good services to Segyn, Guy found another occasion for the exercise of his talents. Learning that Ernis, Emperor of Greece, was besieged by the mighty forces of the Saracen Soudan, Guy levied an army of a thousand German knights and marched to Constantinople. Received with joy, he was promised for his efforts the hand of Princess Loret, the emperor's daughter. After repelling one Saracen attack, Guy took the offensive and left on the field fifteen acres covered with the corpses of his enemies. But his greatest threat came from one of his own knights, Morgadour, who had become enamored of Loret. Knowing that the Soudan had sworn to kill every Christian who should fall within his power, Morgadour duped Guy into entering the enemy camp and challenging the Saracen monarch to single combat. Ordered to be executed, the resourceful Guy cut off the Soudan's head, repelled his attackers, and made his escape.

The emperor, because of his great ad

miration for the English knight, hastened arrangements for the wedding of Guy and Loret. Guy, somehow having forgotten Felice, was agreeable to the plan, until, seeing the wedding ring, he was suddenly reminded of his first love. A true knight, he resolved to be faithful to Felice and to find some excuse for breaking his engagement to Loret. Another altercation with Morgadour ended with Guy's slaying of the treacherous German. Using the pretext that his continued presence in the court might lead to trouble between the Greeks and Germans, Guy took his leave.

Guy planned an immediate return to England, but he was destined to perform further deeds of knight errantry before being reunited with his beloved Felice. While traveling through Lorraine, he met an old friend, Sir Tirri, who was being persecuted by their mutual enemy, Duke Otous. The duke had abducted Tirri's fiancée. Guy wasted no time in rescuing the girl, but Otous did not give up easily. After attempting and failing to defeat Guy on the battlefield, he resorted to foul means and succeeded in capturing both Tirri and his fiancée. Guy, combining trickery with valor, killed the felon duke and freed the lovers.

Just one more incident delayed Guy's return to England. Unintentionally entering the game preserve of the King of Flanders, he was confronted by the king's son and found himself compelled to kill the dissentious prince. In an ensuing encounter with the wrathful father, Guy was forced to slaughter fourteen knights before he could make his escape. Arriving in his native country, Guy, in accordance with chivalric practice, repaired to the court of King Athelstan. He was honorably received, and almost immediately the king enlisted his services to kill a troublesome dragon. After a long and fierce battle, Guy in triumph carried the monster's head to the king.

Guy's homecoming was the less joyous upon his learning of the death of his parents, but this sorrow was compensated for by his immediate marriage to Felice. They were married only forty days barely time to conceive a son, when Guy's conscience, troubled over the mischiefs he had done for the love of a lady, forced him on a penitential pilgrimage. His bereaved wife placed on his finger a gold remembrance ring and sorrowfully watched him depart for the Holy Land.

So great a warrior, however, could not escape his reputation or his duty. He interrupted his devotions to kill an Ethiopian giant and to assist Tirri again, this time by slaying a false accuser.

When the pious warrior returned to England he found King Athelstan besieged by King Anlaf of Denmark. It had been agreed that the outcome of the war should be determined by single combat between Colbrand, a Danish giant, and an English champion. In a dream King Athelstan was advised to ask the help of the first pilgrim he met at the entrance of the palace, and the aging Guy of Warwick was that pilgrim. In this last and most famous of his fights Guy, shorn of his weapons, appeared certain of defeat. In his extremity he snatched up a convenient ax, fiercely assailed the giant, cut him to pieces, and thereby saved the English kingdom.

Guy paid one last visit to his own castle, where he discovered Felice engaged in acts of devotion and charity. Without having revealed his identity to her, he went off to the forests of Ardennes. When death was near, he dispatched the gold remembrance to his wife and begged her to supervise his burial. Arriving in time to receive his last breath, the faithful Felice survived him by only fifteen days. She was buried in the same grave as her warrior husband.

HARMONIUM

Author Wallace Stevens (1879-1955)

First published 1923

In the case of Wallace Stevens the proper understanding of his early poems as a new dimension of poetic reality was for the most part an exercise in hindsight. This is not the same thing as saying that at any time in his career he lacked the attention of serious criticism or a body of appreciative, well wishing readers, only that he was sometimes admired for the wrong reasons.

Harmonium was published in 1923, at a time when the French Symbolists—Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Verlaine, Rimbaud, Laforgue—were being assimilated as influences and models and the Imagist movement had not yet run its course. Because Stevens exhibited the tangential imagery, elisions and regard for symbolic order of the first group and the concentrated exactness of the second, most readers found little in his poetry to link it with the native tradition. Instead, they seized upon the exotic and ornate qualities of his verse as if these were its final effect rather than a means to an end. Stevens appeared to be, at first reading, a poet whose purity of vision and absolute integrity insulated him from the material concerns of his society. Eliot in England and Joyce in Paris occupied just such positions of isolation and authority. Closer home, the author of "Le Monocle de Mon Oncle," "The Comedian as the Letter C," and "Peter Quince at the Clavier" seemed to provide a similar image of the dedicated artist.

But Stevens, as it later developed, was neither a master of decor for decoration's sake—the literary dandy and Whistler in words, as some called him—nor the alienated poet such as the period demanded. An aesthetic moral writer of the highest order, he had already in Harmonium charted those areas of experience and precept which were to comprise the whole body of his work: the recreation of the physical world in bold and brilliant imagery, the relation of imagination to reality, the nature and function of art, the poet's place in modern society, problems of structure and style. Stevens was not a poet of growth but of clarification, and his later books merely ordered and refined his vision and techniques. Unlike most poets, who achieve only a temporary balance between temperament and environment, he created a total world for his imagination and his belief in the nourishing power of art. Perhaps the greatest service he provided was to show by example the possible in poetry if man is to find a source of imaginative faith in an age of disbelief or to establish once more a sustaining relationship with the world about him. Harmonium "makes a constant sacrament of praise" to poetry—the imaginative ordering of experience—as the supreme fiction.

The unmistakable signature of these poems is the richness of their diction, the use of words not common to English poetry, at least in these plain speaking times, a parade of brightly colored images and startling turns of phrase. Such words as fubbed, coquelicot, barque, phosphor, gobbet, fisci, clavier, pannicles, gran doles, rapey, carked, diaphanes, unburgherly, minuscule, ructive, shebang cantilene, pipping, curlicues and funest reveal the poet's delight in the unusual and the rare. But as R. P. Blackmur pointed out long ago, Stevens' poetic vocabulary was not chosen for affected elegance, coyness, or calculated obscurity. These words give an air of rightness and inevitability within the contexts that frame them, it is not the word itself but its relationship to other words in the poem that gives to Stevens' poetry its striking qualities of style. It is the same with his images: the strategic effectiveness of "barbaric glass," "poems of plums," "venereal soil," "golden quirks and Paphian caricatures," "rosy chocolate and gilt umbrellas," "oozing cantankerous gum," "women of primrose and purl," "the emperor of ice cream," in conveying a luxuriance of sense impressions. This diction of odd angles of vision and strange surfaces gives the impression of language revitalized as if it were the invention of the poet himself. It becomes a part of what Stevens once called "the essential gaudiness of poetry," and it is capable of a variety of effects, as the following examples show.

The mules that angels ride come slowly down
The blazing passes from beyond the sun
("Le Monocle de Mon Oncle")

or

Chieftain Iffucan of Azcan in caftan
Of tan with henna hackles, halt!
("Bantams in Pine Woods")

or

and not to think
Of any misery in the sound of the wind,
In the sound of the leaves,

Which is the sound of the land
Full of the same wind
That is blowing in the same bare place

For the listener, who listens in the snow
And, nothing himself, beholds
Nothing that is not there and the nothing that is

("The Snow Man")

Stevens' diction and imagery are not so much the verbalization of a mode of thought but in themselves a way of thinking. His poetry belongs to the order of solipsism, that philosophical theory which holds that the self is the only object of verifiable knowledge and that all things are re-created in the image of man in the act of perceiving the world. In his best poems this is the effect toward which Stevens' floating images tend, so that from the world of his verse one emerges with altered perspective. There is in it a different way of seeing, a rearrangement of the familiar pattern of experience by which poetry is no longer a way of looking at life but a form of life. Thus his images point to a passionate drive toward material comfort and rich living, as opposed to spiritual sterility in a world of waste and excess. In Harmonium the poles of his world become "our bawdiness unpurged by epitaph" and "the strict austerity of one vast, subjugating, final tone." He is aware of tradition corrupted and a world fallen into disorder, a realization of man dispossessed of unity between himself and his universe, of nature violated, of old faiths gone. Out of his knowledge he writes these lines on a Prufrock theme:

In the high west there burns a furious star

It is for fiery boys that star was set And for sweet-smelling virgins close to them

The measure of the intensity of love
Is measure also, of the verve of earth
For me, the firefly's quick, electric stroke

Ticks tediously the time of one more year

And you? Remember how the crickets came

Out of their mother grass, like little kiss,

In the pale nights, when your first imagery

Found inkings of your bond to all that dust

For a secular poet like Stevens, poetry was to become the "supreme fiction" and the imagination "the one reality in this imagined world," a way of imposing order on the chaos of experience. This is the theme of "Anecdote of the Jar," one of the simplest but most meaningful of the poems in Harmonium.

I placed a jar in Tennessee
 And round it was, upon a hill
 It made the slovenly wilderness
 Surround that hill

Here is the desire to impose order on the wildness of nature and, indirectly, of the world. It is not the image of the jar that is of first importance in the poem, but the act of placing the jar on such an eminence that it commands the landscape, so that

It took dominion everywhere
 The jar was gray and bare
 It did not give of bird or bush,
 Like nothing else in Tennessee

Stevens puts Keats' Grecian urn to other uses than those of contemplation or revelation

This "rage for order" is worked out in more elaborate detail in "The Comedian as the Letter C." A fable in six parts, the poem is Stevens' most ambitious work before "Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction" on the relation of imagination to reality and the poet's place and function in society. It is characteristic of his self-satire that he should picture the poet as a picaresque mountebank trying to reconcile imagination to actuality. In Part I, "The World without Imagination," Crispin the subjectivist sets sail upon the sea of life, to discover that the romantic imagination which has given him eminence within his own limited milieu is a world preoccupied with things and therefore lacking in imagination. Romanticism being equated with egotism, Crispin in the second section, "Concerning the Thunderstorms of Yucatan," decides that the only reality lies in the senses. His love for the exotic ends when he is brought to a realization of the overwhelming and destructive powers of nature. The third division, "Approaching Carolina," follows Crispin through a realm of the imagination, symbolized by moonlight that is the antithesis of the sun, which lights up reality. Turning from the moon as a mere reflection of reality, Crispin in Part IV, "The Idea of a Colony," enters a new phase of art based on the community and regional ties. Disillusioned, he turns in Part V, "A Nice Shady Home," to domesticity, and like Candide he digs in his own garden, he will become a philosopher. Part VI, "A Daughter with Curls," deals with the final wisdom Crispin found in his return to earth.

Crispin concocted doctrine from the rout
 The world a turnip once so readily plucked Sacked up and carried overseas, daubed out
 Of its ancient purple, pruned to the fertile main,
 And sown again by the stiffest realist,
 Came reproduced in purple, family font,
 The same insoluble lump

Art, Stevens implies, cannot be made this or that, or be pursued like a chimera, it exists, separate and complete, in its own substance and shape.

There are times when Stevens' search for some standard of ultimate reality and the forms that it may take in poetry leads him away from concrete particularities into the realm of abstract speculation. If he appears at times more concerned with meaning than with being, the reader may also recognize in his work the power of a contemplative writer who insists upon the need of discipline in life as in art. As a modern, he sees the gap between the potential and the actual, consequently he must try to uncover causes, to create a way of seeing that his readers may share.

Stevens himself achieves the supreme, fictive mood of contemplation and understanding in "Sunday Morning," his best poem and one of the great poems of the century. Here in the spectacle of a woman eating her late breakfast on a Sunday morning we have a picture of modern boredom and uncertainty. The woman sits in external sunlight but also in the moral darkness of an age that has lost faith in the spiritual nature of man. 'Why should she give her bounty to the dead?" The poet's answer is that happiness lies in the perception of nature, which in its recurrent changes and seasons creates an immortality in which man may share

We live in an old chaos of the sun,
Or old dependency of day and night,
Or island solitude unsponsored, free,
Of that wide water, inescapable Deer walk upon our mountains and the quail
Whistle about us their spontaneous
cries,

Sweet berries ripen in the wilderness
And in the isolation of the sky
At evening, casual flocks of pigeons make Ambiguous undulations as they sink Downward to darkness, on extended wings

Harmonium reveals a poet of moral and humane temper Stevens' poems, disciplined and perfectly articulated reflect a limited but significant picture of the modern sensibility

THE HARP-WEAVER AND OTHER POEMS

Type of work Poetry

Author Edna St Vincent Millay (1892 1950)

First published 1922

Ten years before she was awarded a Pulitzer prize for The Harp Weaver and Other Poems Edna St Vincent Millay's first and best known poem, "Renascence," appeared in The Lyric Year, an anthology of one hundred poems by as many poets The Vassar undergraduate, Vincent Millay, as her family and friends then called her, scored a signal victory in her contribution to the anthology, the freer form and the liberal spirit of her work standing out against the stilted Victorian verse and sentimentality found in most of the selections

"All I could see from where I stood," the first line of "Renascence," begins a poem as regular in meter, rhythm and rhyme as those by her romantic predecessors But the new hedonism and the sharp, almost brittle metaphors based on both land and seascapes create a quite different effect The pain of omniscience, the poet's burden, is the theme The imagery is dazzling in its exalted movement to a sensuous climax in which life is celebrated through all the senses

"Renascence" was a promise of things to come, for the personal lyric was Miss Millay's forte Her sonnets and her ballads, held in such beautiful balance in

The Harp Weaver, are always exact in craftsmanship, capturing at times the innocence of childhood and the sadness of lost ecstasy

The title poem, "The Ballad of The Harp Weaver" appearing at the end of the second section, brings into an almost medieval form saddened innocence and lyric tragedy Written mostly in the traditional four line ballad stanza with alternating rhymes, the poem varies subtly in meter and end stopping to include occasional stanzas with a fifth line and shifting rhyme schemes These last lines create the panic, the pain, and finally the exaltation of deep feeling The narrative tells in the first person the story of a young boy of the slums living with his widowed mother who can do nothing to make a living and has nothing to sell except 'a harp with a woman's head nobody will buy' In a fifth line, "she begins to cry" for the starving boy This was in the late fall, by the winter all the furniture had been burned and the boy can do no more than watch his school companions go by, for he has no clothes to wear He is disturbed by his mother's attempts to comfort him, to dandle him on her knee while "a rock rock rocking," and to sing

to him "in such a daft way" The counterpoint of the harp with a woman's head and "a wind with a wolf's head" suggests the lingering pain after the first panic The final exaltation, however, is remarkable A mystical event occurs the mother weaves clothes for the Christ child, just the size of her own boy, and perishes at the harp, "her hands in the harp strings frozen dead" This odd juxtaposition of the Madonna and the Magi themes with the dance of death demonstrates Miss Millay's versatility and expertness with language

Part V of the volume, "Sonnets from an Ungrafted Tree," creates its effect by quite opposite methods This sequence concerns a woman who prosaically watches her unloved husband die and then tries to pick up the empty pieces of her own unloving life He had befriended her in school, when she would have accepted anyone, by flashing a mirror in her eyes, after his death she has a flash of awareness that he had loved her deeply, though he was in no way remarkable in living or in loving Whatever heat was in this strange body which slept and ate beside her is now gone, the whole unclassified The impact of this fact makes of these 238 lines a taut though expressionistic drama in which the unreality of the death is emotionally heightened by the very real, familiar objects which express the widow's desolation

These macabre themes do not go unrehearsed in Miss Millay's book The opening lyric is the keynote to the first part, and "My Heart, Being Hungry" connects this volume with the earlier "Renascence" The lean heart feeds on "beauty where beauty never stood," and "sweet where no sweet lies," symbolized by the smell of rain on tansy She continues the theme of the bitter sweet, light-dark, the opposites of nature which make of the humblest experience something like pain, a pain of sensitive awareness of the tears of things Always, however, there is pure aesthetic pleasure gained from deep felt realizations, of

Burrs beneath a tree

even in deepest grief, she says in "The Wood Road" In spite of the world's negations, the positive things endure "The Goose Girl" summarizes this belief

Spring rides no horses down the hill,
But comes on foot a goose girl still
And all the loveliest things there be Come simply, so it seems to me
If ever I said, in grief or pride,
I tired of honest things, I lied,
And should be cursed forevermore
With love in laces, like a whore
And neighbors cold, and friends unsteady,
And Spring on horseback, like a lady!

In the second section Miss Millay divides her poems between the goose girl and the lady, the first poem, "Departure," reflecting both The adolescent girl, busy with her sewing, is pensive, even in despair over half felt longings

It's little I care what path I take,
And where it leads it's little I care
But out of this house, lest my heart break,
I must go, and off somewhere

She indulges in the pleasant emotion of self pity, of her dead body found in a ditch somewhere, an adolescent drama which is interrupted by her mother's friendly query, "Is something the matter, dear?" An old legend retold in "The Pond" presents a suicide who picked a lily before she drowned, a grasp even in death after the beautiful

The extremely short third section contains all these motifs and some strange new ones "Never May the Fruit Be Plucked" extends the imagery of "My Heart, Being Hungry" to suggest that "He that would eat of love must eat it where it hangs," and that nothing tangible can be taken away forever "The Concert" extends the internal monologue of the sewing girl, this time a new departure from rather than toward life and love "Hyacinth," however, is something new and wonderfully strange

I am in love with him to whom a hyacinth is dearer
 Then I shall ever be dear
 On nights when the field mice are abroad he cannot sleep
 He hears their narrow teeth at the bulbs of his hyacinths
 But the gnawing at my heart he does not hear

This gnawing at the heart is at least a real emotion, while in "Spring Song" a modern nothingness has replaced the reawakening season. The refrains suggest that modern life has driven out spring with its "Come, move on!" and "No park ing here!" The poem ends

Anyhow, it's nothing to me
 I can remember, and so can you (Though we'd better watch out for you know who When we sit around remembering Spring)
 We shall hardly notice in a year or two
 You can get accustomed to anything

Part IV, the most conventional, is made up of twenty-two unrelated sonnets

These are rather academic in theme and tone, containing as they do echoes of Elizabeth Barrett Browning and John Keats. The first and last illustrate this point, though there are many sonnets in between which point to Miss Millay's individuality. In the first she prophetically reveals the sadness of life after the loss of a beloved. In the last she celebrates the glimpse of sheer beauty that was Euclid's in the "blinding hour" when he had his vision

Of light anatomized Euclid alone Has looked on beauty bare. Fortunate they Who though once only and then but far away
 Have heard her massive sandal set on stone

The Harp Weaver presents a poet with vision unclouded by the didacticism which mars some of her later work, for these poems vibrate with an inner fervor that needs no relationship to the political or social scene

In one sense Heart of Darkness is a compelling adventure tale of a journey into the blackest heart of the Belgian Congo. The story presents attacks by the natives, descriptions of the jungle and the river, and characterizations of white men who, sometimes with ideals and sometimes simply for profit, invade the jungles to bring out ivory. But the journey into the heart of the Congo is also a symbolic journey into the blackness central to the heart and soul of man, a journey deep into primeval passion, superstition, and lust. Those who, like the district manager, undertake this journey simply to rob the natives of ivory, without any awareness of the importance of the central darkness, can survive. Similarly, Marlow, who is only an observer, never centrally involved, can survive to tell the tale. But those who, like Mr. Kurtz, are aware of the darkness, who hope with conscious intelligence and a humane concern for all mankind to bring light into the darkness, are doomed, are themselves swallowed up by the darkness and evil they had hoped to penetrate. Conrad manages to make his point, a realization of the evil at the center of human experience, without ever breaking the closely knit pattern of his narrative or losing the compelling atmospheric and psychological force of the tale. The wealth of natural symbols, the clear development of character, and the sheer fascination of the story make this a short story that has been frequently praised and frequently read ever since its publication in 1902. Heart of Darkness is, in both style and insight, a masterful short story.

The Story

A group of men were sitting on the deck of the cruising yawl, The Nellie, anchored one calm evening in the Thames estuary. One of the seamen, Marlow, began reflecting that the Thames area had been, at the time of the invading Romans, one of the dark and barbarous areas of the earth. Dwelling on this theme, he then began to tell a story of the blackest, most barbarous area of the earth that he had experienced.

Through his aunt's connections, Marlow had once secured a billet as commander of a river steamer for one of the trading companies with interests in the Belgian Congo. When he went to Belgium to learn more about the job, he found that few of the officials of the company expected him to return alive. In Brussels he also heard of the distinguished Mr. Kurtz, the powerful and intelligent man who was educating the natives and at the same time sending back record shipments of ivory.

The mysterious figure of Mr. Kurtz fascinated Marlow. In spite of the ominous hints that he gathered from various company officials, he became more and more curious about what awaited him in the Congo. During his journey, as he passed along the African coast, he reflected that the wilderness and the unknown seemed to seep right out to the sea. Many of the trading posts and stations the ship passed were dilapidated and looked barbaric. Finally, Marlow arrived at the seat of the government at the mouth of the river. Again, he heard of the great distinction and power of Mr. Kurtz who had, because of his plans to enlighten the natives and his success in gaining their confidence, an enormous reputation. Marlow also saw natives working in the hot sun until they collapsed and died. Marlow had to wait for ten impatient days at the government site because his work would not begin until he reached the district manager's station, two hundred miles up the river. At last the expedition left for the district station.

Marlow arrived at the district station to find that the river steamer had sunk a few days earlier. He met the district manager, a man whose only ability seemed to be the ability to survive. The district manager, unconcerned with the fate of the natives, was interested only in getting out of the country; he felt that Mr. Kurtz's new methods were ruining the whole district. The district manager reported also that he had not heard from Kurtz for quite some time, but had received disquieting rumors about his being ill.

Although he was handicapped by a lack of rivets, Marlow spent months supervising repairs to the antiquated river steamer. He also overheard a conversation which revealed that the district manager was Kurtz's implacable enemy, who hoped that the climate would do away with his rival.

The steamer was finally ready for use, and Marlow, along with the district manager, sailed to visit Kurtz at the inner station far up the river. The journey was difficult and perilous, the water was shallow, there were frequent fogs. Just as they arrived within a few miles of Kurtz's station, natives attacked the vessel with spears and arrows. Marlow's helmsman, a faithful native, was killed by a long spear when he leaned from his window to fire at the savages. Marlow finally blew the steamboat whistle and the sound frightened the natives away. The district manager was sure that Kurtz had lost control over the blacks. When they docked, they met an enthusiastic Russian traveler who told them that Kurtz was gravely ill.

While the district manager visited Kurtz, the Russian told Marlow that the sick man had become corrupted by the very natives he had hoped to enlighten. He still had power over the natives, but instead of his changing them, they had debased him into an atavistic savage. Kurtz attended native rituals, had killed frequently in order to get ivory and had hung heads as decorations outside his hut. Later Marlow met Kurtz and found that the man had, indeed, been corrupted by the evil at the center of experience. Marlow learned, from the Russian, that Kurtz had ordered the natives to attack the steamer, thinking that, if they did so, the white men would run away and leave Kurtz to die among his fellow savages in the wilderness. Talking to Marlow, Kurtz showed his awareness of how uncivilized he had become, how his plans to educate the natives had been reversed. He gave Marlow a packet of letters for his fiancée in Belgium and the manuscript of an article, written sometime earlier, in which he urged efforts to educate the natives.

The district manager and Marlow took Kurtz, now on a stretcher, to the river steamer to take him back home. The district manager contended that the area was now ruined for collecting ivory. Kurtz, full of despair and the realization that devouring evil was at the heart of everything, died while the steamer was temporarily stopped for repairs.

Marlow returned to civilization and about a year later, went to Belgium to see Kurtz's fiancée. She still thought of Kurtz as the splendid and powerful man who had gone to Africa with a mission and she still believed in his goodness and power. When she asked Marlow what Kurtz's last words had been, Marlow lied and told her that Kurtz had asked for her at the end. In reality, Kurtz, who had seen all experience, had in his final words testified to the horror of it all. This horror was not something, Marlow felt, that civilized ladies could, or should, understand.

Heartbreak House has always held an equivocal place in the Shavian canon. Its admirers—and they are many—bracket it with Shaw's best, beside such acknowledged masterpieces as Man and Superman and Saint Joan. Severer critics see it as an unsuccessful attempt to create a mood of Chekhovian melancholy and fatalism within a framework of political allegory and social satire, a mixture of comedy, tragedy, dialectic, and prophecy that never quite coalesces into unity of theme or structure.

Shaw himself was as much to blame as anyone for some of the misconceptions regarding his play. Always ready, even eager, to instruct his public, in this instance he maintained an attitude of reticence toward his work and appeared hesitant to let it pass out of his hands. Although part of it had been written as early as 1913 and it was in its final form by 1916, the play was not published until 1919. Its first performance was the Theatre Guild production on November 12, 1920. Even then Shaw apparently preferred to let his work speak for itself without mediation on his part, for when asked on one occasion to interpret some of his lines he answered brusquely that he was merely the author and therefore could not be expected to know. Perhaps he was still smarting from the abuse he had received following the publication of his pamphlet, Commonsense about the War (1915), read by the jingo minded wartime public as a piece of pacifist propaganda. Under the circumstances his reluctance to present his most sweeping indictment of a society unable or unwilling to bring its moral judgments and political convictions into balance with its potential of destruction becomes understandable. War, Shaw seems to say, is no longer the trade of the professional soldier or the recreation of the feudal elite, all of mankind is now involved in the common catastrophe and society must perish if it cannot realize its possibilities for good as opposed to its capacities for destruction.

In a way that criticism has not yet fully appraised Heartbreak House presents almost the whole range of Shaw's thought, for few of his plays are more representative or inclusive in the themes and motifs touched upon if not explored: war, love, society, education, religion, politics, and science. The only element lacking is the Shavian principle of the Life Force. As a drama of ideas it looks back to the earlier plays and anticipates Saint Joan and The Apple Cart. As comment on upper class life it continues and climaxes the themes Shaw presents in Getting Married and Misalliance. Shaw himself is present in his various manifestations: the recorder of that verbal interplay which in the Shavian drama often takes the place of conflict; the playwright of ideas, the master of comedy, the maker of epigrams, the teacher, the critic, the philosopher, the parodist, the fabulist, and the poet.

A clue to the meaning of the play is provided in the subtitle: "A Fantasia in the Russian manner on English themes." Following the production of several of Chekhov's plays in London, Shaw had been studying the work of the Russian dramatist and had seen in at least three, The Cherry Orchard, The Sea Gull, and Uncle Vanya, exempla of the theme he himself had in mind: the disintegration of a society from within and its final collapse in the face of forces it had previously ignored or denied. Allowances must be made, however, for Shaw's habit of exaggeration where precedents or sources are concerned. Shaw may have begun his play with a similarity of tone in mind—the atmosphere, he said, was the initial impulse—but he ends with effects quite different from those we find in Chekhov. Partly the difference is one of temperament, the great Russian power of enclosing the poetry of all experience in the single instance, partly the fact that the haunted landscapes of Chekhov's world have little in common with those aspects of British middle and upper class life that Shaw observed so shrewdly. Shaw's people exist only in the light of his ethical and political values. Chekhov's, entirely within the world of their own moral and spiritual blight. The sound of the axe echoing through the twilight at the end of The Cherry Orchard is more portentous and meaningful than the bombs which rain fire and death from the sky at the close of Heartbreak House.

The essential differences between these two plays are not altogether to Shaw's disadvantage, for Heartbreak House, although it lacks the larger expressiveness of Chekhov's theater, exhibits all the intellectual vigor and wild poetry, the clash of ideas and personalities of disquisitory drama at its best. A thesis play, it is admitted as such in Shaw's preface, where he states that Heartbreak House is more than a title: it is the Europe—or England—of culture and leisure in the period before World War I. As the alternative to Heartbreak House he sees only Horseback Hall, peopled by the gentry who have made sport a cult. In either case, true leadership is lacking in this world of cross purposes, futile desires, and idle talk. These people have courage of a sort, but they are able to do little more than clench their fists in gestures of defiance as the bombs drop from the sky.

The setting of the play is the Sussex home, built like a ship, of Captain Shotover, an eighty-eight year old eccentric and retired sea captain credited by hearsay with selling his soul to the devil in Zanzibar and marriage to a black witch in the West Indies. Cranky, realistic, fantastically wise, he drinks three bottles of rum a day, strives to attain the seventh degree of concentration, and spends his time tinkering with death-dealing inventions. To Ellie Dunn, a young singer arriving as the guest of Mrs. Hesione Hushabye, the captain's daughter, the atmosphere of the house seems as puzzling and unpredictable as its owner. No one bothers to greet visitors; members of the family are treated like strangers; strangers are welcomed like old friends. An elderly servant calls everyone ducky. When Lady Ariadne Utterwood returns for a visit after twenty-three years in the colonies with her husband, Sir Hastings Utterwood, an empire builder, neither her father nor her sister recognizes her. The captain persists in confusing Mazzini Dunn, Ellie's father with a rascally expatriate who had robbed him many years before. Arriving unexpectedly, Boss Mangan, the millionaire industrialist whom Ellie is to marry, is put to work in the captain's garden.

From this opening scene of innocent, seemingly irresponsible comedy the play proceeds to more serious business, and by the end of the first act the characters have assumed their allegorical identities. Lady Ariadne is Empire, the prestige of foreign rule. Hesione Hushabye is Domesticity, the power of woman's love and authority at home. Hector, her husband, is Heroism, a man capable of brave deeds but so tamed by feminine influence that his only escape is through romantic daydreams and Munchausen-like tales of derring-do. Mazzini Dunn is the nineteenth-century Liberal: a believer in progress but too sentimental to be an intellectual force; consequently he has become the tool of Boss Mangan, a figure of capitalist Exploitation. Randall Utterwood, Lady Ariadne's brother-in-law, is Pride, a Foreign Office official symbolically in love with his sister in law and filled with snobbish regard for caste. Looming over these figures is old Captain Shotover, the embodiment of Old England and its genius, no longer the captain of the great Ship of State but the half-cracked, drunken skipper of a house built like a ship, suggesting his own and his country's maritime history. Captain Shotover is the triumph of the play. In spite of his allegorical significance he is always superbly himself, a figure larger than life and yet lifelike, reliving his past and creating his future in terms of his own fantastic logic. These people come together in twos and threes to speak in their own and in their allegorical characters. Childlike resentments, old grievances, brooding frustrations, impossible dreams, and unexpected disillusionments break through their masks in the heavily charged atmosphere that the play generates, but all this sound and fury leads nowhere. Heartbreak House is idleness dramatized, impotence of mind and will translated into speech and gesture.

In one sense Heartbreak House might be described as the story of Ellie Dunn's education. In the first act, although she is engaged to Boss Mangan, she fancies herself in love with Marcus Darnley, a middle-aged man of romantic background, whom she has been meeting secretly. The discovery that Marcus is Hector Hushabye opens her eyes to reality and deceit. Disillusioned with romantic love, she decides to accept Boss Mangan and his money, only to discover that his millions are nonexistent, that he is simply the capitalist who uses the money other men entrust to him. In the end she decides that she will become the white bride of old Captain Shotover because his seventh degree of concentration holds a promise of peace and happiness beyond desire or despair. This time it is the captain who disillusiones her; his seventh degree of concentration is rum. Ellie's education is now complete, and she is free to be as practical or aspiring as she desires.

Suddenly, while these people sit on the terrace and talk out their predicament, planes begin to drone overhead. Boss Mangan and a burglar—who had turned out to be Billy Dunn, the ex-convict now reduced to petty thievery and sniveling confession—take refuge in a gravel pit, a bomb falls and kills them. The others survive. Heartbreak House still stands.

All criticism of Heartbreak House reduces itself to a single issue. Can comedy, even brilliantly presented, sustain a theme of tragic significance? Shaw, as he declared, was only the writer. The reader or the playgoer has been left to answer this question for himself.

Critique

There is some disagreement among Greek scholars as to whether Helen is a serious play or, because of its anticlimactic happy ending, merely Euripidean self-parody. The line of action seems to build toward tragedy, from which it is averted at the last moment by a deus ex machina in the form of the Dioscuri. The story is taken from a tradition established in the sixth century B.C. by the Greek poet Stesichorus, who believed that Paris had carried off to Troy only a phantom Helen fashioned by Hera, while the real Helen was taken to Egypt by Hermes. H. D. F.

Kitto praises this play, asserting that it has appropriate rhetoric throughout, consistent characterization, and a faultless plot. Perhaps the only exceptions to its comic tone are the first ode of the chorus and the murder of the fifty Egyptian galley men.

The Story

Helen prayed before the tomb of Proteus, late King of Egypt, who had protected her from any dishonor while her husband Menelaus was leading the Greek hosts at the siege of Troy in the mistaken belief that the phantom Helen carried off by Paris, son of the Trojan king, was really his wife. She recalled that when the three goddesses Hera, Cypris (Aphrodite), and Athena had appeared before Paris and asked him to judge which was the fairest, Cypris had promised him Helen as a prize for choosing her. But Hera, enraged at being rejected, had caused a phantom Helen to be carried off to Troy. In Egypt the real Helen prayed for the safety of her husband and for protection against Theoclymenus, son of Proteus, who was determined to marry her.

She was accosted by Teucer, an exile from Achaea, who brought tidings of the end of the war, the ruin of the Greeks seeking their homelands, the disappearance of Menelaus and Helen, and the suicide of Leda, Helen's mother, who had killed herself because she could not endure her daughter's shame. The anguished Helen then warned Teucer not to seek out the prophetess Theonoe, as he intended but to flee, for any Greek found in Egypt would be killed. The chorus grieved for Helen, who lamented her miserable fate and threatened suicide. In despair, she took the advice of the chorus and herself sought out Theonoe.

Menelaus, shipwrecked and in rags, appeared before the palace seeking aid only to be berated and sent off by a portress who warned him that since Theoclymenus had Helen in his possession no Greeks were welcome in Egypt. Menelaus was astounded, for he had just left his Helen secure in a nearby cave. As he stood there in bewilderment, Helen emerged from her conference with Theonoe and confronted amazed Menelaus. Helen could not convince him that she was indeed his wife until a messenger brought word to Menelaus that the Helen he had left at the cave was gone, having soared away into the air. The long separated lovers then embraced, rejoiced, and told each other of all the adventures that had befallen them. But their immense happiness was darkened by realization of their present plight. Theoclymenus was determined to make Helen his own, and Menelaus was in danger of his life. The two resolved that if they could not concoct some scheme for escape, they would commit suicide rather than be separated again.

Theonoe, aware of the presence of Menelaus, appeared to inform him that although Hera had relented and was now willing to let him return to Sparta with Helen, Cypris was unwilling to have it revealed that she had bribed Paris to be chosen as the most beautiful of the goddesses. Therefore Theonoe, serving Cypris, felt obliged to expose Menelaus to her brother. Terrified, Helen fell to her knees in tears and supplication, and the enraged Menelaus threatened that they would die rather than submit. Theonoe relented, promised to keep silent, and urged them to devise some way of escape.

After rejecting several of Menelaus' desperate proposals, Helen hit upon a scheme which she put into operation as soon as Theoclymenus returned from a hunting trip. Appearing before him in mourning clothes and addressing him for the first time as her lord, Helen told him in a pitiful voice that a shipwrecked Greek warrior had just brought her word that Menelaus had drowned at sea. She was now ready, she added, to marry Theoclymenus if he would permit proper burial honors, in the Greek fashion, for her husband. Theoclymenus consented and turned to Menelaus, who was posing as the bearer of sad tidings, for instructions concerning Greek burial rites for a king drowned at sea. He was told that there must be a blood offering, an empty bier decked and carried in procession, bronze arms, a supply of the fruits of the earth, all to be taken out to sea in a large ship from which the widow must commit everything to the waters. The gullible Theoclymenus, anxious to foster piety in the woman who was about to become his wife, agreed to everything, and preparations were made for both a funeral and a royal wedding.

Later, a breathless messenger came running to Theoclymenus with the news that Helen had escaped with Menelaus. He described in detail how the Greek stranger commanding the ship had permitted a large number of shipwrecked sailors to come aboard and how, when the time came to slay the bull, the stranger, instead of uttering a funeral prayer, had called upon Poseidon to allow him and his wife to sail safely to Sparta. The aroused Egyptians sought to turn back the ship, but they were slaughtered by the Greek warriors whom Menelaus had smuggled aboard. Theoclymenus, enraged, realized that pursuit was hopeless but resolved to avenge himself on his treacherous sister, Theonoe. A servant from the palace tried in vain to convince him that he ought to accept what was obviously an honorable treachery. Both the servant and Theonoe were saved from death when the Dioscuri, the twin sons of Zeus, appeared from the sky to restrain his rage and explain to him that Heaven had ordained the return of Helen and Menelaus to their homeland. Theoclymenus was chastened, and the chorus chanted familiar lines about the irony of Fate.

MADNESS

CHORUS OF THE OLD MEN OF THEBES

Critique

Herakles Mad, one of the most puzzling of Euripides' plays, begins with a stereotyped situation and weak characters, builds to a powerful climax in the mad scene of Herakles, and is followed by one of the most moving tragic reconciliations in all drama. Some critics see in Euripides' treatment of Herakles the suggestion that he has been deluded all his life and has never really performed his twelve great labors; others have suggested that the madness comes not from Hera, but from Fate. In either case he reaches heroic and tragic stature when, after murdering his wife and children in a fit of madness, he refuses to commit suicide and decides to face whatever life has in store for him.

The Story

Amphitryon, who together with Megara and the sons of Herakles had sought sanctuary at the altar of Zeus, lamented the fact that while Herakles was in Hades performing one of his twelve labors Lycus had murdered Creon and seized the throne of Thebes. The murderer was bent upon consolidating his position by killing Megara and her children, whose only hope lay in the protection of Zeus until Herakles returned. Lycus came to taunt them with the charge that Herakles was a coward who used a bow and killed only animals and that, in any case, he was dead in Hades and would never return.

Amphitryon, retorting that Lycus was the coward in seeking to kill an old man, a woman, and innocent children, begged that they at least be allowed to go into exile. Enraged, Lycus sent his servants to fetch oak logs in order to burn the relatives of Herakles alive in their sanctuary. The chorus of old men vowed that they would fight with their staves against such a horrible sacrilege.

Megara, however, counseled that it was folly to attempt to escape destiny. Herakles could not emerge from Hades to save them and since they must die they ought to do so without being burnt alive. Amphitryon then begged that he and Megara be killed first so that they would not have to witness the massacre of innocent children, and Megara pleaded for the privilege of dressing the children in the proper funeral robes. Lycus haughtily granted both wishes. As the group left the sanctuary for the palace, Amphitryon cursed Zeus for being a senseless and unjust god. In their absence the chorus chanted an ode on the glories of Herakles and the sadness of old age.

Returning with the children, Megara woefully recounted the marvelous plans she had made for her sons. Meanwhile, Amphitryon fervently prayed to Zeus for deliverance. Suddenly they were startled by the spectacle of Herakles approaching. The great joy of their meeting was darkened by the fearful tale Megara had to tell her husband. Furious with rage, Herakles swore that he would behead Lycus and throw his carcass to the dogs but Amphitryon cautioned him to curb his reckless haste, for Lycus had many allies in his treachery. Though deeply moved by the fear that made his children cling to his robes, Herakles agreed to plan his revenge carefully and led his family into the palace. The chorus of ancients once again lamented their old age and praised Zeus for sending deliverance in the person of Herakles, his son.

Lycus, upon encountering Amphitryon emerging from the palace, commanded that he bring Megara with him, but Amphitryon refused on the ground that such a deed would make him an accomplice in her murder. Intent on dispatching Megara, Lycus angrily stormed into the palace. Amphitryon followed to watch Herakles' revenge. As the chorus hailed the death cries of Lycus, the specters of Madness and Iris appeared from above. Iris, the female messenger of the gods, pronounced that although destiny had preserved Herakles until he had finished his twelve labors, Hera had decreed that he must now suffer lest the powers of man seem greater than those of the gods. She commanded that Madness force Herakles to murder his own wife and children. Reluctantly, Madness sent out her power and described the horrible seizures of Herakles within the palace. When the two specters disappeared a messenger emerged from the palace to tell how Herakles in a frenzy of madness had murdered his wife and children, believing them to be the kin of his former master, Eurystheus. Amphitryon was saved only by the intervention of Athena, who put the possessed hero to sleep and had him tied to a pillar.

The doors of the palace were opened, revealing Herakles now awake and puzzled by the awful scene about him. Informed of what he had done, Herakles crouched in shame and wailed in anguish.

Theseus, who had been rescued from Hades by Herakles, arrived with an army for the purpose of aiding his old friend against Lycus. Crushed by the weight of his dishonor, Herakles could not face his friend, and he announced his intention to commit suicide. His compassionate friend Theseus pleaded with him to live and accept his fate; he offered to take Herakles to Athens where, after being purified of his pollution, he would be given great estates and high status. Though he preferred to grow into a stone oblivious of his horrid deed, Herakles reluctantly agreed to harden his heart against death and rose with profound gratitude to accept his friend's offer. As he left, he urged the sorrowful Amphitryon to bury the dead and to follow him to Athens, where they would live out the remainder of their lives in peace.

Critique

This realistic novel of social and military life in nineteenth century Russia well deserves its renown because of its colorful descriptions and sharp delineations of character. Structurally the novel is made up of five related short stories, with Narrator One (presumably Lermontov), Maksim Maksimich, and Pechorin in the principal roles. The narrative is skillfully constructed. In "Bela," "I" meets Maksim Maksimich, who refers to Pechorin. Maksim Maksimich, Narrator Two, tells the story bearing his name as its title. Pechorin actually appears, but briefly. In "Taman," "Princess Mary," and "The Fatalist," the narrator is Pechorin himself; the stories being told as extracts from his journal. A second notable feature of the writing, in addition to the involuted time sequence, is Lermontov's habit of letting the reader eavesdrop in order to avoid detailed narrative. This device makes for compact writing, since it is a convenient means of letting the principal characters learn of events necessary to an understanding of the story. Lermontov felt compelled to preface his novel with the explanation that A Hero of Our Time was not a biography of any Russian person, living or dead. Rather, Pechorin was intended to be a collective personification of all the evil and vice then found in Russian life. In creating his portrait of Pechorin, the "superfluous" man, Lermontov pointed to the development of the Russian psychological novel.

The Story

The Narrator met Maksim Maksimich while on a return trip from Tiflis, the capital of Georgia, to Russia. The season was autumn, and in that mountainous region snow was already falling. The two men continued their acquaintance at the inn where they were forced to take refuge for the night. When the Narrator asked Maksim Maksimich about his experiences, the old man told of his friendship with Grigory Pechorin, a Serbian who had come from Russia about five years before to join a company of cavalry in the Caucasus.

To relieve their boredom on that frontier post, the soldiers played with Azamat, the young son of a neighboring prince. As a result of this friendship, the prince invited Maksimich and Pechorin to a family wedding. At that celebration Pechorin and Kazbich, a bandit, met and were equally attracted to Bela, the beautiful young daughter of the prince Azamat, observing this development, later offered to give Bela to Kazbich in exchange for the bandit's horse. Kazbich laughed at the boy and rode away.

Four days later Azamat was back at the camp and visiting with Pechorin, who promised to get Kazbich's horse for the boy in exchange for Bela. The promise was fulfilled. Kazbich, insane with rage at his loss, tried to kill Azamat but failed.

Suspecting that Azamat's father had been responsible for the theft, Kazbich killed the prince and stole his horse in revenge for the loss of his own animal.

Weeks passed, and Pechorin became less attentive to Bela. One day she and Maksimich were walking on the ramparts when Bela recognized Kazbich on her father's horse some distance away. An orderly's attempt to shoot Kazbich failed and he escaped. But Kazbich had recognized Bela, too, and a few days later, when the men were away from camp, he kidnapped her. As Pechorin and Maksimich were returning to camp, they saw Kazbich riding away with Bela. They pursued the bandit, but as they were about to overtake him, he thrust his knife into Bela and escaped.

Although Pechorin seemed to be deeply grieved by Bela's death, when Maksimich tried to comfort him he laughed.

The Narrator, having parted from Maksim Maksimich, stopped at an inn in Vladikavkaz, where he found life very dull until, on the second day, Maksimich arrived unexpectedly. Before long there was a great stir and bustle in preparation for the arrival of an important guest. The travelers learned that Pechorin was the guest expected. Happy in the thought of seeing Pechorin again, Maksimich instructed a servant to carry his regards to his former friend, who had stopped off to visit a Colonel N——. Day turned to night but still Pechorin did not come to return the greeting. Dawn found Maksimich waiting at the gate again. When Pechorin finally arrived, he prevented Maksimich's intended embrace by coolly offering his hand.

Maksimich had anticipated warmth and a long visit, but Pechorin left immediately. Neither Maksimich's plea of friendship nor his mention of Bela served to detain Pechorin.

Thus Maksimich bade his friend goodbye. To the Narrator's attempt to cheer him the old man remarked only that Pechorin had become too rich and spoiled to bother about old friendships. In fact, he would throw away Pechorin's journal that he had been saving. The Narrator was so pleased to be the recipient of the papers that he grabbed them from the old man and rushed to his room. Next day the Narrator left, saddened by the reflection that when one has reached Maksim Maksimich's age, scorn from a friend causes the heart to harden and the soul to fold up. Later, having learned that Pechorin was dead, the Narrator published three tales from the dead man's journal, as Pechorin himself had written them.

Taman, a little town on the seacoast of Russia, was the worst town Pechorin had ever visited For want of better lodging, he was forced to stay in a little cottage that he immediately disliked Greeted at the door by a blind, crippled boy, Pechorin admitted to a prejudice against people with physical infirmities To him, a crippled body held a crippled soul His displeasure was enhanced when he learned there was no icon in the house—an evil sign

In the night Pechorin followed the blind boy to the shore, where he witnessed a rendezvous that he did not comprehend The next morning a young woman appeared at the cottage and he accused her of having been on the beach the night before Later, the girl returned, kissed him, and arranged to meet him on the shore

Pechorin kept the appointment As he and the girl sailed in a boat, she tried to drown him, he, in turn, thrust her into the swirling, foaming water and brought the boat to shore He was stunned to find that she had swum to safety and was talking to a man on shore Pechorin learned that the man was a smuggler The blind boy appeared, carrying a heavy sack which he delivered to the girl and the smuggler They sailed away in a boat

Pechorin returned to the cottage to find that his sword and all his valuables had been stolen

Quite a different atmosphere pervaded Pechorin's next experience, as described in his journal While stopping at Elizabeth Spring, a fashionable spa, he met Grushnitski, a wounded cadet whom he had known previously The two men were attracted to Princess Mary, and Pechorin was angry—though he pretended indifference—because Princess Mary paid more attention to Grushnitski, a mere cadet, than she did to him, an officer The men agreed that young society girls looked upon soldiers as savages and upon any young man with contempt

Pechorin opened a campaign of revenge against Princess Mary On one occasion he distracted an audience of her admirers, again, he outbid her for a Persian rug and then disparaged her sense of values by putting it on his horse Her fury at these and other offenses gave Pechorin the satisfaction of revenge for her favor of Grushnitski

Grushnitski wanted Pechorin to be friendly toward Princess Mary so that the cadet might be accepted socially through his association with her Having seen Vera, a former lover of his but now married, Pechorin decided to court Princess Mary as a cover for his illicit affair with Vera

As excitement mounted in anticipation of the ball, the major social event of the season, antagonism between Pechorin and Grushnitski and Pechorin and Princess Mary grew Grushnitski's excitement and pride were the result of his promotion, Princess Mary would see him in his officer's uniform

Succumbing to Pechorin's attitude of indifference, Princess Mary consented to dance the mazurka with him Pechorin did not wish to hurt Grushnitski by divulging this news when the new officer later boasted that he intended to have this honored dance with the princess

When, after the ball, it was rumored that Princess Mary would marry Pechorin, he fled to Kislovodsk to be with Vera Grushnitski followed, but not to continue his association with Pechorin, whom he deliberately ignored A short time later the princess and her party arrived in Kislovodsk to continue their holiday

Still furious at the affront which had caused his disappointment at the ball, Grushnitski enlisted the aid of some dragoons in an attempt to catch Pechorin in Princess Mary's room When this effort failed, Grushnitski challenged Pechorin to a duel According to the plan Pechorin would have an empty pistol Having discovered the plot, Pechorin compelled Grushnitski to stand at the edge of an abyss during the duel Then he coolly shot the young officer, who tumbled into the depths below Pechorin labeled Grushnitski's death an accident to marry the girl. He refused and wrote in his journal that a soft, protected life was not his way.

On another occasion, Pechorin and a group of Cossack officers were ridiculing the fatalism of the Moslems. Lieutenant Vulich, a renowned gambler, offered to prove his own faith in fatalism. While Pechorin and the Cossacks watched, aghast, Vulich aimed a pistol at his head and pulled the trigger. No shot was fired. He then aimed at a cap hanging on the wall; it was blown to pieces. Pechorin was amazed that the pistol had misfired on Vulich's first attempt. He was sure he had seen what he called the look of death on Vulich's face. Within a half hour after that demonstration Vulich was killed in the street by a drunken Cossack.

The next day Pechorin decided to test his own fate by offering to take the mad dened Cossack alive, after an entire detachment had not dared the feat. He was successful.

Later, when Pechorin discussed the incident with Maksim Maksimich, the old man observed that Circassian pistols of the type which Vulich used for his demonstration were not really reliable. He added philosophically that it was unfortunate Vulich had stopped a drunk at night. Such a fate must have been assigned to Vulich at his birth.

Sara Monday, the life-loving, self-indulgent, and generous cook who is the heroine of the first volume of Cary's first trilogy, tells her story sometimes ingenuously, sometimes shrewdly. Both these characteristics are portrayed with Cary's compassion and irony. The vivid, complete characters in Cary's novels are presented through their reactions to difficulties. Thus his books are crowded with incident, but without formal plot. Cary's prose style is simple, his language rich and colorful. Although critics have found it impossible to interpret his philosophy with any certainty, he is considered one of the foremost British novelists of his period.

The Story

In prison Sara Monday realized that she was indeed guilty as charged. She hoped that other women would read her story and examine their characters before their thoughtless behavior brought them also to ruin.

Sara's first position was that of cook in a medium-sized country house. Matthew Monday, the middle-aged son of Sara's employer, had been dominated all his life by his mother and sister. Then this rather pathetic man fell in love with Sara, who discouraged his attentions, both because she feared he would cause her to lose her job and because she found him slightly ridiculous. Nevertheless and somewhat to her surprise, when he proposed marriage she accepted him.

At a church bazaar a few months after her marriage, Sara met Mr. Hickson, a millionaire art collector with whom Matt had been associated in business. With Hickson's help she was able to emancipate Matt from the influence of his family. Partly because she was grateful to him for his help, Sara did not rebuke Hickson when he tried to flirt with her. After Sara had been forced to spend a night at Hickson's country house—his car had broken down—Matt supported her against the gossip and disapproval the episode occasioned.

Sara's life with Matt was, except for the death of their son in infancy, a happy one during the first years of their marriage. They had four daughters, and Sara's time was filled with parties, clothes, her nursery, and work on local committees.

Hickson brought an artist to stay with the Mondays. He was Gulley Jimson, who was to compete for the commission to paint a mural in the new town hall. Gulley settled in quickly and soon his forbearing wife, Nina, joined him. After a quarrel over a portrait of Matt, the Jimsons left. Soon afterward Sara visited them in their rooms at the local inn.

In jealousy, Hickson told Matt of these visits and the infuriated man accused his wife of infidelity. After his outburst Matt was very repentant and blamed himself for neglecting Sara. However, the incident caused him to lose all the confidence his marriage had given him.

Sara did not see Gulley for years after this incident. One day during Matt's last illness he reappeared. He looked shabby and he wanted money to buy paints and clothes. After telling her that Nina was dead, he asked Sara to marry him after Matt's death. Although she was shocked, Sara did not stop seeing Gulley immediately. While Matt was dying Gulley repeatedly proposed to her. Finally she sent him away.

After Matt's death and the sale of her house, Sara went to Rose Cottage, where Gulley was staying with Miss Slaughter, one of the sponsors for the church hall in which he was painting a mural. Miss Slaughter encouraged Sara to marry Gulley, and at the end of a week they were engaged. Just before they were to be married, however, Gulley unhappily confessed that he had a wife and had never formally been married to Nina. Sara was furious and also bitterly disappointed, but in the end she agreed to live with Gulley and to say they were married. After an intensely happy honeymoon, they lived with Miss Slaughter while Gulley worked on his mural. During that time Sara tried to persuade Gulley to accept portrait commissions. Infuriated by her interference, Gulley struck Sara, who then left him. She was glad to return, however, when Miss Slaughter came for her.

Although Gulley's completed mural was considered unacceptable, he refused to change it. When Sara wanted him to repair some damage done to the painting, Gulley knocked her unconscious and left. Having exhausted her funds, Sara paid their outstanding bills with bad checks, and she was duly summonsed by the police.

After Sara had thus lost her good character, the only position she could obtain was that of cook at Tolbrook Manor. The owner, Mr. Wilcher, had a bad reputation for molesting young girls and seducing his women servants. Sara, however, pitied him and liked him. Eventually Mr. Wilcher moved Sara to his town house, having persuaded her to serve as housekeeper for both residences. She was glad of the extra money because Gulley had been writing to her asking for loans.

For many years Mr. Wilcher had had a mistress whom he visited every Saturday

During one of many long talks by Sara's fireside, he told her that he was tired of visiting this woman. When he asked Sara to take her place, she was at first slightly hesitant and confused, but in the end she agreed. The arrangement worked well enough for several years.

Mr. Wilcher became worried with family and financial affairs and Sara helped him by economizing on household expenses. At the same time she managed to falsify her accounts and send extra money to Gulley. One day a policeman came to the house with two girls who had complained of Mr. Wilcher's behavior. Mr. Wilcher disappeared, but Sara discovered him hours later hiding behind the chimney stacks on the roof. The family was appalled by this incident. After the impending summons had been quashed, Mr. Wilcher became even more unstable. Haunted by his past misdeemeanors, he decided to confess them to the police. He also asked Sara to marry him after he had served his sentence. At this time he had an attack of sciatica. While he was confined to his bed, Blanche Wilcher, his niece by marriage and a woman who had always been suspicious of Sara, dismissed her.

Returning from a visit to her daughter, Sara forgot that she was no longer employed and entered Mr. Wilcher's street

There she found that the house had burned down in the night. Mr. Wilcher had been taken to the house of his niece's sister, Clarissa. After he had recovered from shock he continued to see Sara and ignored Blanche. He rushed Sara to a registry office to give notice of their forthcoming marriage and then took a small new house for them to live in.

Sara had recently encountered Gulley once more and had gradually assumed financial responsibility for his new household. She maintained these payments for a time by selling to an antique shop oddments that Mr. Wilcher had told her to throw away.

The evening before her marriage, Sara arrived at the new house to find Blanche and a detective examining her possessions. She did not protest. After they had found receipts from the antique dealer and grocers' bills for supplies for Gulley, she was taken to the police station. She received an eighteen-month prison sentence and did not see Mr. Wilcher again.

A newspaper offered her money for her story. With this she paid Gulley's expenses and planned to become a cook again after she had served her sentence. She knew she could thus regain her "character," and she believed she could keep it now that she had discovered her weaknesses.

HESPERIDES

Author Robert Herrick (1591-1633)

First published 1633

As thou deserv'st be proud then gladly let
The Muse give thee the Delphick Coronet

This brief epigram, one of hundreds Robert Herrick included in his collection of twelve hundred poems, best describes the pride with which he presented his Hesperides and the recognition he received after more than one hundred years of neglect. His subtitle, The Works both Human and Divine of Robert Herrick

Esq., indicates the inclusion in one volume of his Hesperides and his Noble Numbers, a group of ecclesiastical poems, prayers, hymns, and apothegms dated 1647. This collection, together with fifteen or so poems discovered by nineteenth-century scholars and about twice the number recovered recently in manuscript, comprise the literary remains of one of the finest lyricists in the English language.

The arrangement of the poems in Hesperides (the name itself is a conceit based on the legend of nymphs who guarded with a fierce serpent the golden apples of the goddess Hera) is whimsical. Most of the lyrics were composed in Devonshire, where Herrick was vicar of Dean Prior from 1629 until the Puritan vicar's removal caused his removal from his parish in 1647. Restored to his living in 1662, he lived until his death in the West Country which had inspired his pagan-spirited, rustic verse.

The great Herrick scholar, L. C. Martin, has discovered a chronology, from the collation of many manuscripts, which indicates the four general periods in which these poems were composed, carefully rewritten, and then painstakingly published. From his apprenticeship to his goldsmith uncle at least one poem remains, "A Country Life," which may have been one of the reasons why the youthful poet was allowed to terminate his service and go to Cambridge. Though Herrick's activities during his university period are remembered chiefly for the letters he wrote asking his uncle for money, he also composed a variety of commendatory poems and memory verses. One, the longest poem he wrote, is addressed to a fellow student who was ordained in 1623.

The second period, and perhaps the most important, was from 1617 to 1627, when he became the favorite of the "sons" of Ben Jonson. Herrick's famous poem, "His Fare-well to Sack," epitomizes these formative years of good talk, wide reading, witty writing, and good fellowship. In this poem too are the names of the poets who most influenced him—Anacreon, Horace, and by implication, Catullus and Theocritus. The well-known "The Argument of His Book" echoes the pastoral strain in the poet's declaration of his literary interests:

I sing of Brooks of Blossomes, Birds, and Bowers
Of April, May, of June, and July Flowers

I sing of May poles, Hock carts, Was sails, Wakes
Of Bride grooms, Brides and of their Bridall cakes
I write of Youth, of Love, and have Accesses
By these to sing of cleanly Wantonnesse
I sing of Dewes, of Raines, and piece by piece
Of Balme, of Oyle, of Spice, and Amber Greece
I write of Times trans shifting, and I write
How Roses first came Red, and Lillies
White
I write of Groves, of Twilights, and I sing
The Court of Mab and of the Faerie
King
I write of Hell, I sing (and ever shall)
Of Heaven, and hope to have it after all

The Dean Prior vicar's hope for heaven seems to be based on his "cleanly Wantonnesse," even if one considers his many mistresses—Corinna, stately Julia, smooth Anthea, and sweet Electra—as imaginary, the idealized woman of poetic tradition. Herrick's philosophy is Anacreontic, the carpe diem attitude of the Cavalier poets. The best known example from his work, in his own time as well as ours, is "To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time," which begins "Gather ye Rose buds while ye may."

That Herrick was a man of his time may be ascertained by a glance at the rich variety of his poetic subjects. Set in the form of the madrigal, "Corinna's going a Maying," catches all the excitement of the festival in the most intricate of singing forms. A ballad in the manner of Campion is "Cherrie ripe," one which deserves to be better known.

Cherrie Ripe, Ripe, Ripe I cry
Full and faire ones, come and buy
If so be you ask me where They doe grow? I answer, There,
Where my Julia's lips doe smile
There's the Land, or Cherry Ile
Whose Plantations fully show
All the yeere, where Cherries grow

In the manner of Shakespeare he composed "The mad Maids Song" with the same "Good Morrows" and the strewing of flowers for the tomb, but in this instance the lament is for a lover killed by a bee sting. In the style of Marlowe and then Raleigh, Herrick continues the Elizabethan shepherd maiden debate in "To Phillis to love, and live with him"

Thou shalt have Ribbands, Roses Rings
Gloves Garters, Stockings, Shooes, and Strings
Of winning Colours, that shall move
Others to Lust, but me to Love
These (nay) and more, thine own shall be
If thou wilt love, and live with me

A Master of Arts (1620) and a disciple of Jonson, Herrick never forgot his classical background. As an epigrammatist he was without peer, especially since he injected strong originality into a conventional and satiric form. He often made his parishioners models for these satiric verses, as in this comment on one man's discomfiture

Urrles had the Gout so that he co'd not stand
Then from his Feet, it shifted to his Hand
When 'twas in s Feet, his Chanty was small
Now tis in's Hand, he gives no Almes at all

Nor does he spare himself and his friends

Wantons we are and though our words be such,
Our Lives do differ from our Lines by much

An extension of this mode is Herrick's Anacreontic verse. In "To Bacchus, a Canticle" he begs the god of revelry and reproduction to show him the way, among thousands, to have more than one mistress. Somewhat more restrained and in the vein of Catullus are his lyrics to Lesbia and the epithalamia with which he greeted his many friends and relatives who, despite all his verses, insisted on getting married. In "The cruell Maid" he echoes, or is echoed by his contemporary, Andrew Marvell

Give my cold lips a kisse at last
If twice you kisse, you need not feare
That I shall stir or live more here
Next hollow out a Tombe to cover
Me me the most despised Lover
And write thereon This Reader, know
Love kill d this man No more but so

The more humble and bucolic songs of Horace, however, were the poet's abiding love. While he may have wished for the court rather than the parish, his best work was composed amid peaceful surroundings on pleasant rural subjects. His "To Daffadills" is a more delicate and subtle poem than the well known lyric by Wordsworth

Faire Daffadills we weep to see
You haste away so soone
As yet the early rising Sun
Has not attain'd his Noone Stay stay,
Untill the hasting day
Has run
But to the Even song
And, having pray'd together, we Will goe with you along

In the final period represented in Hesperides, "His returne to London" is a significant poem illustrating the sophisticated side of his genius, the pomp and circumstance which made a lasting poetry for this faithful royalist. He sings here of

O Place! O People! Manners! fram'd to please
All Nations, Customes, Kindreds, Lan guages!

as he links himself with his Elizabethan patron saints, the Renaissance man who took all life and all things for their province

"And here my ship rides having Anchor cast," he writes in his concluding poems of the book which he sent forth to find "a kinsman or a friend" He honestly thought and in fact knew "The Muses will weare blackes, when I am dead" Ironically, his death went almost unnoticed, though his verses were recalled in oral tradition for many years before the recovery of his work by modern scholarship—a most appropriate tribute to the man who gives such a vivid picture of the folk and their wassails, harvests, wakes, and loves

To his Book's end this last line he'd have plac't, Jocund his Muse was, but his Life was chast

HÉLOISE, Canon Fulbert's niece

WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX, Abélard's teacher, a philosopher

ANSELM OF LAON, a teacher

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Abbot of Clairvaux

Abélard's History of My Calamity is an account of the romantic and intellectual misfortunes of one of the significant philosophers of the Middle Ages. As a moderate realist, Abelard upheld the Aristotelian idea that names of characteristics do not name independently real universals but merely call attention to certain resemblances in things. This opinion made him a philosophical opponent of his teacher, William of Champeaux. Abélard's reliance on logic and dialectic together with his love of debate resulted in his antagonizing many churchmen, Bernard of Clairvaux in particular, and he was condemned for heresy. This misfortune took second place to the castration which he suffered as the result of having seduced Héloise, niece of the Canon of Notre Dame. Abélard's story of his misfortunes is at the same time a personal statement from the Middle Ages and a timeless expression of human trials.

Pierre Abélard was born in the village of Pallet, about eight miles from Nantes. His father was a soldier who had studied letters, and through his influence Abélard acquired a passion for learning. In particular, he delighted in philosophy and in the logical exercise of disputation.

In Paris he studied under William of Champeaux, whom he irritated by besting him in a series of debates. Abelard set up a school of his own at Melun and later, at Corbeil, near Paris, until he was forced by illness to return to his native province for several years. When he returned to Paris, he resumed study with William of Champeaux, but once again Abélard's skill in overthrowing his master's philosophy of universals gained the enmity of that cleric. Consequently, Abélard reestablished his school at Melun and attracted many of William's students to his own school. Later, he moved closer to Paris, conducted his school on Mont Ste Geneviève, and carried on a philosophical feud with William.

After the conversion of his parents to the monastic life, Abélard decided to study under Anselm of Laon, but he was disappointed to discover that Anselm's fame was more a result of custom than of intellect. Anselm had a great flow of words, but the words were all meaningless. Taunted by Anselm's admirers for his desultory attendance at the lectures, Abelard invited the students to hear his own exposition of the Scriptures. The presentation was so successful that, like William, Anselm began to persecute Abelard for surpassing him. When Anselm ordered Abelard to cease the work which was embarrassing him, Abelard returned to Paris.

In Paris he completed the glosses on Ezekiel which he had begun at Laon. As his philosophical fame grew and the numbers of his students increased, his pride and sensuality grew accordingly. Attracted by Héloïse, the young niece of a canon named Fulbert, Abelard determined to possess her. Having persuaded her uncle to take him in as a lodger, he agreed to become Héloïse's tutor and guide.

Abelard's objective was soon reached. Pretending to be engrossed in study, the lovers explored all the avenues of love, and Abelard gave less and less time to philosophy and to teaching. Instead of writing new lectures, he wrote love poetry which became famous among those who loved the delights of this world. Fulbert dismissed the rumors which came to him because he loved his niece and had faith in the continence of Abelard. The truth becoming finally apparent even to Fulbert, the lovers were forced to part. Their separation brought them shame, but shame gave way to increased desire. When Héloïse discovered that she was pregnant, Abelard arranged to have her taken to his sister's house. There Héloïse gave birth to a son, Astrolabe.

Fulbert, nearly mad with grief, would have killed or injured Abelard had he not feared that Héloïse might suffer from the vengeance of her lover's family. Then Abelard begged the canon's forgiveness and declared his intention to marry Héloïse. Fulbert agreed to the offer and sealed their agreement with a kiss.

When Abelard told Héloïse of his intention, she objected strenuously, arguing that it would be a loss to the Church and to philosophy if he were to disgrace himself by marrying a girl he had seduced. Furthermore, she argued, if he were to marry he would be going against the advice of the most eminent philosophers, who argued that no one could devote himself to philosophy while compelled to listen to the disturbances of family life. Finally she referred to the examples provided by those who undertook the monastic life in order to serve God.

Abelard refusing to be convinced, he and Héloïse were married secretly in Paris, the ceremony witnessed by her uncle and a few friends. When Héloïse criticized her uncle for telling the secret of her marriage, Fulbert punished her. Abelard, hearing of the punishment, sent Héloïse to a convent at Argenteuil. This act so angered the canon that he and his kinsmen arranged to have Abelard castrated. Two of those who perpetrated this shameful deed were later apprehended and, as punishment, blinded and also castrated.

Abelard suffered not so much from the physical injury as from the grief of the clerics and scholars of Paris. Héloïse took the vows of a religious life at the convent of Argenteuil, and Abelard became a monk at the abbey of St. Denis. There deploring the scandalous life of the abbot and other monks, he lured their students from them by teaching secular philosophy as well as theology.

Abelard's rivals at the abbey, through the cooperation of Alberic and Lotulphe, apologists for Anselm, arranged to have him called before an ecclesiastical council at Soissons for writing a tract containing what they regarded as heretical views concerning the unity and trinity of God. Although no case against the book could be made, Abelard's enemies convinced the council that the book should be ordered burned. This decision was carried out and Abelard was sent to the abbey.

of St Medard as punishment After a short period of time, however, all who had been involved in punishing Abelard put the blame on others Abelard was allowed to return to the abbey of St Denis

When the envy of the monks of St Denis prompted more ecclesiastical quarrels, Abélard secured permission to build an oratory at Troyes This he named the Paraclete, dedicating the church to the Holy Spirit

Abélard was then called to be abbot of St Gildas at Ruits, but his suffering continued because of the undisciplined and immoral behavior of the monks

When the abbot of St Denis expelled the nuns from the abbey of Argenteuil, where Heloise served, Abelard arranged to have her and some of her deposed companions take charge of the Paraclete In this manner he secured Heloise's happiness Rumors began to spread that Abélard was acting in her behalf because he was moved by lust, but he defended himself by arguing that the damage done to his person made any base act impossible Furthermore, he regarded it as his duty to supervise the nuns, and he pointed out passages in scripture in support of his action

Abélard was constantly threatened by the monks of his abbey, who attempted to poison him and to have him murdered by bandits Only by exercising great care and by excommunicating the most wicked among the brothers was Abélard able to survive He wrote the letter giving an account of his misfortunes in order to show how much suffering is possible for one who serves God and to argue that, despite suffering, all persons should trust in God's providence

Macaulay knew little about English history before the seventeenth century He knew almost nothing about foreign history He was not interested in art, science, philosophy, or religion As a Whig, he had no sympathy with the Tories and little understanding of James II He overlooked many of the authoritative books covering the period about which he was writing Therefore, in The History of England from the Accession of James the Second he is sometimes unfair to certain figures or mistaken in facts and interpretations The result, however, is a vivid and eminently readable history with vivid pictures of the actors and the social and cultural background against which they performed

Macaulay was a child prodigy who started writing early Before he was eight, this future historian, poet, and essayist had completed an outline of history and a poem in three cantos modeled after the poetry of Scott He went to Trinity College, Cambridge, intending to enter law Before he passed his bar examinations in 1826, he had attracted attention by a critical essay on Milton, the first of many

he contributed to the influential Edinburgh Review. Later his essays about the Indian question got him an appointment on a commission to India.

While still in India, he wrote in his diary his intention to compile a five volume history, the first part to cover the thirty years from the revolution of 1688 to the beginning of Walpole's administration. It would end with the death of George IV and achieve unity by covering "the Revolution that brought the crown into harmony with the Parliament and the Revolution which brought the Parliament into harmony with the nation." Further planning convinced him of the need to precede his account of the revolution by the story of the reign of James II.

When he returned to England, he had barely begun his project before he was named Secretary of War, a post which gave him no time for literary work until the elections of 1841 turned him out of office and into his study. He progressed slowly on his history until the return of his party to power in 1846, when he was appointed Paymaster General. In spite of public demands on his time the first two volumes of The History of England from the Accession of James the Second appeared in November 1848.

The ten chapters begin with an account of Roman times and bring the story of England down to the crowning of William and Mary on February 13, 1689. Diary entries reveal Macaulay's worry about how to begin. He had to start somewhere and so, in the first paragraph, he bravely announced his purpose to "offer a slight sketch of my country from the earliest times." Romans, Saxons, and Danes move through the first chapter, bringing the reader up to the general elections of 1660 and the return of Charles II to England. In the next chapter Macaulay followed the career of Charles II until his death in 1685. At this point the historian was ready to begin his task in earnest. His announced purpose in the third chapter was to "give a description of the state in which England was at the time when the crown passed from Charles II to his brother, James."

First, Macaulay stressed the small population of the British Isles in 1685, perhaps five million, with half living in England. Then he discussed the revenue available. Excise taxes, taxes on chimneys, and the rest brought in hardly a fifth as much to the crown as France was collecting. Then follows a study of the army and the navy on which the money was largely spent. A discussion of agriculture and mineral wealth introduces the country gentlemen and the yeomanry, with a glance at the clergy. Next, the historian's attention fixes on the towns and their growth, following the expansion of trade and manufacturing with special attention to London. Discussion of communication with London leads to a section on the postal system, inns, and highwaymen. A study of England's cultural status, both literary and scientific, precedes the final section on the terrible condition of the very poor.

The description of the death of Charles II, in Chapter IV, is a sample of Macaulay's style. The ten pages read like a historical novel, except that the historian has footnotes available for the details of the palace room, the visitors at the bedside, and such bits as the king's dying comment about winding the clock at his bedside. The surreptitious visit of the priest, John Huddleston, and the reaction of the crowd outside the palace bring vividness to the event.

The succession of James II to the throne is the theme of the other six chapters of the first two volumes. The new monarch lacked the political acumen and the general knowledge of the world possessed by Charles II, otherwise, he might not have been so easily duped by his Jesuit adviser, for he did possess administrative ability, more, perhaps, than Macaulay grants him.

The exciting part of this section tells of James's following the invasion of England by William of Orange and of his capture by "rude fishermen of the Kentish coast," who mistook the royal party for Jesuits and the monarch for his hated adviser, Father Petre. Then came his flight to France, the Convention that formulated the Declaration of Rights, and the coronation of William and Mary. Because of this stirring material, excitingly told, thirteen thousand copies of the history were sold in four months.

Such success worried Macaulay. Attempting to make the other volumes dealing with William as colorful, he provided himself with a timetable: two book pages a day, two years to finish the first draft, and another year for revision and polishing. He felt the need for making every sentence clear and precise, for seeing that his paragraphs had continuity. Such labor took longer than he had planned. It was nearly seven years before he had the manuscript of Volumes III and IV ready for the printer. Their twelve chapters brought England's story to the end of the war with France in 1697. The public acceptance justified the time taken in its composition. Within two months 26,500 copies were sold, and his royalties amounted to twenty thousand pounds.

Macaulay's diary frequently voiced his desire for fame and immortality. "I think posterity will not let my book die," he wrote in 1838. In addition to the wealth it brought, the success of the work replaced the Tory view of English history, as voiced by Hume in his History of England (1754-1761), with the Victorian concept originated with Macaulay.

In the new volumes Macaulay showed himself kindly disposed toward Mary in her trying position between her Catholic father and her Protestant husband, who divided his attention between her and Elizabeth Villiers. But William of Orange did love Mary. The last lines of Macaulay's history tell about "a small piece of black silk ribbon," found next to William's skin when his remains were being laid out. "The lords in waiting ordered it to be taken off. It contained a gold ring and a lock of the hair of Mary."

Macaulay admired William. The Dutch king had an enormous task, organizing England, reconquering Ireland, and subduing rebellious Scotland, all the while carrying on a war in France. Macaulay does seem to overestimate William's political genius, and his account of the king's yearning to return to Holland and leave England for Mary to rule is considered by some scholars an exaggeration of William's basic disillusionment with English life. With a rosy picture of the prosperity amid which William rode into London on Thanksgiving Day in November, 1697, and with the promise of a happier age, the volumes published during the writer's lifetime come to an end.

When Macaulay died he had completed only three chapters of the concluding volume, bringing the story up to the prorogation of Parliament, April 11, 1700. His sister, Lady Trevelyan, prepared this material for publication exactly as Macaulay had left it, with "no references verified, no authority sought for or examined," but she did include several fragments, among them six pages describing the death of William with which Macaulay had probably intended to conclude his work. She also compiled a fifty-page, double-column index of the five books.

In his presentation of his characters, Macaulay was often biased. As one who seemed never in doubt, who decided on one of two conflicting stories and frequently did not mention the existence of the other, he saw a man as good or bad. Historians have pointed out his failure to do justice to William Penn. Being a Whig, he used a more severe criterion toward Tories, as is evident in his discussions of James's relations with Catherine Sedley, and William's with Elizabeth Villiers. What was lamentable in William was a crime in James, whom he portrayed as a libertine and black monster.

His villains are sometimes caricatures. The crafty Robert Ferguson and Titus Oates, whose perjury about the Popish

Plot brought death to the innocent, are made physically hideous. In Chapter IV, Macaulay writes of Oates's "short neck, his forehead low as that of a baboon, his purple cheeks, and his monstrous length of chin" and features "in which villainy seemed to be written by the hand of God." For Marlborough, even when he was plain John Churchill, Macaulay turned to lampoons for details, though he must have known they were biased. Perhaps his dislike was based on the unproved accusation that Marlborough had tried to overthrow William.

In a work of such magnitude, errors of fact and interpretation were bound to creep in, but even some that were pointed out to Macaulay during his lifetime remained uncorrected. In other cases, he did not have access to the journals and scholarly research now available. Another source of error arose from Macaulay's attitude toward everything outside the British Isles. Except for India, where he had lived for four years, he practically ignored the colonies. American history is brought in chiefly in connection with happenings in England. Captain Kidd and the piratical activities of New England and New York appear to explain the fate of an English ministry, while the Jamaica earthquake of 1692 serves only as one more reason for the unpopularity of William's reign.

Macaulay's style has also come in for some criticism. His efforts toward clearness lead at times to verbosity and his attempts to emphasize sometimes create a paragraph where a sentence would have served. But its basic flaw is that Macaulay thought as an orator. His history is more impressive when read aloud than when read silently; it is more rhetorical than literary.

But no book lacking in inherent worth can outlast its century, and The History of England remains a landmark of its kind. As long as people are moved by an exciting story, interestingly told, they will continue to read Macaulay's history with both enjoyment and profit.

A HISTORY OF NEW YORK, BY DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER

Type of work Humorous pseudo history

Author Washington Irving (1783-1859)

Time 56 B.C. to 1664

Locale New Amsterdam (New York)

First published 1809

Principal personages

HENDRICK HUDSON, the Dutch explorer

WOUTER VAN TWILLER the first governor of New Amsterdam

WILHELMUS KIEFT the second governor

PETER STUYVESANT the last governor

GENERAL VON POFFENBURGH, Commander of Fort Casimir

JAN RISINGH Governor of the Province of New Sweden

The fun of reading a parody is heightened by acquaintance with the material burlesqued. Although Washington Irving confessed, in the "Author's Apology" added to the edition of 1848, that his idea had been to parody Samuel L. Mitchell's A Picture of New York (1807), a knowledge of Mitchell's book is not necessary to the enjoyment of the Irving volume. The parody is only part of the humor of A History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker, originally begun as a collaboration of Washington and his older brother Peter, and concluded by Washington alone. The original title was A History of New York from the Beginning of the World to the End of the Dutch Dynasty.

The book shows the interest of its twenty-five-year-old author in history, customs, and etymology, and the burlesquing of several literary styles reveals Irving as a literary critic. His notebook supplies the names of some of the authors parodied: names now largely forgotten.

While Irving was in the course of completing the book, his fiancée Matilda Hoffman, died suddenly, and at first he was too stunned to continue his work. Later he returned to the manuscript as an anodyne for his grief: finished it quickly, and delivered it to his publisher. About the same time he conceived the idea of ascribing the authorship of his book to an imaginary and eccentric Dutchman. The hoax was elaborately contrived. First printed in the public press was a story about the disappearance of a man named Diedrich Knickerbocker. A short time later an advertisement appeared, supposedly signed by the owner of the boarding house where Knickerbocker had lived, offering for sale "a very curious kind of written book," printed to reimburse the landlord for the old gentleman's unpaid rent.

On December 6, 1809, A History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker, in seven parts and 130,000 words, was first offered for sale. Legends about its reception spread rapidly. A Dutch woman in Albany threatened to horsewhip the author for his slanderous account of an ancestor. A number of famous New York families were reported ready to sue the publisher. On the other hand, Walter Scott was reported with sore ribs from laughing at it.

The style wanders from playful to erudite. Evidence of Washington Irving's wide reading appears on almost every page, and voluminous footnotes clothe it with pseudo scholarship. At first readers thought that these references were part of the humor, later scholars began tracing them to actual, though minor, Roman and Greek writers.

The author's pleasantries are apparent from the beginning. Book I, according to him, was "learned, sagacious, and nothing at all to the purpose," and he suggested that the idle reader skip it. More precisely, as Irving embarked on a study of cosmogony or creation of the world, he advised the reader to "take fast hold of his skirt or take a short cut and wait for him at the beginning of some smoother chapter."

The first books contain more chatter than matter. It is waggish humor. Noah is mentioned in connection with travel by sea, in order to get the reader to America. In one place the author defends the killing of the Indians because, as the original inhabitants of America, they did not know European procedure to improve ground, therefore they did not use the talents that Providence had bestowed upon them; therefore they had proved careless stewards, therefore they had no right to the soil, and therefore there was Biblical authority for their extermination.

In Book II the author proceeds to the settlement of the Province of Nieuw Nederlandts. He confessed that his was the procedure of Hans von Dunderbot tom, who took a running start of three miles to jump over a hill, and arrived at it out of breath. So he "sat down to blow and then walked over it at his leisure."

One source of humor lies in the derivation of names. The four explorers who passed through Hell Gate and reached the Island of Manna-hata ("The Island of Manna") were named Van Kortlandt (Lack land), Van Zandt (Earth born), Harden Broeck (Tough Breeches), and Ten Broeck (Ten Breeches or Thin Breeches). Irving usually refers to the governors by his translation of their names. Wouter Van Twiller becomes "Walter the Doubter," living up to his name by smoking his pipe and maintaining silence in every crisis. According to Irving, this man of wisdom, five feet six inches in height and six feet five inches in circumference, settled a suit between debtor and creditor by weighing the papers containing their claims, finding them equally weighty, and decreeing that the accounts were balanced. After he made the constable pay the fees, he had no further law trials

His successor, Wilhelmus Kieft or 'William the Testy,' defied the Yanokies ("Silent Men") from Mais Tchusaeg and Connecticut by bombarding them with proclamations and by building a fortress, garrisoned by a lusty bugler a flag pole, Quaker guns, and a windmill, to resist them. One of the amusing scenes in the book is the description of the Yankees marching to war at Oyster Bay, where they were defeated by the doughty burghers, who thereupon celebrated on oysters and wine. Later this governor disappeared either he was lost in the smoke of his pipe or carried away like King Arthur. Peter Stuyvesant "the Headstrong," then became the governor.

Stuyvesant is the favorite of Diedrich Knickerbocker. Three volumes are devoted to him. It was he who built the Battery to hold off the Yankee invasion, though actually their own witch hunting diverted them from their proposed expedition. Then he declared war on Governor Rusingh of the Colony of New Sweden, across the Delaware. By treachery Governor Rusingh had captured Fort Casimir. (The earlier writer who supplied Irving's model for his flowery description of that campaign is unknown.) The Dutch fighters paused at noon to eat, and the author advised his readers to do the same. Then the battle was resumed, the only casualty being a flock of geese killed by a wild Swedish volley.

Stuyvesant had other troubles, first the Yankees from Connecticut and later the "roaring boys of Merryland"—King Charles II of England who gave New World territory to his brother, the Duke of York, and lent him a fleet to conquer it. Against the arrival of the British ships the Dutch "fortified themselves—with resolution" and burned everything in the colony of British origin. But their defense was futile. Melancholically the white haired Knickerbocker narrates the end of his "beloved Island of Manna-hata" on August 27, 1664.

In the 1812 edition of his history Irving presents an additional account of his imaginary author and tells of his return to New York, now a British colony, and his death. He was buried, 'say the old records,' in St. Mark's Cemetery beside his hero, Peter Stuyvesant.

In the revised 1848 edition Irving added an "apology" and an explanation. In setting down the amusing legends of New York, he declared he had not intended offense to living descendants of any of the old families. His purpose had been to present the history of that remote and almost forgotten age in the spirit of imaginative fancy and legend. This happy blending is his true contribution in his history, accepted by those who have never seen the book or heard of the original Harmen Knickerbocker, who came from Holland about 1674 and settled in Albany, as well as by those who have read with smiles and chuckles this playful but surprisingly accurate history of the Dutch in New Amsterdam.

HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO

Type of work History

DON DIEGO VELASQUEZ Governor of Cuba

HERNANDO CORTES conqueror of Mexico

PEDRO DE ALVARADO, one of Cortes' lieutenants

MONTENZUMA, Emperor of the Aztecs

GUATEMOZIN, Montezuma's nephew and successor
CACAMA nephew of the emperor

Prescott's observations on Spanish efforts to convert the Aztecs betray his rather marked suspicion of the Catholic Church. His personal biases are less pronounced in other matters. Because Prescott deals with his narrative in dramatic terms and with an abundance of background material, particularly on the Aztec civilization, his History of the Conquest of Mexico has remained the classic account of the death of a civilization which in many ways rivaled ancient Egypt's.

The success of the Spanish conquest was aided by the Aztec legend of Quetzalcoatl, a benevolent god who, once having lived on earth and departed, was expected to return tall, white skinned, dark bearded. When the first Spanish expeditionary party, led by Juan de Grijalva, made a preliminary exploration of the mainland it encountered an unfriendly reception on landing. When the Aztecs happened to associate the Spaniards with the legend of Quetzalcoatl, however, they sent Grijalva away with rich gifts. As a result, Velásquez, Governor of Cuba, immediately organized a second expedition, to be led by Hernando Cortes.

Cortes' armada left Cuba on February 10, 1519, and landed on the island of Cozumel. At that time he acquired two valuable aides: a Spanish soldier named Aguilar, who had been taken captive by the natives of Cozumel during the Grijalva expedition, to serve as an interpreter, and Marina, a girl from the mainland whose mother had sold her on Cozumel. Marina became not only an interpreter but Cortes' mistress.

When the Spaniards moved on to the mainland, landing on Good Friday at what is now Vera Cruz, they stepped ashore in a Mexico significantly disunited. Montezuma, Emperor of the Aztecs, was a good warrior and a just ruler, but he was also superstitious and a lover of pleasure, with numerous enemies. There was in addition to this political unrest a vague feeling among the people that the return of Quetzalcoatl was imminent since the days of Columbus, there had been rumors of the Spaniards, and these rumors had somehow fused with the ancient legend. Dissension among the lesser kingdoms and tribes of Montezuma's empire and the revival of the Quetzalcoatl myth were of great value to the Spaniards in their invasion of Mexico.

Because he sensed mounting resistance to his leadership, Cortes established Vera Cruz as a civil colony rather than a military base, in this way he made the expedition responsible only to the crown, not to the governor of Cuba. Later, when Juan Diaz conspired to turn the expedition back to Cuba, Cortes ordered the destruction of his fleet. With only one small ship left, the men had little to think about but the march forward.

Leaving some men behind to protect the coastal settlement, Cortes began his march toward the capital, Tenochtitlán, now Mexico City. While one of the original purposes of the expedition was the conversion of the Indians to Catholicism, the expedition, once under way, did not delay for missionary activities. Indeed, Father Olmedo, the expedition's priest, persuaded Cortés not to try to convert all of the heathen along the route.

The first pronounced resistance to the Spaniards took place among the Tlascalans, an agricultural people, but a nation of warriors as well. Two earlier battles with the Tlascalans were indecisive, but a third, fought on September 5, 1519, was in effect a victory for the Spaniards. The Tlascalan leader, Xicotencatl, continued, however, to threaten and to harass the invaders. Cortés forged ahead, his forces plundering as they went, and finally, with Xicotencatl reconciled to submission, the Spaniards arrived at Tlascala itself. In the meantime Montezuma continued in his policy of sending gifts but barring the Spaniards from Tenochtitlán.

At Cholula, Cortes learned through Marina that the natives were planning a conspiracy with Montezuma's help. Profiting from former enmity between the Cholulans and the Tlascalans, Cortes stationed Tlascalans around the city and proceeded to massacre the treacherous Cholulans.

Suspecting still further hostility, Cortes and his men moved on, passing between the mountains named Iztaccihuatl and Popocatepetl. No further resistance was forthcoming, and the expedition was shortly at a point where the fertile Valley of Mexico lay before them. Confounded by their advance and awed by their power, Montezuma at last sent his nephew Cacama with a message of welcome for the conquistadors. On November 8, 1519, Cortés and his men entered Tenochtitlán, a city built in the middle of a great lake, and Montezuma greeted them with pomp and dignity. Although the Aztecs remained outwardly friendly, Cortés continued to be suspicious of his host because he had received reports from Vera Cruz of troubles instigated by the emperor Quauhpopoca, governor of the coastal province, was burned for his part in the disturbances, and Montezuma, taken by surprise, was seized and removed to the fortified quarters occupied by the Spaniards. Although a hostage, Montezuma conducted the business of the country as usual.

In 1520, Montezuma formally announced his subservience to Spain; the nobles concurred, and the legend of Quetzalcoatl was revived among the people. Though conditions appeared to be stable, Cortés ordered the rebuilding of his fleet.

Cortés' relations with Velásquez had now deteriorated to such an extent that the governor outfitted a rival expedition under the leadership of Pánfilo de Narváez. Gonzalo de Sandoval, the governor appointed by Cortes at Villa Rica, maintained a close watch over Narváez' attempts to establish a settlement, but Cortes felt compelled to deal with Narváez personally. Leaving the capital in the care of an aide, Pedro de Alvarado, he marched to the coast with a detachment of troops and Indian allies.

With his band of only 226 men and five horses, Cortes surprised Narváez and took him prisoner. In Cortes' absence, revolt broke out in Tenochtitlán. Alvarado, plagued by constant fears of conspiracy, had slaughtered several hundred Aztec nobles during the festival of Huitzilopochtli, the Aztec god of war. Earlier, Cortes had allowed Montezuma's brother Cuiclahua to act as the imperial representative during Montezuma's captivity. Bitterly vengeful after the massacre, Cuiclahua led the Aztecs in a retaliatory uprising against the Spaniards.

With his own band reinforced by two thousand Tlascalans, Cortes returned hurriedly to the capital. During the first stages of hostilities following the return of Cortes, Montezuma attempted to intercede and pacify the embattled Aztecs, but his people turned on him and he was fatally wounded. Broken and in despair, Montezuma died on June 30, 1520.

During the uprising the Aztecs had destroyed all bridges on causeways leading to the mainland, and the Spanish retreat from the city became chaotic with heavy losses. On the plains of Otumba, however, the Spaniards and their Tlascalan allies managed to put the Aztecs to flight. The Spaniards retreated into Tlascalan territory, where they could feel safe once more. But the troops were restless after their harrowing retreat, and for a time there seemed to be some chance that the Tlascalans might join the Aztecs in common cause against the invaders. Fortunately, the Tlascalans remained friendly, in fact, their chief, before he died of smallpox, became a Christian—the first successfully converted heathen.

Guatemozin, Montezuma's nephew and successor, had sworn to drive the Span iards from his country As Cortes marched back toward the capital, however, he gathered from friendly tribes more Indian auxiliaries to lead against the Aztecs Welcomed in Tezcuco by the new prince Ixtlilxochitl, an enemy of Montezuma, Cortés' forces advanced for the final subjugation of the Aztec civilization

More cohesive than Prescott's companion study on the conquest of Peru,

History of the Conquest of Mexico is the author's most brilliant work Though the book may lack profound philosophical insight, it is a vivid portrayal of a fascinating historical fact the subjugation of a whole people by a mere handful of alien adventurers—cruel, daring intriguers who played upon the religious superstitions of their victims

THE HISTORY OF THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE

Gibbon's The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is the definitive history of the Roman empire from the end of its golden age to its final political and physical disintegration The massive character of the work, testifying to the years devoted to its composition by its scholar author, is the first, but most superficial sign, of its greatness The style—urbane, dramatic, polished—assures its eminent place in literature Finally, as history, the work stands or falls on the accuracy and depth of its report of events covering more than twelve centuries, and in this respect The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire continues to prevail as the most authoritative study on this theme ever written Later scholars have challenged minor points or added to the material of the history, but Gibbon's work stands as the source of all that is most relevant in the story of Rome's declining years

The account begins with a critical description of the age of the Antonines Gibbon concentrates on the period from 96 to 180, a time which he describes as "a happy period," during the reigns of Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, and the two Antonines The first three chapters are prefatory to the body of the work, they establish the claim that Rome was then at the height of its glory as an Empire—

it was strong, prosperous, active, with world wide influence After the death of Marcus Aurelius, and with the ascent of Commodus (180 192), the Empire began its long and gradual decline The body of Gibbon's work is devoted to a careful recital of the events that followed

Gibbon was more interested in recounting the principal events of the Empire's history than he was in analyzing events in an effort to account for the downfall of Rome But he did not entirely ignore the question of causes At the close of his monumental history he reports four principal causes of Rome's decline and fall "I The injuries of time and nature II The hostile attacks of the barbarians and Christians III The use and abuse of the materials And, IV The domestic quarrels of the Romans

It is customary for commentators on Gibbon to emphasize the reference to the opposing influences of Christianity and barbarism, and, in particular, some critics have been inclined to charge Gibbon with a lack of sympathetic understanding of the early Christian church It is clear from Gibbon's narrative and summary statement, however, that the Christian contribution to the eventual downfall of Rome was only part of a complex of causes, and it seems unlikely that the Christian effort would have succeeded

if the Roman Empire had not already been in decline

In any case, it is not so much what Gibbon says as his way of saying it that has proved irritating. In the first place, Gibbon writes as if he were located in Rome, his view of events is from the Roman perspective, although it does not always exhibit a Roman bias. Secondly, his objectivity, when it is achieved, has been offensive to some who so cherish the Christian church that they cannot tolerate any discussion of its faults: it is as if such critics were demanding that Gibbon maintain historical impartiality about the Romans but not about the Christians.

When the Decline and Fall first appeared, the chapters on Christianity—Chapters XV and XVI—immediately became the objects of critical attack. Gibbon seems to have anticipated this response, for he wrote, “The great law of impartiality too often obliges us to reveal the imperfections of the uninspired teachers and believers of the Gospel and, to a careless observer, their faults may seem to cast a shade on the faith which they professed.” Perhaps this word of caution would have pacified the critics had not Gibbon immediately brought into play his urbane sarcasm, so distasteful to the insistent pious: “The theologian may indulge the pleasing task of describing Religion as she descended from Heaven, arrayed in her native purity. A more melancholy duty is imposed on the historian. He must discover the inevitable mixture of error and corruption which she contracted in a long residence upon earth, among a weak and degenerate race of beings.”

Obviously, there is no truly impartial judge. Gibbon's tone is acceptable, even proper, to those who share his skepticism, but to others more emotionally involved in the Christian faith Gibbon seems cynical to the point of gross distortion.

Gibbon asks how the Christian faith came to achieve its victory over Rome and the other religions of the world. He rejects as unsatisfactory an answer which attributes Christianity's force to the truth of its doctrine and the providence of God. Five causes of the rapid growth of the Christian church are then advanced: “I. The inflexible, and if we may use the expression, the intolerant zeal of the Christians. II. The doctrine of a future life. III. The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church. IV. The pure and austere morals of the Christians. V. The union and discipline of the Christian republic, which gradually formed an independent and increasing state in the heart of the Roman empire.”

In his comments on these five causes Gibbon discusses Jewish influences on the Christian faith and explains how the Roman religion had failed to be convincing in its mythology and doctrine of a future life, but although he admits the persuasive power of the Christian use of the claim of immortality, he speaks with skeptical condescension of the efforts of philosophers to support the doctrine of a future life, and he is sarcastic when he mentions “the mysterious dispensations of Providence” which withheld the doctrine from the Jews only to give it to the Christians. When he speaks of the miracles, Gibbon leaves the impression that the pagans failed to be convinced because no such events actually took place: “The lame walked, the blind saw, the sick were healed, the dead were raised,” he writes, but he adds that “the laws of Nature were frequently suspended for the benefit of the church.”

Gibbon argues that the emperors were not as criminal in their treatments of the Christians as some Christian apologists have argued. He maintains that the Romans acted only with caution and reluctance after a considerable amount of time and provocation, and that they were moderate in their use of punishments. He offers evidence in support of his claim that the stories of martyrdom were often exaggerated or wholly false, and that in many cases the Christians sought martyrdom by provoking the Romans to violence Gibbon concludes by casting doubt on the numbers of those punished by death, and he insists that the Christians have inflicted more punishments on one another than they received from the Romans

Discussion of Gibbon's chapters on Christianity sometimes tends to turn attention away from the historian's virtues the inclusiveness of his survey, the liveliness of his account, and his careful documentation of historical claims Gibbon did not pretend that he was without moral bias, but his judgments of the tyrannical emperors are defended by references to their acts It was not enough for Gibbon to discover, for example, that Septimus Severus was false and insincere, particularly in the making of treaties, the question was whether Severus was forced, by the imperious demands of politics, to be deceitful Gibbon's conclusion was that there was no need for Severus to be as false in his promises as he was, consequently, he condemns him for his acts In similar fashion he reviews the tyrannical behavior of Caracalla, Maximin, and other emperors before the barbarian invasion of the Germans

Gibbon names the Franks, the Alemanni, the Goths, and the Persians as the enemies of the Romans during the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, when a weakened Empire was vulnerable to attack both from within and without Perhaps the Empire would have wholly disintegrated at that time had not Valerian and Gallienus been succeeded by Claudius Aurelianus, Probus, and Diocletian described as "great princes" by Gibbon and as "Restorers of the Roman world"

Several chapters of this massive work are devoted to a recital and discussion of the acts and influence of Constantine I, who reunited the Empire which had been divided under Diocletian and, as a consequence of his conversion to the Christian faith, granted tolerance to the Christians by the Edict of Milan One result of the consequent growth of Christianity was a growing emphasis upon the distinction between temporal and spiritual powers, the result was not that Church and state remained apart from each other, but that the bishops of the Church came to have more and more influence on matters of state The date 476 is significant as marking the end of the West Roman Empire with the ascent to power of Odoacer, the barbarian chieftain

The remainder of Gibbon's classic story of Rome's decline is the story of the increase of papal influence, the commencement of Byzantine rule, the reign of Charlemagne as emperor of the West, the sacking of Rome by the Arabs, the retirement of the popes to Avignon, the abortive efforts of Ruenzi to restore the government of Rome the return of the popes and the great schism, and the final settlement of the ecclesiastical state

HISTORY OF THE PELOPONNESIAN WAR

Type of work History

Author Thucydides (455? c 400 B C)

Principal personages

PERICLES founder of Athenian democracy

THUCYDIDES, an Athenian general and historian

DEMOSTHENES, the famous orator

ALCIBIADES an Athenian general and turncoat

NICIAS, an Athenian general

ARCHIDAMUS, King of Sparta

BRASIDAS, a Spartan general

In writing his History of the Peloponnesian War, Thucydides content to look for human causes behind results, refused to credit the gods with responsibility for the acts of man. Impartially he chronicled the clash of a military and a commercial imperialism: the land empire of the Spartans confronting the Athenian maritime league. Some have attributed to him an attitude of moral indifference, such as is revealed in his report of the debate between Athenian and Melian ambassadors, but he wrote with no intention of either moralizing or producing a cultural history. He was a military man interested in the vastly different political and economic patterns of Athens and Sparta. Seeing in the modes and ideals of their cultures an explanation of their ways of warfare, he wrote for intelligent readers rather than the ignorant masses.

The eight books of Thucydides' history, divided into short paragraph chapters, provide a few facts about their author. For instance, in Book IV, he refers to himself as "Thucydides son of Olorus, who wrote this history." He must have been wealthy, for, discussing Brasidas' attack on Amphipolis, he states that the Spartan "heard that Thucydides had the right of working goldmines in the neighboring district of Thrace and was consequently one of the leading men of the city." He also tells frankly of his failure as the commander of a relief expedition to that city and of his twenty years' exile from Athens as punishment. Apparently he spent the years of his exile in travel among the sites of the battles he describes, thereby increasing the accuracy of his details. Students of warfare find that he gives descriptions of the tricks and stratagems of both siege and defense. Not until 404, after the war had ended, did he return to Athens. By tradition he was killed about 400 B.C., either in Thrace for the gold he carried, or in Athens for publicly writing his opinions.

Thucydides the Athenian wrote the history of the war in which the Peloponnesians and the Athenians fought against one another" are the opening words of this masterpiece of Greek history. "He began to write when they first took up arms, believing it would be great and memorable above all previous wars." After this beginning Thucydides drops into the first person to explain the rivalry of Athens and Sparta, the two great states of Hellas then at the height of their power. He was proud of the advances made by his native Athens over the ways of the barbarians. "In ancient times the Hellenes carried weapons because their homes were undefended and intercourse unsafe." But swords like the old-fashioned linen undergarments and the custom of binding the hair in knots, had gone out of style by his time.

Rivalry between the two cities was an old story; it had kept Spartans from fighting beside Athenians at Marathon. It took a commercial form, however, when the Lacedaemonians demanded that their allies, the Megarians, be allowed to market their products in Athens. Pericles, orator, statesman, and patron of the arts, took the first step toward breaking his own Thirty Years' Truce, agreed upon in 445 B.C. In a fiery oration he declared that to yield to the Spartans would reduce the Athenians to vassals.

The final break, according to Thucydides, came later. He dates the year (431) according to the calendars of the three leading states. Chrysis had been high priestess of Argos for forty-eight years, Aenesias was ephor of Sparta, and Pythodorus was concluding his archonship in Athens. In that year Thebes, at the invitation of disgruntled Plataean citizens, made a surprise attack on Plataea, a Boeotian ally of Athens.

To understand the situation fully, it is necessary to keep in mind a clash of political concepts that the historian does not mention. In 445 B.C., under Pericles, Athens had become a radical democracy whose policy was to send help to any democratically inclined community. Sparta and its allies were just as eager to promote their conservative oligarchy

To both, self interest was paramount

Violation of the truce by Thebes says Thucydides, gave Athens an excuse to prepare for war Its walled city could be defeated only by a fleet and Sparta had no fleet On the other hand landlocked Sparta could withstand anything except a full scale land invasion, and Athens had no army The Lacedaemonians begged their friends in Italy and Sicily to collect and build ships, and Athens sent ambassadors to raise armies and completely surround Sparta Thucydides was honest enough to admit that public opinion largely favored the Spartans, who posed as the liberators of Hellas

Sparta moved first by invading the Isthmus of Corinth in 431 B C Strife during the winter and summer of the first year (as the historian divided his time) consisted largely of laying waste the fields around the fortified cities Like many primitive peoples, the Greeks stopped fighting during planting and harvesting (The entries frequently begin with "The following summer, when the corn was coming into ear") The war was also halted for their games, not only the Olympic games of 428, but the Delian, Pythian, and Isthmian games as well

In the summer of the next year a plague broke out in Athens and raged intermittently for three years Seven chapters of Book II provide a vivid description, "for I myself was attacked and witnessed the suffering of others" The seriousness of the plague protected Athens because enemy troops were afraid to approach its walls

The most vivid part of Thucydides' history deals with the Syracuse campaign of 416 An embassy from Egesta, Sicily, sought Athenian help against its rival city of Selinus The ambitious Alcibiades thought this would be a good excuse for Athens to annex Syracuse With Alcibiades, Nicias, and Lamachus sharing the command, the best equipped expeditionary force ever sent from a Greek city sailed for Sicily with 134 triremes, 5,100 hoplites or heavy-armed infantry,

Alcibiades had left behind bitter enemies who accused him of defacing sacred statues on the day the fleet sailed Though there was no evidence against him, he was ordered home to defend himself Fearing treachery, he fled to Sparta, where he was warmly welcomed Informed of the Athenian expedition, the Lacedaemonians sent a military adviser to Syracuse The Persians offered to outfit a fleet for Alcibiades to lead against Athens His patriotism outweighed his injured pride, however, and eventually he returned to Athens and won several victories for the city before another defeat sent him again into exile This occurred, however, after the period covered by Thucydides' history

Meanwhile, in the campaign before Syracuse, Nicias disregarded the advice of Demosthenes and was defeated on both land and sea "Of all the Hellenic actions on record," writes Thucydides, "this was the greatest, the most glorious to the victor, and the most ruinous to the vanquished Fleet and army vanished from the face of the earth, nothing was saved, and out of the many who went forth, few returned home This ended the Sicilian expedition"

The account of the expedition practically ends Thucydides' history There is another book, but it does not rise to the dramatic pitch of Book VII Though he lived eleven years after these events and four years after the end of the war, Thucydides did not chronicle its last stages, perhaps because they were too painful After Alcibiades had been exiled a second time, Sparta starved the Athenians into surrender, and with this defeat their glory faded For the next thirty years Sparta was the supreme power in Hellas

As Macaulay wrote, Thucydides surpassed all his rivals as the historian of the ancient world Perhaps not as colorful as Herodotus, "the Father of History," he was certainly more accurate, and while the annals of Tacitus contain excellent character delineation, the Roman's pages are "cold and poor" Thucydides may be superficial in his observations and shallow in his interpretation of events, but he did accumulate facts and dates and he presented them in a three dimensional picture of people and places. For this reason his work has survived for more than twenty three hundred years

"Herodotus, being of the city of Halicarnassus in Greece, wrote and compiled an History to the end that nether tract of time might overwhelm and bury in silence the acts of humane kind, nor the worthy and renowned adventures of the Grecians and Barbarians (as well others as chiefly those that were done in warre) might want the due reward of immortal fame." So did the unknown "B.R." begin his translation of two of the nine books of Herodotus, "entitled with the names of the nine Muses," in 1584.

As the first to use the word "history," Herodotus deserves Cicero's title, "Father of History." To be sure, this son of wealthy upper class parents did not have the historian's critical attitude toward his sources. Interesting anecdotes of the wars between the Greeks and the Persians of the fifth century B.C. found their way into his pages whether he could verify them or not, but he does sometimes hedge and tag certain items as hearsay. From his quotations, he must have read widely. From the details in his descriptions and the comments like "thus I saw," he must have visited most of the places he mentions. The true greatness of Herodotus lies in the fact that he was the first important writer to depart from the verse of Homer and others, to produce European first prose literature. Some predecessors had chronicled the beginnings of their small communities or states, but the writings of Herodotus embrace a vaster panorama, not only Greece, but Egypt, Sardis, and Babylon as well. And he looked for the reasons back of the events. His aim was to trace the early rivalries between Greek and barbarian, in the process he recounted the story of many tribes, described the lands they inhabited, and reported many of their interesting customs. Those who want greater accuracy can consult Thucydides (c. 455-400 B.C.), who wrote a half century later. His work is more objective, but it lacks the color of Herodotus' account.

The Persians maintained that the Phoenicians originally started the quarrel by kidnapping women from Argos. Later the Hellenes raided the port of Tyre and abducted Europa, the king's daughter. The wars actually started, however, when Croesus, whose magnificent court was visited by Solon, desired to enlarge his empire by conquering some of the Ionian cities of Asia Minor. When he consulted the oracles, he was persuaded at Delphi to gather his allies for an attack on the mainland. The invasion resulted in a stalemate, however, and Croesus returned to Lydia, where his capital, Sardis, was surprised and captured by the Persians. Only a rainstorm, sent by the gods, saved him as he was being burned to death. The same miracle persuaded Cyrus to free his captive after taking possession of some of his vassal states. With them, Cyrus went on to capture Babylon. However the Massagetae, under Queen Tomyris, were too strong in their resistance and strategy. Book I, titled Chio, ends with the death of Cyrus.

Book II, called Euterpe, tells how Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, became king and planned to march against Egypt. The rest of the book is a tourist's guide and history of Egypt from its beginnings to the coronation of Amasis.

Book III, called Thalia, tells how Cambyses marched against Amasis. The Egyptian king having died in the meantime, the mercenary army of his son was no match for the Persian, who then betrayed his incipient insanity by dishonoring his slain enemies.

Book IV, called Melpomene, introduces Darius, cousin of and successor to Cambyses, who let the barbarous Scythians outwit him into making peace with them.

The next volume, whose Muse is Terpsichore, begins with a plan that failed. Two Paeonian nobles, wishing to be named rulers over their people, brought their beautiful sister to Sardis, where Darius saw her, carrying water on her head, leading a horse, and spinning. Anxious to spread such industry throughout his empire, he had the Paeonians sent throughout Asia Minor. But the book deals largely with the revolt in Ionia, the growth of Athens, and its expedition, encouraged by Anistagoras, against Sardis. Although the capital was captured and burned, Darius rallied and defeated the invaders at Salamis, in Cyprus.

Erato is the Muse of Book VI, which tells of a battle fought between 353 Ionian triremes and six hundred Babylonian ships. By dissension among the enemy rather than by his strength Darius defeated them and went on to besiege and conquer Miletus. Again Greek bickering helped him during his march to Athens, but the Athenians, rallying and with a few Plataeans, successfully engaged the forces of Darius at Marathon, on September 14, 450 B.C. The Persians were driven back with a loss of 6,400 dead. The Athenians lost only 192 in the battle.

Book VII, named after Polymnia, Muse of the Sublime Hymn, tells in considerable detail how Darius prepared to revenge his defeat. Fate delayed him; rebellious Egypt sidetracked him, and death ended all his plans. The uncertain Xerxes, succeeding his father to the throne, undertook the Egyptian campaign. After a quick victory, at the head of twenty thousand soldiers he marched on Athens. It took seven days for his army to cross the Hellespont bridge, erected by his engineers, and he, reviewing them, lamented that none would be alive a hundred years hence.

Many Greek cities were quick to surrender. Only Athens, as Herodotus boasts, dared confront the host of Xerxes. Themistocles interpreted the oracle's counsel to defend the city with "wooden walls" as advice to use the two hundred war ships originally built for an attack on Egypt. Nature, however, provided a better defense in an east wind that wrecked four hundred Persian galleys along with uncounted transports and provision carriers. However, neither armed forces nor natural obstacles halted Xerxes' army until it reached the Pass of Thermopylae. There, for a day, the Athenians and Spartans checked the Persian host until a traitor revealed another path to the invader. The next day the Persians were again on the march, leaving all the defenders and twenty thousand of their own troops dead behind them.

In Book VIII, titled Urania, there is an account of Xerxes' march into Athens and the firing of the Acropolis. But the "wooden walls" of the Athenian fleet were victorious at Salamis on September 20, 480 B.C. Winner of the greatest glory was the Persian queen Artemis, who used the confusion of battle to get revenge on another Persian by ramming and sinking his ship. Because Xerxes thought she was attacking an enemy and the Athenians believed she had changed loyalties, everybody lauded her.

Fearing that the Greeks might sail on to destroy his bridge, Xerxes ordered a retreat. From the Asian mainland he sent demands for a peace treaty, promptly refused by both Athens and Sparta.

Callopie is the Muse presiding over Book IX. Here the account tells how Mardonios renewed the attack against the Greeks in the hope of sending word of victory back to Xerxes in Sardis. Though temporarily checked by the Thebans, he again entered Athens, whose citizens had fled to Salamis to assemble their allies. When they marched back, Mardonios burned what was left of Athens and retreated.

Except for cavalry skirmishes, neither side wanted to engage in battle until the sacrifices were propitious, but Mardonios patience broke first, and he fell into a trap at Plataea, where he was killed and his army routed. There were twenty thousand Persian and Boeotian casualties against ninety one Spartans and fifty two Athenians killed.

At Thermopylae, Leonidas the Spartan king, had been crucified and headed by the Persians. Certain Greeks wanted to dishonor Mardonios in the same way, but they were told that dishonoring a dead enemy was worthy only of barbarians. Some of the fleeing Persians were pursued and killed at Mycale. Their defeat ended Xerxes' ambitious plan to crush the Hellenes.

Modern historians have honored Herodotus by translating his history into English. Littlebury's version (1709) is outstanding in style, but reveals the writer's imperfect knowledge of Greek. George Rawlinson translated the work in 1858. The most satisfactory translation is the two volume work published by G. C. Macaulay in 1890.

YAJIROBEI (YAJI), a picaresque traveler

KITAHACHI (KITA), his companion

The first of this series, which was published in eight sections, was titled in various ways, the common part being Hiza korige (literally, "Knee chestnut horse"), usually translated as Shank's Mare. The publication dates of these sections are (1) 1802, (2) 1803, (3) in two volumes, 1803, (4) in two volumes, 1805, (5) in two volumes and a supplement in one volume, 1806, (6) in two volumes, 1807, (7) in two volumes, 1808, and (8) in three volumes, 1809. The Prologue, in one volume, was published in 1814.

This work was so popular that it is supposed to have raised the price of paper in the city of Edo, now Tokyo, where it was first published. Ikku's important contribution to Japanese literature through this work was the creation of a fresh type of popular literature—the comic novel. Travel accounts had been written ever since the tenth century, but these early models extolled the beauties of nature, emphasized poetry, and appealed to readers among the educated aristocracy. Ikku turned this form into a popular one for the commoner.

The use of two traveling companions was by no means a new device, but whereas in previous works they were merely mechanical and shadowy, Ikku's two characters are robustly alive. They are not even the better educated, more refined of the commoners living and working in the bustling streets of Edo, but deliberately chosen stereotypes of the lower classed Edoite: exuberant, emotional, quick to anger and as quick to forget, with little strength of character to resist temptation, whose wit and skills are untrained but yet knowing and shrewd with a shallow wisdom. By making these two characters fall into predicaments of their own making, Ikku created a broad humor, often bawdy but always good, a humor that was mirth provoking without the sting of satire.

The story line is extremely simple, the treatment episodic. In downtown Edo there lived one Yajirobei, called Yaji for short. He had been born into a merchant family of some means in the town of Fuchu, in the province of Suruga (Ikku's own birthplace), but indulgence in worldly pleasures involving women and wine had greatly reduced his circumstances. Taking with him an actor named Hana no suke (which in modern idiom might be translated "Schnozzola"), later renamed Kitahachi, or Kita for short, whom he patronized, Yaji had come to live in Edo. For a time he sent Kita out in servitude, but the poverty of such circumstances proved boring and any way, Kita was soon discharged. Yaji then sold the belongings he still possessed and with the proceeds set out with Kita on an extended journey. The route they chose was the Eastern Sea Circuit (Tôkai dô), extending from Edo to Kyoto, including a trip to Japan's holy Great Shrine of Ise, and ending in the commercial city of Osaka.

Ikku himself had made the same trip

Using material from his own experience, perhaps, he added episodes and occurrences of which he had only heard, and he was not above using material found in the Kyôgen, those comic interludes performed in programs of the Nô drama, some almost in their entirety, others only thinly disguised. These episodes introduce the reader to particular places of interest along the Eastern Sea Circuit, and each ends with a line or two of humorous verse which greatly points up the humor. This humor is also expressed in play on words, puns, and the clever use of pivotal words joining one phrase to the next. The work has been translated into French and into English. An English translation by Thomas Satchell is titled Hizakurige (Tokaido Circuit) (Kobe, Chronicle Press, 1929). One section of this translation is included in Donald Keene's Anthology of Japanese Literature (New York, 1955).

The twelve parts of the Zoku Hizakurige (Shank's Mare, Continued) were published under various titles, each applicable to the part which it represented. Only Parts 11 and 12 contain the title Zoku Hizakurige. Each part is in two volumes, with the exception of Part 12, which was published in three volumes. The publication dates were (1) 1810, (2) 1811, (3) 1812, (4) 1813, (5) 1814, (6) 1815, (7) and (8) 1816, (9) 1819, (10) 1820, (11) 1821, and (12) 1822. This work has not yet been translated.

In Ikku's sequel, the two companions go to the island of Shikoku to worship at the Kômpira Shrine, back to Honshu to visit Miyajima, then eastward over the back way, the Kiso Road, to Zenkôji in Shinano Province, on to the famous Kusatsu Hot Springs, and finally back to Edo. The style and the format of the continuation remain the same as in the original series.

Jean Cocteau, a playwright, stage designer, painter film director and poet, has been one of the most influential figures in the Paris art world in this century. In this psychological fantasy (Les Enfants terribles) he has drawn much on Freudian imagery and the book is, like his films, informed by romantic imagination. Written with great insight, it is a compassionate account of the creativity and destructiveness of adolescence. The snow scenes at the beginning and the end of the novel provide an image of insulation from the familiar world and of the results of isolation that such alienation may produce.

The Story

Paul and Elisabeth lived with their paralyzed mother in an old quarter of Paris. They lived as though in a world of vegetable instinct, dissociated from adults by passivity, imagination, and secret, mysterious rites.

One night, when the quarter was transformed by snow, Paul was wandering among the snowballing groups in search of the school hero Dargelos, whom he worshiped. Dargelos, who possessed great charm, was both vicious and beautiful. As Paul moved toward him, Dargelos, perhaps accidentally, knocked him down with a stone packed snowball. Although he injured Paul, he escaped immediate punishment but was later expelled from the school. Paul was taken home by Gerard who loved him as much for his weakness as Paul loved Dargelos for his strength. Elisabeth was extremely angry with them when they reached Paul's home. She was then sixteen, two years older than Paul and utterly absorbed by him. She was frequently transported by fury when he appeared to be leaving her sphere of influence.

The three children went into the Room where Paul and Elisabeth ate, slept, read, fought, and played the Game. That Room was the sole maternal reality in their lives: the Game, their inner world. The Room existed in an established chaos of boxes, clothes, papers, and books. Paul left it only for school and Elisabeth only to look after their mother or to buy magazines. Essentially the Game was daydreaming, a willed withdrawal to an imaginary world of submerged consciousness.

After Elisabeth had sent Gérard away, she undressed Paul and put him to bed. Their doctor decided that Paul was unfit to return to school, a decision which plunged Paul into despair until he learned of Dargelos' expulsion. After that school held no interest for him.

The Room held hidden treasures, the artifacts of their unconscious minds—keys, marbles, aspirin bottles—and when

Gérard told Paul that Dargelos had disappeared, a photograph of him dressed as Athalie was added to the collection

The mother died suddenly When Paul and Elisabeth saw her, rigid and transfixed in her chair, staring forward, the picture haunted them it was the one they retained The mother's nurse, Mariette, remained in the household, content to care for and love Paul and Elisabeth without altering them

Now an accepted visitor in the Room, Gérard was aware of the almost tangible tension, expressed in fights, recriminations, and reconciliations, between the two When Paul was well enough, Elisabeth, surprisingly, accepted an invitation from Gerard's uncle to take a holiday by the sea On the journey she watched Paul while he was sleeping and was disgusted by the air of weakness which his illness had accentuated She decided to remold him on her own lines

Once by the sea, they established a Room as much like their own as possible Paul gained strength under Elisabeth's tutelage, in part through stealing useless objects from local shops while on raids that she had planned Their booty formed a treasure imitating that in the Paris Room

When they returned to Paris, Elisabeth was suddenly aware that Paul had outstripped her and that she had become the subordinate party in their relationship Paul spent his evenings wandering around Montmartre, watching girls drinking, and finally meeting Gérard and bringing him home for the night On these occasions Elisabeth would use him as a means of tormenting Paul The first time she succeeded in rousing her brother came when she declared that she too would go into the world Her position, she felt, had become untenable, and she subsequently obtained work as a mannequin This act enraged Paul, who declared that she was prostituting herself, she thought the same about his nightly excursions

where she worked Elisabeth met Agatha, an orphan whose parents, drug addicts, had committed suicide For Agatha she felt, for the first time, warm affection, but the girl's introduction to the Room precipitated Paul's and Elisabeth's destruction when Agatha became devoted to Paul The photograph revealed a startling likeness between Dargelos and Agatha, and Paul enthralled her as he had been in thrall to Dargelos Agatha felt at home in the Room, but at the same time she recognized the strange, dreamlike existence her friends led

As they matured, the Game failed to absorb Paul and Elisabeth completely This situation so distressed Elisabeth that when she met Michael, an American friend of Gérard, she transferred her dream life to him Paul was excluded from this friendship with Michael, but his anger at learning of it evaporated when he discovered that Michael wanted to marry Elisabeth and not, as he had subconsciously feared, Agatha Elisabeth did marry Michael, but true to Gérard's vision of her the marriage was never consummated Michael was killed while driving alone in his sports car a few hours after the wedding

Elisabeth inherited his fortune and his Paris house, into which the four moved Lonely and disoriented in separate rooms, they gravitated to the Room that Paul finally established in the dining hall Their lives moved slowly to a climax from the moment that Paul realized he was in love with Agatha Afraid to tell each other of their love, they each told Elisabeth Terrified that Paul might leave her, Elisabeth moved tirelessly between them all one night to dissuade them from marrying Lying, she told Paul that it was Gerard whom Agatha loved, and told Agatha that Paul was too selfish ever to love anyone She also convinced Gérard that by friendship he had won Agatha's love and that it was his duty to marry her Elisabeth was so dedicated to the idea of possessing Paul and so trusted by the others that she succeeded completely in her scheme

A short time after his marriage to Agatha, Gérard met Dargelos. The former schoolmate sent Paul a gift, part of his collection of poisons. Paul and Elisabeth were delighted with the present which, to Agatha's horror, was added to the treasure.

Weeks later when Paris was again covered in snow, Elisabeth dreamed that Paul was dead. She woke to find Agatha at the door. Agatha was convinced Paul had killed himself; she had received a letter from him threatening suicide. They ran to the Room and found Paul choking in poison fumes which filled the screened-in corner where he lay. Although he could barely speak, with Agatha he reconstructed Elisabeth's scheme. When he cursed her, she felt that her heart had died. After admitting her guilt and jealousy, she snatched a revolver, by that violent act she was able to regain their attention and thus to captivate Paul once more. Elisabeth worked to charm him back into their world of the Room and the Game, far from Agatha, who seemed less real to him than the snowstorm outside. The two women watched each other until Paul fell back exhausted. Thinking him dead, Elisabeth shot herself. Crashing against the screens, she destroyed the Room and let in the enemy world. Paul saw visions of snowballers crowding the windows, watching as he died. Theirs was the tragedy of outcasts who, unaware that they lived on borrowed time, died fighting for their private existence.

Critique

This is a minor play by one of the minor Elizabethan dramatists. Thomas Dekker was an extremely prolific writer, working often in collaboration with other playwrights. From a passage in Henslowe's diary, it is known that Middleton had a hand in Part One of this play, but scholars are uncertain as to the precise amount that he contributed. The main plot, as will be seen, has a strangely inverted resemblance to that of Romeo and Juliet, while the subplot, although the scene is laid in Milan, gives a realistic glimpse of London shop life of that time. Both plots are, by modern standards, exaggerated and improbable. Lamb found the play "offensively crowded" with dialogues against the harlot's profession; the reader of today, however, will not be shocked. Rather, unless he is a specialist in Elizabethan drama, he is likely to be bored, and he will hardly agree with Hazlitt that the "contrivance" of the main plot is "affecting and romantic."

The Story

In Milan, at the funeral of Infelice, daughter of Duke Gasparo, Count Hippolito refused to be restrained by his friend Matheo. Frantic with grief over the death of his beloved, he accused her father of having killed her. After a violent altercation between the two noblemen, the hearse was borne off. In Milan, also, Viola's brother, Fustigo, had returned from sea, to find his sister married to Candido, a linen draper, and unhappy because her husband was such a model of patience and good temper. In order to make Candido angry, Viola proposed to Fustigo—whom Candido had never seen—that he pretend to be her lover, and this plan was agreed upon.

In the meantime, at the ducal palace, it was revealed that Infelice's death was only a trick produced by a sleeping potion administered at her father's command. Duke Gasparo admitted that Hippolito was a noble youth whom he would have welcomed as a son-in-law had it not been for a feud between the two families, he had, however, devised the stratagem of her supposed death to break up the love affair between her and the young count. When Infelice awoke, her father told her that Hippolito was dead. He then ordered her to go to Bergamo in order that she might recover from her grief. After she had gone, the duke's physician offered to poison Hippolito and thus relieve the duke's mind forever of the fear of a reunion of the lovers. To this plan the cold-blooded duke assented.

Meanwhile a merry group of Milanese gallants, planning a trick to try the famous patience of Candido, went to his shop and examined his wares, particularly a bolt of lawn at eighteen shillings the yard. When asked the length desired, one of them ordered only a pennyworth and insisted that it be cut from the middle of the piece, thereby ruining the entire bolt. To this fantastic order Candido acceded, to the fury of his wife. But the unruffled Candido served the gallants with wine and even remained calm when one of them walked off with a silver gilt beaker. He quietly sent for the constable, got his goblet returned, and then invited the gentlemen to dinner.

After the dinner the gentlemen went to the house of a harlot named Bellafront, where they were joined by Hippolito and Matheo. Count Hippolito had never visited the house before and, still in a melancholy mood, he left after a few moments. When he returned to fetch Matheo, he found all the gentlemen gone and Bellafront alone. She immediately fell in love with him, but all she got in return was a long diatribe on the evils of prostitution. Repulsed, she tried to stab herself but was prevented by Hippolito, whose love she vowed to win at any cost.

The attempts to break the patience of Candido continued, as Fustigo put into execution the plan of pretending to be Viola's lover. But the trick miscarried. Candido refused to be offended by his wife's behavior. His loyal apprentices, not knowing the true situation, gave Fustigo a thorough drubbing. Next, the baffled Viola locked up his formal gown, so that, when he was summoned to a meeting of the city Senate, he lacked the proper clothes to wear. But the imperturbable Candido fashioned a gown out of a tablecloth. Wearing this and with a nightcap on his head, he went to the meeting.

Meanwhile Bellafront, chastened by her love for Hippolito, had resolved to give up her shameless life, and so had turned all the gallants out of her house. Her first seducer had been Matheo, who ironically told her that an honest whore is an impossibility. Still determined to win Hippolito's love, Bellafront gained entrance to his house in the disguise of a page. There she found the count gazing at a picture of the supposedly dead Infelice. When Bellafront revealed her identity, he rudely repulsed her again, and she resolved to leave Milan. As she left the house, Hippolito received a note from the duke's physician asking for an interview

During these events, the drubbed Fusigo had hired two bullies to take revenge upon Candido's apprentices. Viola had ordered one apprentice to dress in his master's clothes, but again Candido, who returned still wearing the tablecloth, refused to take offense and merely changed his own clothes for those of an apprentice. Just as his wife was declaring him insane, the two bullies entered, seeing Candido in the distinctive garb of an apprentice, they started to beat the poor old man. Again the faithful apprentices came to the rescue, but Candido would not let them hurt his assailants. However, Viola entered with two officers and, under the pretext that Candido was mad, had him bound and carried off to Bethlem Monastery—that is, to the London insane asylum. He meekly submitted.

In the meantime the physician informed Duke Gasparo that he had poisoned Hippolito, but he also warned his master that, having done this deed for gold, he might well be hired to poison the duke. Duke Gasparo instantly banished him with the curt statement that rulers often hate the man by whom their plots are carried out. As soon as he was alone the doctor revealed the true situation: he had not poisoned Count Hippolito. He also informed the count of Infelice's feigned death and promised to bring the lovers together in the chapel of Bethlem Monastery, where they could be married.

Viola, beginning to feel that she had gone too far in her efforts to vex her husband, had repaired to Duke Gasparo's palace to seek a warrant releasing

Candido from the madhouse. Unfortunately, just as the duke was about to sign the order for the linen draper's release, a courier brought the news that Hippolito was not dead and that he and Infelice were to meet at the monastery that afternoon for their marriage. Matheo had carelessly revealed the secret. In a desperate attempt to foil the lovers, Duke Gasparo and his courtiers rode in disguise to the monastery, leaving Viola's warrant unsigned.

Hippolito and Infelice had already arrived at the monastery and were planning to be married that evening. When Matheo arrived with the news that the duke had learned of their intention and was on his way to prevent the wedding, the friar who was to marry them promised to perform the ceremony and to get them out of the building disguised as monks. They were hurried out of sight just as the duke and his followers arrived. The situation became one of great confusion. Bellafront entered, having come to the monastery earlier in the day under pretext of madness. The disguised lovers also came into the room where the duke was, as did Viola, her servant, and Candido. When the various disguises had been thrown off, the duke suddenly relented, forgave Infelice and Hippolito, permitted their marriage, and gave justice to Bellafront by marrying her to Matheo, the man who had first seduced her. Even Viola knelt to ask Candido's forgiveness for the vexations that she had subjected him to. Patient to the end, he forgave her and then delivered to the assembly a long harangue on patience as the greatest of all virtues.

Critique

Part One of The Honest Whore must have been successful on the stage, for Dekker very quickly followed it with a sequel, written entirely by himself. He was obviously endeavoring to capitalize on features of the first play, since in the second part he used all the principal characters save one and continued the subplot of the patient Candido. He ended with a scene in Bridewell, a London prison of his time, to balance the Bethlem Scene in Part One. He also continued the high moral tone of the earlier play, this time, however, making gambling as well as prostitution the object of his strictures. The new character of Friscobaldo, the outwardly stern yet inwardly forgiving father, was extravagantly admired by Hazlitt, and both he and Ernest Rhys considered Part Two superior to Part One. The modern reader will perhaps find that some of the freshness of Part One has worn off and feel that Dekker tried to carry a good thing a bit too far.

The Story

One day Bellafront, a former prostitute now married to Matheo, the former friend of Count Hippolito, arrived at that nobleman's house with a petition. Her husband had killed a man, but it was in fair fight and the man a notorious villain. Still, Matheo has been condemned to death. Hippolito, who was about to ride out with his wife Infelice, stayed behind to hear the petition. He took the opportunity to remind Bellafront of their old relationship and promised to help Matheo to a pardon and, if possible, to reconcile her with her unforgiving father. But it was significant that Count Hippolito showed much more interest in Bellafront than she in him.

Meanwhile, at the palace of Duke Gasparo, father of Infelice, the courtiers were talking of the marriage of Candido, an old linen draper still famous in Milan for his patience. Viola had died, and, to the mystification of the gallants, Candido was marrying a young girl. Just as they had decided to attend the wedding feast, Hippolito entered, followed shortly by Orlando Friscobaldo, Bellafront's estranged father. Their meeting gave Hippolito an opportunity to ask the old man about his daughter. Friscobaldo declared that he had not seen her for seventeen years, that her disgrace had been so great that he no longer considered her his child. But when Hippolito had left, with the parting remark that Bellafront was in dire poverty, the father relented and resolved to rescue his daughter. To this end, he put on the livery of a servant and, thus disguised, went to find his offspring.

At the same time, the wedding of the widowed Candido was taking place, attended by some of the gallants of the city who wished to see what sort of bride the old man had chosen. The first impression was unfavorable when the bride was handed the wedding goblet, she broke the glass and refused to drink. Candido was as patient as ever, but he did consent to allow a nobleman to disguise himself as an apprentice so that the disguised man might try to cure the bride of her peevishness. The courtiers did not wish to see Candido saddled with another shrew.

Thanks to Hippolito, Matheo had been released from prison and had, somewhat unconvincingly, promised his wife to reform and give up gambling. When Friscobaldo arrived, disguised as a servant, he pretended to be an old family retainer discharged by Bellafront's father. He asked Matheo for a place in his household and insisted on turning over to the latter, for safe keeping, what he claimed to be his life's savings—twenty pounds. His offer was enthusiastically accepted by Matheo, who took the opportunity to abuse his father-in-law. The outburst was interrupted by the arrival of Hippolito, come ostensibly to congratulate Matheo but in reality to pursue his wooing of Bellafront. He had already sent her gifts, he now left her a purse. To the delight of her disguised father—who was to convey the purse—she rejected all the gifts and resolved to remain honest.

Meanwhile a rather labored trick was being played at Candido's shop. The nobleman, disguised as an apprentice, arrived as if looking for work. The bride refused to prepare a room for him, whereupon Candido took the unusual step of vowing to tame her. He picked up a yardstick, she armed herself with the longer ell wand but before they could come to blows, the bride asked forgiveness and delivered a speech on the proper obedience of wives.

In the interest of saving his daughter from Hippolito's advances, Friscobaldo went to the count's house and revealed to Infelice her husband's infidelity, surrendering to her the gifts sent to Bellafront. When Hippolito returned, Infelice was able to play a neat trick upon him. Kneeling, she made a mock confession of having committed adultery with a servant. The enraged husband delivered a tirade on unfaithful wives, thus giving Infelice the opportunity to turn his own words against him as she displayed the gifts he had sent Bellafront. But her just reproaches succeeded only in making her husband the more determined to pursue his illicit passion.

In the household of Matheo, affairs were going from bad to worse. That unlucky gamester had lost everything at dice, including the money entrusted to him by his feigned servant, so, reduced to nothing, he pawned his wife's clothes and hinted strongly that he would be pleased if she would return to her former profession so as to gain a few ducats. He was, however, temporarily rescued by a friend, who promised to give him both money and clothes fashionable for a gentleman.

Candido's troubles, also, were continuing. Two disreputable characters, Mrs. Horseleech, a bawd, and Botts, a pander, had designs upon his new wife and tried to seduce her for one of their customers, but the plot broke against her honesty. While these events were taking place, Matheo had received his new clothes and was happily showing them to his wife. In the midst of Matheo's display old Friscobaldo appeared, this time in his own person, to be recognized by Bellafront, who asked his forgiveness. The father startled Matheo by his knowledge of the latter's shady dealings and then left in pretended anger, vowing that he would let the couple starve. While Bellafront and Matheo were quarreling, the father returned in his servant's disguise to hear Matheo's very garbled account of what had just happened and his proposal that they rob Friscobaldo's house. The disguised old man agreed to the plan.

After they had left the house, Bellafront appeared with Hippolito, who was still intent on his wooing. A long debate ensued between them, Hippolito urging his suit and Bellafront describing the miseries of a harlot's life. When she repulsed his advances, he swore to continue until he had succeeded. In the meantime, Friscobaldo had been revealing to Duke Gasparo the villainy of Matheo. The duke agreed to aid the plot of catching Matheo in the robbery and also resolved to cure Hippolito by purging Milan of harlots by imposing such strict laws that

Hippolito would be afraid to approach a prostitute, no matter how fair she might be

The young Milanese gallants, never tired of trying to vex the patient Candido, met at Matheo's house to plan another trick Matheo suggested that, as a bait, he should offer to sell Candido some lawn, thus accomplishing two purposes at once, for he had stolen the lawn from two supposed peddlers—actually men hired by Friscobaldo Candido arrived and was persuaded to drink a glass of wine At that moment the constable entered to arrest Matheo for theft and Candido for receiving stolen goods Both were taken to Bridewell prison, along with Mrs Horseleech and Botts, who had been present during the episode Duke Gasparo, attended by his court, arrived at the prison to administer justice Hippolito came also, having heard that Bellafront had been arrested in the wholesale sweep of the harlots of Milan At the trial Matheo's real baseness was revealed he boldly admitted the robbery but claimed that his wife had inspired it, when this charge was disproved by the disguised Friscobaldo, he accused Bellafront of being a whore and swore that he had found her in bed with Hippolito To this accusation, Infelice, in order to prolong the stratagem, added that Bellafront had accepted presents from Hippolito In the midst of these charges and countercharges Friscobaldo at last threw off his disguise and proclaimed his daughter's innocence and Matheo's villainy All ended happily when, at Bellafront's petition, her unworthy husband was pardoned, Hippolito and his wife were reconciled, and Candido was shown to have been the victim of a cruel joke

After the controversy which raged over The Cid (1636), an extravagant heroic drama, Corneille turned to Livy for his inspiration In Horace, a tightly constructed play which rigorously followed dramatic precepts, he succeeded in producing a patriotic drama both popular with the audience and acceptable to the critics

The Story

Although formerly united by ties of patriotism and blood, for Alba was the birthplace of the founders of Rome, Romulus and Remus, the cities of Rome and Alba were at war Sabine, the wife of Horace, was divided in her loyalties between the city of her birth, where her brothers still lived, and the city of her famous warrior husband The battle was to be decided by armed combat between three heroes from each side Sabine drew little comfort from the resolution, which meant the defeat either of her kinsman or of her husband Camille, the betrothed of Curiace, the Alban warrior-brother of Sabine, felt her loyalties divided between her loved one and her brother Horace Even though the oracles had been favorable toward her coming marriage, her dreams envisioned the imminent horror

The battle postponed, Curiace visited Camille at the home of Old Horace, her father He declared his abiding love for her, though he remained an Alban patriot, loyal to his city They commented on the oracles and wished for a lasting peace When the two warriors met, however, Horace was insistent on the outcome of the trial by combat Curiace, who stressed the need for peaceful understanding, was dismayed to hear that his prospective brothers-in-law, Horace and his two brothers, were to represent the Romans He was even more oppressed in spirit when a messenger announced that he and his two brothers were to defend the honor of Alba

Horace wanted no sympathy from Curiace, though he bore him no ill will Curiace saw love of wife and family as paramount over Horace's kind of patriotism

Horace then gave the lovers a moment together before the debt of honor was to be paid Camille, mindful of the fact that she was the daughter and the sister of famous warriors, denounced the patriotism that could make her choose between love of family and of her future husband She begged Curiace to avoid a battle which could only end in tragedy, no matter what the outcome His first duty, however, was to his country, and he brutally asserted this fact Sabine and Camille then begged the cause of love of home and family, while Horace and Curiace defended honor and patriotism The women were unsuccessful in their suit, and Old Horace comforted them as the young men went off to prepare for the combat Young Horace, loving to his sister and kind to his aged parent, sought glory in battle, Curiace, no less patriotic, felt that he had lost wife, brothers, and brothers-in-law by a grim turn of fate

Sabine, given at first to confusion and later to bitterness, lamented her sad position as the sister of the Alban warriors and the wife of their adversary When she inquired of her friend Julie whether her husband or her brothers had been vanquished, she was told that no resolution had been reached, the king had just then arranged the combatants and charged them to fight to the death, that the fate of the two principalities might be determined Camille, wearied by her solitary wonderings and fears, joined the discussion She renounced the deceptive oracle, and neither the wife nor the prospective bride could find solace for their anxiety and grief Sabine declared that a wife was the most bereaved, to which Camille replied that her sister-in-law had never been in love For the moment the controversy was resolved by Old Horace, who declared that Rome suffered most all else was in the hands of the gods

Julie then brought word that the Alban brothers had been victorious, that two of Old Horace's sons were dead, and that Horace had fled the battlefield The old man was appalled that his son could see his brothers die without drawing new courage from such defeat and either go down to death or glory Camille felt some relief that both her lover and brother were for the moment spared, and Sabine was content that her husband was alive Old Horace could share none of these sentiments his loyalties were for honor, country, manliness

Valère, dispatched by Tulle to bring comfort to Old Horace, told of the outcome of the battle He said that Horace had retreated as a ruse in order to attack the Albans at a disadvantage and that he had killed all three The old man, his alchemy, "sympathetic" medicine, and other pseudo sciences were presented in such fashion as to show the readers of his time the absurdity of practices and practitioners alike To Hudibras can be ascribed little organization, the best qualities of the poems lie in isolated passages devoted to the satire

Sir Hudibras, a Presbyterian knight, was one of those who had ridden out against the monarchy during the civil war He was a proud man, one who bent his knee to nothing but chivalry and suffered no blow but that which had been given when he was dubbed a knight Although he had some wit, he was very shy of displaying it He knew Latin, Greek, and Hebrew indeed, his talk was a kind of piebald dialect, so heavily was it larded with Greek and Latin words and tags He was learned in rhetoric, logic, and mathematics, and he frequently spoke in a manner demonstrating his learning His notions fitted things so well that he was often puzzled to decide what his notions were and what was reality

In figure he was thick and stout, both before and behind, and he always carried extra victuals in his hose He rode a mealy mouthed, wall eyed, skinny old nag whose tail dragged in the dust, and he encouraged his horse with a single old spur

Sir Hudibras had a squire named Ralpho, who was an Independent in religion—a fact which accounted for his partisanship and dogmatic approach to the many discussions and arguments he had with his master on matters of faith Ralpho was a tailor by trade, but his belief in the efficacy of divine revelation to the individual had made him something of a religious oracle, at least in his own satisfied opinion

Sir Hudibras and Ralpho rode forth from the knight's home to reform what they called sins and what the rest of the world regarded as mild amusement After they had gone a few miles on their journey they came to a town where the people danced enjoyably to a fiddle and worse in Sir Hudibras' eyes, indulged themselves in the sport of bearbaiting To the knight's resolve to end these activities Ralpho added his agreement that they were certainly unchristian When the knight advanced, however, he was met by an unsympathetic crowd With the rabble were several leaders One was Crowdero, a fiddler with one wooden leg, who played his instrument for the mob in the absence of more martial fifes and drums Another leader was Orsin, the bear keeper, who led his charge at the end of a rope fastened to the creature's nose Talgol, a butcher, was also in the van, as was a woman named Trulla, an Amazon of a damsel When Sir Hudibras called upon the people to disperse and return quietly to their homes, leaving Crowdero a prisoner, a fight began

Ralpho was soon bucked off his horse when some one put a burr under the animal's tail Sir Hudibras, pulled from his steed fell on the bear, who became enraged and escaped from his keeper The bear's escape scattered the crowd and Crowdero was left behind, the prisoner of Sir Hudibras and Ralpho, for the fiddler's wooden leg had been broken in the melee Having swooned from fear Hudibras also lay helpless for a time, but he was soon revived by Ralpho The pair took their prisoner to the end of the town and placed his good leg in the stocks They hung his fiddle, bow, and case above the stocks as a trophy of victory

The people who had been dispersed by the enraged bear, overcoming their fright, planned to attack the knight and release his victim Hudibras and Ralpho sallied out of their quarters to the attack A blow on Ralpho's horse caused the animal to unhorse his rider Hudibras, at first frightened, summoned his courage and charged The crowd dispersed once again, and Hudibras went to the aid of his squire When the knight's back was turned, Trulla attacked him from behind and quickly overpowered him. Rejoined by her friends, the woman marched Hudibras to the stocks to take the place of Crowdero. Placed in the stocks, Hudibras and Ralpho discussed and argued their situation and what had occasioned it. Then a widow who had heard of the knight's plight came to see him in the stocks. After much discussion, she agreed to have Hudibras set free if he would consent to a whipping. He agreed to the condition and was released.

Sir Hudibras, once out of the stocks, was reluctant to keep the bargain he had made. He was anxious for her hand, too, but for her money rather than her love. Hudibras and Ralpho argued long about flagellation. Hudibras suggested that the whipping be administered to Ralpho, as a proxy for the knight. Ralpho refused and an argument ensued. When the two were almost at swords' points, they heard a terrible din. They looked about and saw coming down the road, a party of people making a noisy to-do over a poor man who had let his wife take over his authority. Sir Hudibras tried to break up the crowd, but a volley of rotten eggs and other filth defeated him and cooled his ardor for reform. The knight, going to clean himself after his most recent encounter with sin, decided to lie to the widow about having received a whipping.

Before approaching the widow's house, Sir Hudibras went to consult Sidrophel, an astrologer. Hudibras and Ralpho agreed that a godly man might reasonably consult with such a man if he were on a Christian errand. Hudibras, soon convinced that Sidrophel and his apprentice, Whachum, were frauds, perhaps dabblers with the devil, sent Ralpho off to find a constable. Meanwhile, Hudibras overcame the pair and went through the astrologer's belongings. Instead of going for a constable, however, Ralpho decided to go to the widow. He was afraid that the authorities might think Hudibras involved in black magic.

Ralpho, telling all to the widow, revealed that Hudibras was going to lie about having received a whipping and that he was only after the widow's money. When Hudibras arrived a short time later, the widow hid Ralpho and let the knight tell his long string of half truths and lies. The widow, knowing the truth, treated him to a somewhat frightening masquerade, with Ralpho as the chief sprite. Hudibras and the squire decided to escape before worse could happen to them. They went hugging mugger through a window and escaped on their saddleless horses.

The poet then turned in the last part of the poem to talk directly about the religious groups for which Ralpho and Hudibras stood—the Independents and the Presbyterians—and how they had fallen out with one another after the end of the Civil War and had eventually, in their weakness, paved the way for the Restoration of the Stuart line in the person of Charles II.

Critique

In this lengthy example of medieval French verse romance, we see a chanson de geste—a “tale of a deed”—in a developed and perhaps impure form. The unknown author, thought to be a writer of the first half of the thirteenth century and perhaps a resident of the town of St. Omer, combines in a somewhat unified tale different sorts of materials. The events are supposed to take place late in the reign of Charlemagne, after the betrayal and defeat of Roland at Roncesvalles and therefore early in the ninth century. The Charlemagne of this poem bears a celebrated historical name but few of the attributes of the great king of the Dark Ages. He is petulant, suspicious, and ill advised in important decisions, the wisdom, temperance, and heroism of the historical figure is gone, and a fairy tale personage—an inferior King Lear—remains on his vacillating decisions. Much of the story rests. Although the imagination of the author of Huon de Bordeaux did respond to the actual social conditions of his time, he drew also on conventional but highly fanciful narrative materials to which any medieval story teller had access. Stories of the dwarf fairy king, Oberon, rise from both Celtic tale and Germanic story. Tales about the crusaders made available to the writer confused details about “paynim” countries that bulk large in the main portion of Huon's adventures, but it is plain to any reader that these details mask a very sketchy knowledge. In leaving France behind, the medieval rhymers left reality behind, and the extensive travels of the hero take us into realms as fantastic and nonexistent as those of Prester John.

The Story

King Charlemagne, grown old and wishing to relinquish the burden of government, summoned his court and consulted with his nobles to determine the succession to his throne. His plan was to abdicate in favor of his two sons, but the nobles of France were not willing to accept his favorite, Charlot, partly because of the young prince's association with Earl Amaury, kinsman of the infamous Ganelon who had betrayed Roland to his death. The earl, the partisan of Charlot, took the occasion to get revenge on the noble house of Guienne. His suggestion was that Charlot be given a province to govern before he took over the responsibilities of a state. It was called to Charlemagne's dotting attention—for the king had become violent and unreasonable in his judgments and punishments—that the two sons of the dead duke had not yet come to Paris to pay their respects and render homage. Earl Amaury's hope was to see them dispossessed and their lands given to Charlot.

Sent to conduct the heirs of the dead duke to Charlemagne's court, messengers discovered that what the king's wise adviser, Duke Naymes, had stated was indeed the case. The brothers, Huon and Gerard, had been too young to come to court before. The messengers, pleased with their reception by the duchess, the boys' mother, and with the manly bearing of young Huon of Bordeaux, the older son, returned with word that the young noblemen would soon follow them to swear fealty to the king.

Huon and Gerard set out on their journey to Paris, stopping on the way at the monastery of Cluny where their uncle was abbot. The noble churchman decided to accompany his nephews to Charlemagne's court.

In the meantime Charlot had been persuaded by Earl Amaury to ambush the boys and kill them. Because their lands were extensive and tempting, the prince agreed. But in the fray Charlot was killed when Huon struck him with his sword, severing the prince's helmet. In spite of the abbot's testimony, however, Charlemagne refused to believe that Huon had acted in self defense and without knowledge of his assailant's identity. In a trial by combat with Earl Amaury, Huon killed that wretched knight before he could gasp out, at death's verge, a true account of his villainy. Still unenlightened, the angry king sent Huon on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and also ordered him to kiss three times the beautiful Claramond, the daughter of Gawdis, Amir of Babylon, and to return with white hairs from the amir's beard and teeth from his mouth.

Obedient to Charlemagne's command, Huon parted company with his brother Gerard, in whose care he left his lands. Although there had been love between the brothers in the past, Gerard straight way became false to his trust and plotted great evil against his distant brother. For Huon's return was greatly delayed. Though fortune often favored him and provided him with kinsmen in odd corners of the world, the wicked paynims abused him, imprisoned him, and on many occasions carried him far from his destination. Gerames, a hermit, became his loyal follower after chance threw them together, and he was close at Huon's heels when the Christian knight kissed Claramond and got the teeth and the hair from the severed head of the amir after that ruler had received the bowstring from the dread Caliph of Arabia. Huon secreted the teeth and hair in the side of the hermit for safekeeping.

Huon was aided in his adventures by two gifts from Oberon, the dwarf king of the Otherworld, born of an ancient union between Julius Caesar and Morgan le Fay. Gerames, the wise hermit, had warned Huon not to speak to Oberon, but Huon, ignoring his advice, spoke to the dwarf and so won the protection of the white magic of that strange little creature. Huon was able to carry with him the gifts from Oberon. One was a cup that filled up at the sign of the cross and emptied when it was held in the hand of a wicked person. The other was a horn which Huon was supposed to blow to summon Oberon's help when grave danger threatened. Huon, like the boy who cried wolf in Aesop's fable, blew the horn too frequently, and Oberon was sometimes tempted not to respond. More over, Huon's dignity and prudence sometimes left him. Despite warnings, he embraced the lovely Claramond before they were married and so brought about an interminable separation, and he once imprudently allowed a giant to arm himself before a contest. But at last, with the combined help of the hermit and the fairy king, Huon and Claramond reached Rome, where their marriage was blessed by the Pope himself, who was the uncle of Huon.

On his return to France with his bride, Huon found that his brother was now his foe and that well wishers like Duke Naymes could not protect him from the anger and dotage of Charlemagne. But Oberon could. The fairy king made his appearance, humbled great Charlemagne, and saw to it that Huon and Claramond were secure in all their rights. Though Huon interceded for his brother's life and made the court weep by his display of generosity, Oberon was obdurate, and Gerard and his fellow conspirators were hanged. As a final favor, Huon was promised that he would someday inherit Oberon's kingdom.

Critique

Hyde Park, the second of Shirley's sprightly comedies, paved the way for the later Restoration drama. The play, honoring the opening of Hyde Park to the public by the first Earl of Holland, presented to the audience of that time interesting gaming talk as well as the manners of the fashionable world. Pepys reports that live horses were led across the stage in a production of Hyde Park some years after the playwright's death in the Great Fire of London. Though the play itself looks forward to a more sophisticated drama, it is still firmly based in the delightful fancies of Shakespeare, Jonson, and other Elizabethan and Jacobean playwrights, of whom Shirley was the last of note.

The Story

Because her husband, a merchant, had been missing for seven years, Mistress Bonavent had for some time considered a second marriage to Lacy, her persistent suitor. Mistress Carol, her cousin and companion, urged her not to give away so lightly the independence she had won. Mistress Carol herself swore never to marry, even though she carried on flirtations with Rider, Venture, and Fairfield. Rider and Venture, vying with each other for the lady's favor, had each given her a gift which she in turn presented to his rival. Comparing notes, they concluded that Fairfield must be the favored suitor.

Lacy, summoned by Mistress Bonavent's servant, felt certain that his suit was now successful. Into this confused arena of love arrived Lord Bonville, a sportsman who admired both horses and women, and Bonavent, disguised in order to find out what had happened during his absence.

Though Fairfield's overtures to Mistress Carol were rejected, Lacy's to Mistress Bonavent were accepted, and the wedding was set for that very morning. Mistress Carol told her cousin that she was acting rashly, no man being worth the candle.

Bonavent soon learned that the sound of merriment in his own house augured no good for that returned merchant who, held captive by a Turkish pirate, had only recently been ransomed. Lacy, perhaps too merry with wine and anticipation, bade the stranger welcome and asked, then demanded, that he dance with and, finally, for them. Bonavent's dancing was ridiculed, especially by sharp-tongued Mistress Carol. Lacy tried to make amends by inviting him to join additional revels in Hyde Park that very day

In the meantime Fairfield, despairing because of his love for Mistress Carol, said farewell to his sister Julietta and wished her well in her coming marriage to Jack Trier. But it was soon apparent to the young woman that her suitor was not in earnest in his avowals of love, for he introduced her to his friend Lord Bonville and then left them. Before his departure Trier had whispered in the lord's ear that he was in a sporting house and the lady was a person of easy virtue. As a woman of good breeding, and aware only that her fiancé had shown poor manners, Julietta invited Lord Bonville to accompany her to the park, an invitation which provided her betrothed with an opportunity to try her chastity.

When the two aggrieved lovers, Rider and Venture, appealed to Mistress Carol not to make sport of them by passing their gifts on to their rival, she declared that she had no interest in them and had always told them so, in their persistence, however, they had paid little attention to her. Fairfield, coming to say goodbye, first asked her to swear to one agreement without knowing what it was. Convinced at last that the agreement would not commit her to love, marry, or go to bed with him, she agreed, at his request she then swore never to desire his company again or to love him. The oath sealed with a kiss, he departed, leaving her in a state of consternation.

Julietta, courted by a baffled lord whose very propositions were turned into pleasantries, remained aloof from her still more baffled suitor, who could not determine how far the flirtation had gone in Hyde Park.

Still in disguise, Bonavent learned that Lacy and his wife were indeed married but that the marriage had not yet been consummated—to the pleasure of his informant, Mistress Carol, who by now was distressed by affection for the previously spurned Fairfield. She sent a message by Trier asking Fairfield to come to see her, but on his arrival she denied that she had sent for him. Fairfield, in turn offered to release her from her oath if she would have him, but she turned coquette and rejected his proposal. Consequently he refused to believe her when she protested that she now loved him.

Lord Bonville, torn between his desire to play what he thought was a sure thing and the horses which were a gamble, pushed his suit too far, and for his brashness received a lecture on titles and good breeding, a remonstrance which he took to heart.

The disconsolate Mistress Carol met Julietta, who informed the spurned one that Fairfield was as disconsolate as she. Mistress Carol then concocted a stragem at the expense of Venture, a poet, horseman, and singer. She goaded him into writing a poem on the lengths to which he would go for her love, and to this effusion she later affixed the name of Fairfield. Meanwhile, in Hyde Park, Bonavent hired a bagpipe and made the bridegroom dance to the tune of a sword at his legs, a return for the courtesy extended at the wedding festivities. In a note to his wife, the merchant informed her of his return but urged her to secrecy for the time being.

Mistress Carol, who now pretended to believe that Venture's hyperbole was a suicide note from Fairfield, summoned her recalcitrant suitor. Thinking that she was still making fun of him, he denied any intention of doing away with himself and in turn accused her of duplicity. He added that he would make himself a gelding so that women would no longer concern him—a threat more real to Mistress Carol than that of suicide. On the spot she abandoned all pride and proposed marriage to him. He immediately accepted.

Lord Bonville, having learned too late from Trier that he was the victim of a jealous lover, was accepted by Julietta as a worthy suitor, now that his thoughts were as lofty as his position in society.

Bonavent, to show himself unresentful, proposed a merry celebration and placed willow garlands on the heads of the disappointed lovers Trier, Lacy, Rider, and Venture He received the good wishes of Lacy and pledged himself to entertain the whole party at supper with tales of his captivity

All this, however, had been prophesied earlier in Hyde Park, when Lord Bonville and his Julietta, Fairfield and Mistress Carol, and Mr and Mistress Bonavent had heard the song of Philomel, the nightingale The others had heard only the cuckoo

IMAGINARY CONVERSATIONS

Type of work Dialogues

Author Walter Savage Landor (1775 1864)

First published 1824 1848

Landor once said, "Poetry was always my amusement, prose my study and business" When he was forty five, after having devoted many years to poetic composition, he began the Imaginary Conversations, and in this work he found the form best suited to the peculiar aim and direction of his art His poetry, although some of it attains a gem like perfection, suffers by comparison with the work of his more famous contemporaries While the major Romantic writers, with their emphasis on imagination, were bringing new life to poetry, Landor chose not to go beyond ideas that could be clearly grasped Thus his poetry lacks the emotional appeal necessary to the highest attainment in this form In prose writing, however, where clarity and restraint are more to be desired, Landor deserves consideration with the best of his age

By the very nature of his character Landor was drawn for guidance and inspiration to the classical tradition One side of his personality admired balance, moderation, and precision qualities admirably displayed in his writing The other side was irascible, impractical, and impulsive, these traits are revealed in some of his personal relationships Like Mozart, Landor appears to have found in his restrained and faultless art a counterpoise to his external world of turbulence

Landor was a true classicist, not a belated adherent of neo classicism with its emphasis on rules over substance He was rigorously trained in youth and continued his scholarly pursuits throughout his adult life His knowledge was no mere surface phenomenon, he was so immersed in the ancients that he took on their characteristic habits of thought Thus the volumes of the Imaginary Conversations not only make use of events and characters from the Greco Roman civilization, but are infused with classical ideals of clarity and precision in style and tough intellectualism in content

The Imaginary Conversations, written in five series, are grouped into classical dialogues, dialogues of sovereigns and statesmen, dialogues of literary men, dialogues of famous women, and miscellaneous dialogues The conversations, usually between two people, cover many centuries, ranging from the time of the Trojan War to Landor's own period, and they include people from many geographical areas Many of the scenes are based on suggestions from history or mythology, but the actual remarks of the individuals are never used Landor did not attempt to re create a sense of the past by use of artificial or archaic language He did, however, endeavor to represent faithfully the spirit of the age and the essential nature of the personage presented brilliant insights into human nature, his aim was not toward fully developed characters, but for abstractive idealizations. They are products not of observation directly reported but of observation especially that gained from reading, filtered through a long process of reflection. Never are the predilections of the author—his sympathies and his aversions—far from the surface.

The manly, heroic character is depicted in many of the dialogues. Two examples of this type are found in "Marcellus and Hannibal." History records the death of Marcellus in the Second Punic War and the respect paid him by Hannibal. Landor created a scene in which Marcellus survived long enough to converse with the Carthaginian leader. When the wounded Marcellus was brought to the camp, Hannibal made every effort to save his life and to make him comfortable. A contrast to Hannibal's chivalric behavior was provided by that of his ally, a Gallic chief who thought only of revenge and of glory to Gaul. Marcellus welcomed death as an escape from capture and politely declined Hannibal's request that Rome agree to a peace treaty. Although under great suffering, he avoided any outward expression of pain. In return for Hannibal's kindness, Marcellus presented him with a ring that might benefit him with the Romans, if his fortunes changed. As Marcellus was dying, the two men were more closely united by their common nobility and respect for nobility in others than were they divided by the exigencies of war.

Women of praiseworthy character are depicted in several of the conversations. In "Lady Lisle and Elizabeth Gaunt," Landor portrayed the remarkable idealism of two women who were condemned to death for sheltering adherents of Monmouth. They had acted through simple Christian charity. Confronted with a choice between the law of the king and the commandment of Jesus, they embraced the latter. Lady Lisle had no blame for the jury that under duress had convicted her. Elizabeth, serene about her own fate, felt sorrow for her companion. Betrayed by the very man she had concealed, she felt no anger toward him, but pitied him for his having to suffer a guilty conscience. Both viewed execution as the avenue to eternal bliss and wished that others might have their perfect serenity.

A more complex character study is found in "Oliver Cromwell and Walter Noble." Cromwell was controlled by conflicting emotions—ambition, pride, compassion, vindictiveness, humility, fear. In response to the practically irrefutable arguments of Noble against regicide, Cromwell constantly shifted position and even contradicted himself. As a last refuge, he justified his proposed action as the carrying out of God's will.

Although Landor sometimes used crucial situations as settings for his conversations, he seldom revealed character in truly dramatic fashion. His dialogues, unlike Browning's monologues, do not have a close causal relationship between the stresses of the moment and the disclosures of the speaker. Nor do Landor's speakers often reveal their inner natures unwittingly. While Browning's works are subtle and require reading between the lines, Landor's are direct and leave little to implication. In the treatment of characters with whom he was unsympathetic, Landor used an irony that is unmistakable, even too obvious at times.

In some of the dialogues, especially the long discursive ones, the characters are not important in themselves, but serve as vehicles for the ideas of the author. Not a systematic philosopher nor a highly original thinker, Landor was alive to the whole range of man's thought, past and present. A wise and judicious man, he expressed his opinions felicitously.

Love of freedom is a leading theme in the Imaginary Conversations. Fighters for liberty, such as Washington and Kosciuszko, who combined modesty with valor, evoked Landor's highest admiration. Equally fervid was his detestation of tyrants, as expressed, for example, in "Peter the Great and Alexis," a dialogue in which Peter, having failed to make his son as brutal as he, callously orders the boy's execution. Landor believed in a republican form of government and opposed pure democracy because of the corruption, intemperance, and anti-intellectualism that such a system fostered. His expression of political ideas seldom went beyond a statement of general principles.

Landor was often critical of religious leaders and he showed his antipathy to fanaticism in such dialogues as "Mahomet and Sergius" and "Melancthon and Calvin." Hypocrisy is attacked in other dialogues, such as "Fra Filippo Lippi and Pope Eugenius IV," which is, in part, a satire on the Pope, who makes an outward show of piety and displays great zeal in maintaining the forms of religion, but who is essentially a worldly and sensual man. Also, in this conversation the Christian spirited barbarians of Tunisia are, with heavy irony, contrasted with the barbaric Christians of Rome. Landor favored a simple religion that stayed close to its basic tenets. Believing in the limitation of human reason in such matters, he disliked dogmatism and theological quibbling.

His philosophy was influenced by Epicurus and by the Stoics. He believed in meditation, in detachment, in freedom from the ambition and envy of the world. These sentiments are expressed in

"Epicurus, Leontion, and Temissa." Feeling that man's happiness depends on his use of reason to overcome doubts and worries, in many of his character portraits Landor revealed his belief in self-control, fortitude, sympathy, and humanitarianism.

A significant part of the Imaginary Conversations is devoted to literary criticism. Classical standards were Landor's guide. He disapproved of unnecessary ornamentation in writing. "Never try to say things admirably, try only to say them plainly." "Whatever is rightly said, sounds rightly." But Landor was not a narrow classicist in his tastes; he admired a variety of authors, his favorites being Milton, Bacon, Shakespeare, Dante, and Pindar. Among his contemporaries he most respected Wordsworth and Southey.

Landor predicted that only a small, select group of people would prize his writings. He was correct. One reason for the failure of the Imaginary Conversations to attract a large audience is the fact that the dialogues lack direction and cohesive development. The absence of dramatic motivation and the presence of disconcerting gaps and shifts in argument create difficulties for the reader.

This weakness, which is a considerable one, has prevented the high merits of the Imaginary Conversations from being widely appreciated. The aphorisms scattered throughout the work are among the best in the language. The range of Landor's thought is impressive. His prose style is unexcelled in vigor and purity.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST

Type of work Religious meditations

Author Thomas à Kempis (c. 1380-1471)

First transcribed c. 1400

Although arguments have been brought forward through the centuries in an effort to show that Thomas à Kempis did not really write The Imitation of Christ (Imitatio Christi), evidence to the contrary has never been widely accepted and Thomas à Kempis is usually regarded as the author of the famous work. Aside from the Bible, The Imitation of Christ is undoubtedly the most famous religious work of the Christian world, having been translated into more than fifty languages and printed in more than six thousand editions. Widely known in manuscript, it was being circulated as early as 1420. Its first publication in English was in 1696. The original language of The Imitation of Christ was Latin, not the classical Latin of Rome, but medieval Latin considerably changed from the language of Cicero and Vergil. Many later writers have praised it. Fontenelle said it was the finest piece of writing ever done by man. John Wesley thought so highly of it that he published an English translation under the title The Christian's Pattern (1735). Matthew Arnold thought that it was, next to the Bible, the most eloquent expression of the Christian spirit ever penned.

The substance of The Imitation of Christ is that God is all and man is nothing, that from God flows the eternal Truth which man must seek, and that by imitating the spirit and actions of Christ man may be helped to achieve a state of grace with God. But as many writers have pointed out, the greatness of Thomas à Kempis' book does not lie in any originality, for there is little that is new in the matter of the work. It is the expression of a spirit that makes The Imitation of Christ a piece of great religious literature. Traceable are most of the strands of Christian philosophy and theology of the time, including those which Christians took over, at least in part, from the great pagan thinkers of Greece and Rome. The book has sometimes been described as a mosaic of matter and ideas taken from the early and medieval Christian mystics, the Bible, and writings of the Church fathers. Borrowings from St. Bernard, St. Gregory, St. Ambrose, St. Thomas Aquinas, Plato, Aristotle, Seneca, and even Ovid can be found within the pages of The Imitation of Christ, each contributing in a way to the spirit of Christian example. No reader can ever miss, even within a few pages, the eloquence and sincerity of the author. The religious feeling has been expressed so ardently that it is unmistakably a call to the reader to heed the call of Christ and to follow in His steps.

Although he calls the reader to a Christian, hence otherworldly, life, Thomas à Kempis is eminently practical in his insights into human beings, their motivations, and their psychology. More than once the author points out that virtue is only to be claimed by those who have been tempted and have proved themselves equal to denying worldly vanities and other devil's snares in order to remain in act, thought, and spirit a follower of Christ's doctrines and example. Thomas à Kempis also realized that established custom is not easily relinquished by the individual or the community and is thus always a means of keeping one from a Christian life. Thomas certainly was not a man to truckle to the moment, relativism and Christianity could not go hand in hand in his philosophy. Though strict in his admonitions that there was no worldly good, nor any love of man, which could be sufficient reason for doing evil, he admitted that for the help of the suffering, or for a better work, a good work might sometimes be postponed.

The palpable faith of Thomas in philosophical idealism is constantly before the reader. There may be doubt, however, as to whether this idealism is entirely Christian or whether there is a direct influence from Plato or the later neo-Platonists of Alexandria. Though the author's faith in the ideal of God is a mystic belief, intuitive in nature, with little of the rational core of thought behind it upon which Plato insisted, Thomas à Kempis, like Plato, believes that the real world, the world of ideality, is the only true world. But in Thomas' case the method by which Truth is achieved is not through reason, rather, the immediate source is grace acquired through the sacraments of the Church, and through revelation acquired by abstinence from worldly matters, the application of prayer, and the use of contemplation. In answer to his own rhetorical question as to how the Christian saints became so perfect, Thomas points out the fact that their perfection lay in their contemplation of divinity. The greatness of the saints, he adds, came from the fact that they steadfastly sought to abstain from all worldly considerations and to cling with their whole hearts to God and thoughts of Him.

The power of God is, for Thomas a Kempis, in divine love, a good above all others which makes every burden light and equalizes all opportunity. He wrote

Love is swift, sincere, pious, pleasant, gentle, strong, patient, faithful, prudent, long suffering, manly and never seeking her own; for wheresoever a man seeketh his own, there he falleth from love. Love is circumspect, humble and upright, not weak, not fickle, nor intent on vain things, sober, chaste, steadfast, quiet and guarded in all senses. Love is subject and obedient to all that are in authority, vile and lowly in its own sight, devout and grateful towards God, faithful and always trusting in Him, even when God hideth His face; for without sorrow we cannot live in love.

The pious author suggests in The Imitation of Christ that there were four rules for the accomplishment of peace and true liberty: that we should try to do another's will rather than our own, that we should seek always to have less than more, that we should seek the lowest place, and that we should wish and pray always to fulfill the will of God.

The Imitation of Christ was arranged in four parts. Book I deals with "Admonitions Profitable for the Spiritual Life", Book II, "Admonitions Concerning the Inward Life", Book III, "On Inward Consolation", Book IV, "Of the Sacrament of the Altar." The last, a kind of manual for the devout, gives instruction, advice, and guidance on preparing for the sacrament of communion. In the third book are many prayers noted for their eloquence and sincerity of devotion. The last paragraph of a prayer for the spirit of devotion is one of the best examples:

How can I bear this miserable life unless Thy mercy and grace strengthen me? Turn not away Thy face from me, delay not Thy visitation. Withdraw not Thou Thy comfort from me, lest my soul gasp after Thee as a thirsty land. Lord, teach me to do Thy will, teach me to walk humbly and uprightly before Thee, for Thou art my wisdom, who knowest me in truth, and knewest me before the world was made and before I was born into the world.

Although a monk, devoted to his order, his vocation, and God's service through most of his life, Thomas à Kempis was gifted with a keen insight into the world and what it can do to men. He inculcated submission to divine will and recognized at the same time that most men would have difficulty in making such submission. He advocated an ascetic, otherworldly life and point of view, and yet he also recognized the worth of practical goodness. The rules and suggestions he wrote in The Imitation of Christ are clear-sighted, the analysis is keen, the tone is humane. The seriousness of its message, the sincerity of its tone, and the humility and compassion of its author make understandable the place that this great devotional work has held in the hearts of men for generations.

Critique

Using the central theme of rivalry for succession to a great feudal house, and the triumph of good over evil, right over wrong, Santo Kyôden took his materials from traditional Kabuki plays and wrote Inazuma byôshi (Trouble in the House of Sasaki) with stage production obviously in mind. The scenes change rapidly, and the plot is complicated by the appearance of a large number of secondary characters who disrupt the unity of the story. Thus the principal theme tends to move away from the succession intrigues to a depiction of the feudal loyalty of a secondary character, Sasara Sampachirô. That this novel was soon produced on the Kabuki stage was a matter of course, and it was staged under various titles, the first being in Osaka in 1808, and in Edo in 1809. As a novel the work comprised a unit in itself, but Kyôden wrote a sequel, the Honcho Sui bodai Zenden, which was published in 1809. This later work, making greater use of syllabic meter, has little in connection with the original, and is thin in plot, but it carries the reader on through the author's sheer writing ability.

The Story

During the mid fifteenth century, under the shogunship of Ashikaga Yoshi-

masa, there lived a warrior lord by the name of Sasaki Sadakuni, lord of the Province of Yamato. He had two sons. One, twenty five years old and named Katsura, was the son of Sadakuni's first wife, the other, twelve year old Hanagata, was the son of Sadakuni's second and present wife, Lady Spider. Katsura, a handsome young man, was taken into the luxurious and self indulgent service of the shogun at Kyoto. There, at the instigation of one of Katsura's retainers, Fuwa Banzaemon, Katsura fell in love with a dancing girl, Wisteria wave, and began to lead a life of pleasure.

A retainer of the House of Sasaki, Nagoya Sansaburô, was sent to Kyoto to present a treasured painting to the shogun. Learning how matters stood with Katsura, he did his best to make the young lord mend his ways, but to no avail. Meanwhile, Banzaemon himself had been discovered to be in love with Wisteria wave, and he was discharged from feudal service. Sansaburô was sent back to the Sasaki provincial headquarters. At the same time a loyal retainer, Sasara Sampachirô, killed Wisteria wave and went into hiding. On the same night a disloyal retainer, Hasebe Unroku, stole the treasured painting and disappeared. The next day Banzaemon's father, Road dog, steward to the House of Sasaki, arrived as Sadakuni's emissary, severely reprimanded Katsura for his dissolute ways, and discharged Katsura's retinue as being disloyal. Behind Road dog's outwardly righteous actions lay a deeper plan, a plot to take over his lord's domain with the connivance of Governor General Hamana. Knowing Lady Spider's hope that her own son Hanagata would succeed to the lordship of Sasaki, Road dog had joined forces with her. With the backing of an evil sorcerer, the two attempted to do away with Katsura's wife, Lady Ginkgo, and her son Young moon, who were living in the Sasaki villa in Heguri, guarded by Sansaburō and his father, Nagoya Saburozaemon. Although their plot failed, Sadakuni was deceived and troops were dispatched against Lady Ginkgo and her young son.

In the meantime Banzaemon, who held a grudge against Sansaburo, killed Saburozaemon. Sansaburo placed Young moon in the care of Young moon's elderly nurse and helped them escape. He himself fought valiantly in defense of Lady Ginkgo, but in spite of his courage and efforts his lord's lady was abducted. He himself escaped into Kawachi Province.

The old woman in charge of Young moon had met with difficulty in escaping with her charge. Young moon was saved, however, by Sasara Sampachurō, who meanwhile had changed his name to Namuemon, and was hidden in Tamba Province.

Namuemon was still haunted by the spirit of the dead Wisteria wave whom he had killed for the sake of his lord, his son, Chestnut son, became blind, and his daughter Maple was haunted by a serpent. When it was known that Namuemon was secretly watching Road dog's movements with the idea of killing him, warriors were sent against Namuemon, who beheaded his own son and then, in order that Young moon's life might be spared, identified the head as Young moon's. Namuemon's daughter Maple sold herself for the painting Namuemon, with his wife and Young moon, sought refuge in Kawachi Province. Leaving the two in a place of safety, he himself set out to find his master Katsura and Katsura's wife, Lady Ginkgo.

Meanwhile, Lady Ginkgo, who had fallen into Road dog's hands, was about to be murdered, but she was saved by a hero recluse by the name of Umezu Good gate Katsura, who had become an itinerant Buddhist priest, was about to meet his death at a temple festival in Ōmi Province, when his life was saved by Monkey son, Sansaburo's son who had become a street preacher. After his delivery Katsura was hidden in the home of Wisteria wave's older brother, Yuasa Matahei, a printer living in Ōtsu. By chance, Namuemon was also staying there. Matahei, becoming aware that Namuemon was his own sister's murderer, was at the same time deeply impressed by the quality of Namuemon's loyalty. Matahei's wife confessed that six years ago she had attempted to hang herself because a ruffian had robbed her of twenty pieces of gold. At the time Namuemon had not only saved her from death but he had even given her twenty gold pieces to make up for her loss. Torn between revenge and gratitude, Matahei drew his sword, cut Namuemon's traveling hat in place of Namuemon's head, and offered the sundered hat to Wisteria wave's departed but still vengeful spirit. With past wrongs thus redressed, Matahei repaid his gratitude by bringing Namuemon to Katsura. At that point Hasebe Unroku appeared on the scene and was recognized by Matahei's wife as the man who had robbed her six years before. Namuemon forced Unroku to commit suicide to expiate his sins.

Maple, meanwhile, had joined a traveling theatrical troupe which had come to those parts. Namuemon, now revealed as Sampachurō, met his daughter, whose affliction from serpents that always accompanied her had been healed by the painting she had so dearly bought. Matahei, for the first time, realized that he had attained the inner secret which he had striven for in his art—its magical power

On the following day Katsura and his party left Ôtsu for Kawachi Province. He acquired a book on military strategy and tactics belonging to Good-gate, who had saved Lady Ginkgo's life. Intending to seek the assistance of the new governor general, Katsumoto, the party arrived at Good-gate's secluded abode on Diamond Mountain to find that Katsumoto was already there in an attempt to persuade Good-gate to accept the position of chief of military strategy. It was also revealed that Good-gate was related to Katsura by marriage. Katsura was reunited with Lady Ginkgo, who had been staying there under Good-gate's protection. With the governor general's and Good-gate's backing, Katsura prepared to return to his home province of Yamato.

Meanwhile, in Kyoto, Sansaburô, accompanied by his faithful servant Deer, had been searching for Fuwa Banzaemon and his gang in the brothels of that city.

Finally he found them and with the assistance of a courtesan and Good-gate, who had been a friend of his slain father Saburozaemon, Sansaburo achieved his revenge. Good-gate, appointed the governor general's deputy, received orders to go to the headquarters of the House of Sasaki. Requesting the attendance of Sadakuni's wife, Lady Spider, and his steward, Road dog, as well, Good-gate told Lord Sasaki Sadakuni that Katsura had not only mended his former ways but had displayed great military valor. He requested Sadakuni to pardon his son and to name Katsura his heir and successor. Sadakuni would then retire in Katsura's favor as head of the clan. Good-gate also revealed Lady Spider's and Road dog's plot to take over the House of Sasaki by conniving for the succession of the second-born, Lady Spider's son Hanagata. With Road dog under arrest in a caged carriage, and his mission accomplished, Good-gate took his leave amid the low and reverent bows of the House of Sasaki.

Critique

The love story of Ines de Castro was popular with poets and historians long before a Lisbon humanist dramatized it as the first dramatic tragedy in Portuguese, and preceded in all European literature by only one other, Sofonisba (1515), by the Italian Gian Trissino

(1478-1550). The dramatist, Antonio Ferreira, was the younger son of a noble at the court of the Duke of Coimbra. In construction, Inês de Castro follows Greek models, with a chorus that appears in all five acts, both as Ideal Spectator and as the Voice of Fate. This tragedy has flaws

The lengthy exposition by Ines in blank verse is hardly inspiring, and the simple plot allows little on stage action. Even the murder of Ines must be inferred from the words of the Chorus and the messenger's report. But there are, in spite of these defects, moments of dramatic brilliance and scenes of suspense and charged emotion, with moving poetry to give the drama other reasons for permanence besides its interest as a pioneer effort.

The Story

On a lovely spring day in the middle of the fourteenth century, Ines de Castro felt especially happy as she walked in her garden in Portugal. Though an illegitimate daughter of a famous Galician noble, she had won the love of Prince Pedro, son of Alfonso IV of Portugal, at last she felt sure the world was about to learn that he loved her too. There had been a star-crossed love. Pedro's father, trying his best to destroy his son's love for a woman unsuitable to rule Portugal, had compelled his heir to marry the Princess Constanza of Castile. But, as Ines confided to her nurse, fate had been on the side of true love. The birth of Constanza's son, heir to the crown of Portugal, had cost his mother her life. At last Pedro was free. He had earned out his father's command. He had insured a continuation of the dynasty, and now he was coming back to the woman he really loved. Surely King Alfonso would now relent. The beauty of the day seemed an omen, and Ines was weeping with joy as she waited for her lover to appear.

The old nurse was less sure, however, that her mistress' tears were an omen of joy; they might be a foreboding of tragedy. She begged Ines not to count on happiness until everything was settled. Ines, hearing Pedro approaching, would listen to no warnings.

The prince greeted her with an assurance that all would go well. To him self, however, he wondered why he was not loved by the common people of Portugal and why his father had been so incensed by his sincere love for Ines. Nevertheless, he was confident, like Ines, that their four children would move the stern old king to pity. Pedro hoped for the royal acceptance of the love between them and a state wedding to show King Alfonso's recognition of his grandchildren.

Pedro's secretary tried to disillusion him. In spite of the nobility of her famous father, the irregularity of Ines' birth was cause enough for King Alfonso's repeated orders that Pedro must put her out of his mind. The secretary begged Pedro, for the good of the state, to let reason conquer desire and to give up the passion that enslaved him and made him disobedient to the royal will. The prince refused. He had obeyed his father in marrying Constanza. Events had proved that Ines was fated to be his real wife.

King Alfonso, meanwhile, was pacing his throne room. His three advisers, Diogo Lopes Pacheco, Pero Coelho, and Gonzalves, were deaf to his complaints that a king had more woes than pleasures. They preached the obligation of power, pointing out that an officially sanctioned marriage between Pedro and Ines, whose children were older than the recently born son of Constanza's, might jeopardize the succession of the young child. One of the advisers, the dominating Pacheco, argued that the removal of Ines would solve all difficulties. In spite of King Alfonso's basic agreement with the suggestion, much argument was needed before the king finally gave the trio orders to kill his son's mistress.

That night Ines had a dream in which she was about to die. She interpreted it as proof that Pedro was dead; otherwise he would have been quick to defend her. Before she could discover what truth there was in her dream, the king arrived with a sentence of death. He was accompanied by Pacheco, who intended to block any appeals for royal mercy. Ines pleaded so touchingly, however, insisting on her innocence and the helplessness of her four children related through Pedro to King Alfonso, that the king, reminded of his love for his own child, finally agreed to spare her

But the reprieve did not last long. Once more the king's advisers, selfishly hoping for more gratitude from the King of Castile than revenge by a mere Galician nobleman, worked on the king, in their determination that Constanza's child should inherit the throne. Though they could not get his consent to the death of Ines, King Alfonso did not actually forbid it. Twisting his indefiniteness into permission, the evil trio hurried away to murder the innocent Ines de Castro.

In the meantime Pedro, hurrying eagerly to join her and confident that the king would consider his son's happiness and permit their official marriage, was met by a messenger who told the prince that the three advisers had sought out Ines and killed her. Out of his mind with grief, Pedro swore to have revenge on all concerned, including his father. He would cast him from the throne and then hunt down and torture the three evil murderers, and he would not only see to it that a child of Ines should be named his successor, but when he was crowned he would also have Ines' corpse exhumed and seated on the throne beside him to receive the honors of a royal coronation.

THE INTERPRETATION OF DREAMS

Type of work Psychological study
Author Sigmund Freud (1856-1939)
First published 1900

In March, 1931, in a foreword to the third English edition of The Interpretation of Dreams, Freud expressed the opinion that the volume contained the most valuable of all the discoveries he had been fortunate enough to make.

The author's estimation of his work concurs with that of most students and critics. The ideas that dreams are wish fulfillments, that the dream disguises the wishes of the unconscious, that dreams are always important, always significant, and that they express infantile wishes—particularly for the death of the parent of the same sex as that of the dreamer—all appear in this masterpiece of psychological interpretation. Here the Oedipus complex is first named and explained and the method of psychoanalysis is given impetus and credibility by its application to the analysis of dreams.

It is common criticism of Freud to say that the father of psychoanalysis, although inspired in this and other works, went too far in his generalizations concerning the basic drives of the unconscious. Freud is charged with regarding every latent wish as having a sexual object, and he is criticized for supposing that dreams can be understood as complexes of such universally significant symbols as umbrellas and boxes.

Although Freud argues that repressed wishes that show themselves in disguised form in dreams generally have something to do with the unsatisfied sexual cravings of childhood—for dreams are important and concern themselves only with matters we cannot resolve by conscious deliberation and action—he allows for the dream satisfaction of other wishes that reality has frustrated: the desire for the continued existence of a loved one already dead, the desire for sleep as a continuation of the escape from reality, the desire for a return to childhood, the desire for revenge when revenge is impossible.

As for the charge that Freud regarded dreams as complexes of symbols having the same significance for all dreamers, this is clearly unwarranted. Freud explicitly states that "only the context can furnish the correct meaning" of a dream symbol. He rejects as wholly inadequate the use of any such simple key as a dream book of symbols. Each dreamer utilizes the material of his own experience in his own way, and only by a careful analytical study of associations—obscured by the manifest content of the dream—is it possible to get at the particular use of symbols in an individual's dream. It is worth noting, Freud admits, that many symbols recur with much the same intent in many dreams of different persons, but this knowledge must be used judiciously. The agreement in the use of symbols is only partly a matter of cultural tendencies, it is largely attributable to limitations of the imagination imposed by the material itself. "To use long, stiff objects and weapons as symbols of the female genitals, or hollow objects (chests, boxes, etc.) as symbols of the male genitals is certainly not permitted by the imagination."

It is not surprising that most of the symbols discussed by Freud either as typical symbols or as symbols in individual cases are sexually significant. Although Freud did not regard all dreams as the wish fulfillments of repressed sexual desires, he did suppose that a greater number of dreams have a sexual connotation. "The more one is occupied with the solution of dreams, the reader one becomes to acknowledge that the majority of the dreams of adults deal with sexual material and give expression to erotic wishes." But Freud adds, "In dream interpretation this importance of the sexual complexes must never be forgotten, though one must not, of course exaggerate it to the exclusion of all other factors."

The technique of dream interpretation is certainly not exhausted, according to Freud by the technique of symbol interpretation. Dreams involve the use of the images dreamed, the manifest dream content, as a way of disguising the unconscious "dream thoughts" or latent dream content. The significance of a dream may be revealed only after one has understood the dramatic use of the symbolism of the dream, the condensation of the material, the displacement of the conventional meaning of a symbol or utterance, or even a displacement of the "center" of the dream thoughts, i.e., the manifest dream may center about a matter removed from the central concern of the latent dream. As Freud explains the problems of dream interpretation, making numerous references to dream examples, it becomes clear that dream interpretation must be at least as ingenious as dream work—and there is nothing more ingenious.

Freud begins The Interpretation of Dreams with a history of the scientific literature of dream problems from ancient times to 1900. He then proceeds to make his basic claim that dreams are interpretable as wish fulfillments. To illustrate his point, he begins with an involved dream of his own, justifying his procedure by arguing that self-analysis is possible and, even when faulty, illustrative.

A problem arises with the consideration of painful dreams. If dreams are wish fulfillments, why are some dreams nightmares? Who wishes to be terrified? Freud's answer is that the problem arises from a confusion between the manifest and the latent dream. What is painful, considered as manifest, may, because of its disguised significance, be regarded as satisfactory to the unconscious. When one realizes, in addition, that many suppressed wishes are desires for punishment, the painful dream presents itself as a fulfillment of such wishes. To understand the possibility of painful dreams it is necessary to consider Freud's amended formula: "The dream is the (disguised) fulfillment of a (suppressed, repressed) wish."

In describing the method most useful in enabling a person to recall his dream both by facilitating memory and by inhibiting the censorship tendency of the person recounting the dream, Freud presents what has become familiar as the psychoanalytic method of free association. He suggests that the patient be put into a restful position with his eyes closed, that the patient be told not to criticize his thoughts or to withhold the expression of them, and that he continue to be impartial about his ideas. This problem of eliminating censorship while recounting the dream is merely an extension of the problem of dealing with the censorship imposed by the dreamer while dreaming. The dreamer does not want to acknowledge his desires, for one reason or another he has repressed them. The fulfillment of the suppressed desire can be tolerated by the dreamer only if he leaves out anything which would be understandable to the waking mind. Consequently, only a laborious process of undoing the dream work can result in some understanding of the meaning the censor tries to hide.

Among the interesting subsidiary ideas of Freud's theory is the idea that the dream stimulus is always to be found among the experiences of the hours prior to sleeping. Some incident from the day becomes the material of the dream, its provocative image. But although the dream stimulus is from the day preceding sleep, the repressed wish which the dream expresses and fulfills is from childhood, at least, in the majority of cases. "The deeper we go into the analysis of dreams, the more often are we put on to the track of childish experiences which play the part of dream sources in the latent dream content." To explain the difficulty of getting at the experiences in childhood which provide the latent dream content, Freud argues for a conception of dreams as stratified in the dream layers of meaning are involved, and it is only at the lowest stratum that the source in some experience of childhood may be discovered.

Among the typical dreams mentioned by Freud are the embarrassment dream of nakedness, interpreted as an exhibition dream, fulfilling a wish to return to childhood (the time when one ran about naked without upsetting anyone), the death-wish dream in which one dreams of the death of a beloved person, interpreted as a dream showing repressed hostility toward brother or sister, father or mother, and the examination dream in which one dreams of the disgrace of flunking an examination, interpreted as reflecting the ineradicable memories of punishments in childhood.

Of these typical dreams, the death wish dream directed to the father (by the son) or to the mother (by the daughter) is explained in terms of the drama of Oedipus by Sophocles. In the old Greek play, Oedipus unwittingly murders his own father and marries his mother. When he discovers his deeds, he blinds himself and exiles himself from Thebes. The appeal of the drama is explained by Freud as resulting from its role as a wish fulfillment. The play reveals the inner self, the self which directed its first sexual impulses toward the mother and its first jealous hatred toward the father. These feelings have been repressed during the course of our developing maturity, but they remain latent, ready to manifest themselves only in dreams somewhat more obscure than the Oedipus drama itself. Freud mentions Hamlet as another play in which the same wish is shown, although in Hamlet the fulfillment is repressed. Freud accounts for Hamlet's reluctance to complete the task of revenge by pointing out that Hamlet cannot bring himself to kill a man who accomplished what he himself wishes he had accomplished—the murder of his father and marriage to his mother.

In his discussion of the psychology of the dream process, Freud calls attention to the fact that dreams are quickly forgotten—a natural consequence, if his theory is correct. This fact creates problems for the analyst who wishes to interpret dreams in order to discover the root of neurotic disturbances. However, the self that forgets is the same self that dreamed, and it is possible by following the implications of even superficial associations to get back to the substance of the dream.

Realizing that many persons would be offended by his ideas, Freud attempted to forestall criticism by insisting on the universal application of his theory and by claiming that dreams themselves—since they are not acts—are morally innocent, whatever their content

There seems little question but that Freud's contribution to psychology in The Interpretation of Dreams will remain one of the great discoveries of the human mind. Whatever its excesses, particularly in the hands of enthusiastic followers, Freud's central idea gains further confirmation constantly in the experiences of dreamers and analysts alike

In Intruder in the Dust, Faulkner juxtaposed his views regarding the problem of the Negro in the South against a bizarre tale involving murder, grave robbing, and lynching. Before the publication of this novel, in such works as "The Bear" and Light in August, he had only hinted at his concept of the problem, with the result that his views were often misunderstood, but in Intruder in the Dust he set forth his views boldly, often reinforcing them with italics and using one of his characters as his spokesman. Faulkner's main tenet, developed by Lawyer Gavin Stevens, is that the South must be left alone to solve its own problem, that any interference in the form of federal legislation will only strengthen the South's historic defiance of the North. Lifted from context, however, the plot resembles nothing so much as a rather far-fetched murder mystery; isolated, Gavin Stevens' commentaries on the plot sound like so much propaganda. But within the framework of the novel the plot is credible and Lawyer Stevens' harangues are appropriate. After all, the story is oriented around a boy. It is quite conceivable that a sixteen year old could get himself into just such a situation, it stands to reason that a rhetorical lawyer should try to clarify a confused nephew's thinking. Intruder in the Dust is a successful novel because Faulkner succeeds in making the reader believe in its central character, understand him, and sympathize with him.

The Story

On a cold afternoon in November, Chick Mallison, twelve years old, accompanied by two Negro boys, went rabbit hunting on Carothers Edmonds' place. When he fell through the ice into a creek, an old Negro, Lucas Beauchamp, appeared and watched while the boy clambered awkwardly ashore. Then Lucas took the white boy and his companions to the old colored man's home. There Chick died out in front of the fire and ate Lucas' food. Later, when Chick tried to pay the old man for his hospitality, Lucas spurned his money. Chick threw it down, but Lucas made one of the other boys pick it up and return it. Chick brooded over the incident, ashamed to be indebted to a black man, especially one as arrogant as Lucas Beauchamp. Again trying to repay the old man, he sent Lucas' wife a mail order dress bought with money he had saved, again refusing to acknowledge payment and thus admit his inferiority as a Negro. Lucas sent Chick a bucket of sorghum sweetening.

Some four years later when Lucas was accused of shooting Vinson Gownie in the back, Chick still had not forgotten his unpaid debt to the Negro. Realizing that Vinson's poor white family and friends were sure to lynch Lucas, Chick wanted to leave town. But when Sheriff Hope Hampton brought Lucas to the jail in Jefferson, Chick, unable to suppress his sense of obligation, was standing on the street where the old colored man could see him. Lucas asked Chick to bring his uncle, Gavin Stevens, to the jail.

At the jail the old man refused to tell Stevens what happened at the shooting, whereupon the lawyer left in disgust. But Lucas did tell Chick that Vinson Gownie had not been shot with his gun—a forty one Colt—and he asked the boy to verify this fact by digging up the corpse. Although the body was buried nine miles from town and the Gownies would be sure to shoot a grave robber, Chick agreed to the request, he knew that Lucas would undoubtedly be lynched if someone did not help the old man. Barbershop and poolroom loafers had already gathered while waiting for the pine hill country Gownies to arrive in town.

Stevens laughed at the story, so Chick's only help came from a Negro boy—Aleck Sander—and Miss Habersham, an old woman of good family who had grown up with Lucas' wife, now dead. And so the task of digging up a white man's grave in order to save a haughty, intractable, but innocent Negro was left to two adolescents and a seventy year old woman who felt it her obligation to protect those more helpless than she. The three succeeded in opening the grave without incident. In the coffin they found not Vinson Gownie but Jake Montgomery, whose skull had been bashed in. They filled the grave, returned to town, wakened Stevens, and went to the sheriff with their story.

This group, joined by old man Gownie and two of his sons, reopened the grave. But when they lifted the lid the coffin was found to be empty. A search disclosed Montgomery's body hastily buried nearby and Vinson's sunk in quicksand. When the sheriff took Montgomery's body into town, the huge crowd that had gathered in anticipation of the lynching of Lucas Beauchamp soon scattered.

Questioning of Lucas revealed that Crawford Gownie had murdered his brother Vinson Crawford, according to the old Negro, had been cheating his brother in a lumber deal. Jake Montgomery, to whom Crawford had sold the stolen lumber, knew that Crawford was the murderer and had dug up Vinson's grave to prove it. Crawford murdered Montgomery at the grave and put him in Vinson's coffin. When he saw Chick and his friends open the grave, he was forced to remove Vinson's body too. Sheriff Hampton soon captured Crawford, who killed himself in his cell to avoid a trial.

At last, Chick thought, he had freed himself of his debt to the old Negro. A short time later, however, Lucas appeared at Stevens' office and insisted on paying for services rendered. Stevens refused payment for both himself and Chick but accepted two dollars for "expenses." Proud, unhumiliated to the end, Lucas Beauchamp demanded a receipt.

In Ion, Euripides fashioned a curious and compelling drama out of a legend which, so far as we know, no other ancient playwright touched. Although several lines of action threaten to culminate in tragedy, as when the outraged Creusa sends her slave to poison Ion and when Ion attempts to retaliate, the play ends happily and must be described as a comedy. Indeed some critics claim that the technique of the recognition scene, the identity of Ion being established by his miraculously preserved swaddling clothes, is the basis of the New Comedy which developed in the fourth century B C. A tantalizing ambiguity in Ion concerns Euripides' attitude toward the gods. On the one hand the action of the play demands that we accept Apollo's existence and his power, on the other, the sly way in which he is presented seems to suggest that he is ridiculously anthropomorphic, a knave caught cheating and forced to concoct a way out for himself.

The Story

Years before Phoebus Apollo had ravished Creusa, daughter of King Erechtheus, who subsequently and in secret gave birth to a son. By Apollo's command she hid the infant in a cave where Hermes was sent to carry him to the temple of Apollo. There he was reared as a temple ministrant. Meanwhile, Creusa had married Xuthus as a reward for his aid in the Athenian war against the Euboeans, but the marriage remained without issue. After years of frustration, Xuthus and Creusa decided to make a pilgrimage to Delphi and ask the god for aid in getting a son.

At dawn Ion emerged from the temple of Apollo to sweep the floors, chase away the birds, set out the laurel boughs, and make the usual morning sacrifice. Creusa's handmaidens came to admire the temple built upon the navel of the world and to announce the imminent arrival of their mistress. At the meeting of Creusa and Ion, Creusa confirmed the story that her father had been drawn from the earth by Athena and was swallowed up by the earth at the end of his life. The credulous Ion explained that his own birth, too, was shrouded in mystery, for he had appeared out of nowhere at the temple and had been reared by the priestess of Apollo. The greatest sorrow of his life, he said, was not knowing who his mother was. Creusa sympathized and cautiously revealed that she had a friend with a similar problem, a woman who had borne a son to Apollo, only to have the infant disappear and to suffer childlessness for the rest of her life.

Ion, shocked and outraged at the insult to his god, demanded that Creusa end her accusation of Apollo in his own temple, but the anguished woman assailed the god with fresh charges of injustice, breaking off only at the arrival of her husband Xuthus eagerly took his wife into the temple, for he had just been assured by the prophet Trophonius that they would not return childless to Athens. The perplexed Ion was left alone to meditate on the lawlessness of gods who seemed to put pleasure before wisdom.

Xuthus, emerging from the temple, fell upon the startled Ion and attempted to kiss and embrace him. He shouted joyfully that Ion must be his son, for the oracle had said that the first person he would see upon leaving the temple would be his son by birth. Stunned and unconvinced, Ion demanded to know who his mother was, but Xuthus could only conjecture that possibly she was one of the Delphian girls he had encountered at a Bacchanal before his marriage. Ion, reluctantly conceding that Xuthus must be his father if Apollo so decreed, begged to remain an attendant in the temple rather than become the unwelcome and suspicious heir to the throne of Athens—for Creusa would surely resent a son she had not borne. Xuthus understood his anxiety and agreed to hide his identity, however, he insisted that Ion accompany him to Athens, even if only in the role of distinguished guest. He then gave orders for a banquet of thanksgiving and commanded that the handmaidens to Creusa keep their silence on pain of death. As they departed to prepare the feast, Ion expressed the hope that his mother might still be found and that she might be an Athenian.

Accompanied by the aged slave of her father, Creusa reappeared before the temple and demanded from her handmaidens an account of the revelation. Xuthus had received from Apollo. Only under relentless cross examination did the fearful servants reveal what had passed between Xuthus and Ion. Overcome by a sense of betrayal, Creusa cursed Apollo for his cruelty but dared not act upon the old slave's suggestion that she burn the temple or murder the husband who had, after all, been kind to her.

But the murder of the usurper, Ion, was another matter. After some deliberation Creusa decided upon a safe and secret method of eliminating the rival of her lost son. From a phial of the Gorgon's blood which Athena had given to Creusa's grandfather and which had been passed down to her, the old slave was to pour a drop into Ion's wineglass at the celebration feast. Eager to serve his master's daughter, the slave departed, and the chorus chanted their hope for success.

Some time later a messenger came running to warn Creusa that the authorities were about to seize her and submit her to death by stoning, for her plot had been discovered. He described how at the feast a flock of doves had dipped down to drink from Ion's cup and had died in horrible convulsions and how Ion had tortured a confession out of the old slave. The court of Delphi had then sentenced Creusa to death for attempting murder of a consecrated person within the sacred precincts of the temple of Apollo. The chorus urged Creusa to fling herself upon the altar and remain there in sanctuary.

A short time later Ion arrived at the head of an infuriated crowd, and he and Creusa began to hurl angry charges and counter charges at each other. Suddenly the priestess of the temple appeared, bearing the cradle and the tokens with which the infant Ion had been found years before. Slowly and painfully the truth emerged. Ion was the lost son of Creusa and Apollo. Creusa was seized with a frenzy of joy, but the astounded Ion remained incredulous. As he was about to enter the temple to demand an explanation from Apollo himself, the goddess Athena appeared in mid air and confirmed the revelation. She urged that Xuthus not be told the truth so that he might enjoy the delusion that his own son was to be his heir, while Creusa and Ion could share their genuine happiness. Creusa renounced all her curses against

Apollo and blessed him for his ultimate wisdom As she and Ion departed for Athens the chorus called upon all men to reverence the gods and take courage

Critique

Facetiously dedicated to the Bunker Hill Monument, Israel Potter is a mock picaresque novel The hero, Israel Potter, wanders about America and Europe for over fifty years, never settling, never successful, providing a vehicle through which Melville satirizes a great many ideas and institutions The pious morality of Benjamin Franklin, tidied into sugar-coated aphorisms, is one of Melville's principal targets Other targets are the brutality of all wars, the idiocy of jingoistic patriotism, the barbarous quality lurking behind supposedly civilized behavior, neither American energy nor European polish can protect man from brutality or from the ridiculous patriotism around him Despite the serious nature of Melville's theme, the novel is frequently very funny Israel, the innocent, frequently stumbles into difficult situations and out of them by changing clothes, masquerading as a ghost, feigning madness, or pretending a polite worldliness he does not possess The novel was not well received when it was written, for mid nineteenth century American taste did not relish the picaresque or the mocking treatment of America's noble fight for freedom Although generally appreciated by those who have read it, Israel Potter has not yet received the attention accorded to many of Melville's other novels nor the attention that it deserves because of its genuine comedy and its astringent defense of civilized values

Born among the rugged stones of the New England hills, in the Housatonic Valley, Israel Potter grew up with all the virtues of the hard, principled, new land After an argument with his father over a girl whom his stern parent did not think a suitable match, Israel decided to run away from home while his family was attending church He wandered about the countryside, hunting deer, farming land, becoming a trapper, dealing in furs During his wanderings he learned that most men were unscrupulous He also hunted whales from Nantucket to the coast of Africa

In 1775, Israel joined the American forces and took part in the Battle of Bunker Hill He fought bravely, but the battle, as he saw it, was simply disorganized carnage Wounded, Israel enlisted aboard an American ship after his recovery Once at sea, the ship was captured by the British Israel was taken prisoner and conveyed to England on the British ship, but on his arrival in London he managed to make his escape

Wandering about London, Israel met various Englishmen who mocked his American accent Some of the English were kind and helpful to him others cuffed him about and berated the scurrilous Yankee rebels He found various odd jobs, including one as a gardener working for a cruel employer He escaped from this job and found one as a gardener on the king's staff at Kew Gardens One day Israel met King George III The king, completely mad, realized that Israel was an American and was ineffectually kind to him Eventually, in a slack season, Israel was discharged He then worked for a farmer, but when neighboring farmers discovered that he was an American, he was forced to run away

Israel met Squire Woodcock, a wealthy and secret friend of America, who sent him on a secret mission to Benjamin Franklin in Paris Israel carried a message in the false heel of his new boots On his arrival in Paris, while he was looking for Benjamin Franklin, a poor man tried to shine his boots on the Pont Neuf Israel, in fright, kicked the man and ran off At last he found Benjamin Franklin, who took the message and then insisted that Israel return and pay damages to the bootblack

In this fashion Israel, under the tutelage of Franklin, learned his first lesson in European politeness and consideration From this incident Franklin proceeded to instruct Israel in the ways of proper behavior, deriving many of his lessons from the simple maxims in Poor Richard's Almanack Israel, still innocent, absorbed the teaching carefully, although none of it ever applied to his later experiences Franklin promised that Israel would be sent back to America, if he would first return to England with a message While still in Paris, Israel met the stormy and ferocious Captain John Paul Jones, who also visited Franklin

John Paul Jones found Israel a bright and likely young man

Israel made his way back across the Channel and went to Squire Woodcock The squire urged him to hide in the dungeon cell for three days, since their plot was in danger of discovery When Israel emerged from the cell, he recognized that the good squire must have been killed for his activities in the American cause

Having appropriated some of the squire's clothes, Israel masqueraded as Squire Woodcock's ghost and escaped from a house filled with his enemies He then traded clothes with a farmer, wandered to Portsmouth, and signed on as a foretopman on a British ship bound for the East Indies In the Channel, his ship met another ship whose captain had authority to impress some of the men, Israel was among those taken That same night the ship was captured by an American ship under the command of John Paul Jones Having revealed himself to his old friend, Israel soon became the quarter master of the Ranger With John Paul Jones, Israel engaged in piracy, capturing and looting ships

In Scotland they called on the Earl of Selkirk in order to rob him, but the nobleman was not at home Israel impressed the earl's wife with his Parisian manners, drank tea with her, and assured her that he and John Paul Jones did not intend to do the lady any harm The crew, however, insisted that plunder was a part of piracy, and so Israel and John Paul Jones were forced to allow the men to take the family silver and other valuables Israel promised to restore all articles of value, and when he received a large sum of money from another exploit, he and John Paul Jones bought back all the earl's articles from the men and returned them to the Selkirk family

Other adventures did not end so cheerfully The sea fight between the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis was a violent and bloody battle, fought along national lines and devoid of all the amen

times of piracy Both ships were lost, and Israel and John Paul Jones, still hoping to get to America, sailed on the Ariel The Ariel was captured by the British and Israel was again impressed into the British Navy By feigning madness to hide his Yankee origins he got back to England safely

In England, Israel met Ethan Allen, a strong, heroic, Samson like figure held prisoner by the English Israel tried to help Allen escape but was unsuccessful Disguised as a beggar, he went to London, where he remained for over forty years During that time he worked as a brick maker and laborer, always hoping to save enough money to return to America but never finding the economic situation in London stable enough to permit saving A wanderer in an alien land, he became part of the grime and poverty of London During those years he married a shopgirl who bore him a son Finally, in 1826, he secured some credit and, with the help of the American consul, sailed for America with his son

Israel arrived in Boston on July 4, during a public celebration of the Battle of Bunker Hill No one recognized him or acknowledged his right to be there Instead, people laughed at him and thought he was mad He returned to his father's farm, but the homestead had long since disappeared Old Israel, his wanderings ended, found no peace, comfort, or friendship in his old age Although he roes of the Revolution were publicly venerated, the aged man could not even get a small pension

In his early days, Calderon, as the inventor of the good and the bad of sixteenth century drama, followed Lope de Vega's formula for comedy, but with a tightening of the plot and the illumination of some of the extra threads His cape and sword plays dealt with veiled women, secret rooms, and the hoodwinking of fathers and guardian brothers by sweethearts who, like Lope's heroines, are frequently motherless, lest fooling a mother might be regarded as disrespect for womanhood Calderon's servants, derived from the gracioso invented by Lope, are a combination of a shrewd rascal faithful to his master and a character added to the cast to provide humor During his ten years of service in Spanish armies (1625 1635) Calderon sent back from Flanders and Italy about ten plays, including It Is Better than It Was, an optimistic contrast to the earlier It Is Worse than It Was In the celebrated letter to the Duke of Veragua, written ten months before his death and listing the 111 plays from his pen, Calderon mentioned it as among those still unpublished. There is little philosophy in this drama, aside from the shrewd wisdom and salty comments of the skeptical servant. It is a comedy of love-making among the nobility, with the outcome not definitely known until the lines spoken just before the hero puts in a good word for the author to end the play.

The Story

Flora and her friend Laura, both motherless, went out veiled into the streets of Vienna to witness the city's welcome to the Spanish princess Maria. Unfortunately, they were recognized by Arnaldo in love with Laura, and by Licio, chosen by Flora's father as the future husband of his daughter. Flora became intrigued by the attempts of a handsome stranger to talk to her. When a quarrel between him and Licio seemed imminent, both ladies fled to their homes.

Into Flora's home rushed the stranger, Carlos Colona, in search of asylum. He said that he had been forced into a duel over a veiled woman and had killed his challenger. Without identifying herself, Flora promised him protection and hid him in a closet. As Arnaldo appeared, seeking to kill the man who had murdered Licio, her father, Don Cesar, also came in, having learned from Dinero, the stranger's servant, that the murderer was the son of his old friend, the Governor of Brandenburg. He faced a predicament. His ties of friendship required that he help the young fugitive, but as magistrate he must hunt him down and execute him.

In the meantime Arnaldo had carried the news to Laura as an excuse to enter her house without objections from her brother and guardian, Fabio, but Fabio warned the young man never again to try to talk to Laura while she was unchaperoned. Then, seeing in Flora's grief a chance to further his own courtship, Fabio left to visit her and in doing so interrupted her plans to get Don Carlos to a place of safety.

Because there were too many people around the house, visitors come to see the magistrate, Flora and her servant Silvia decided to hide Don Carlos in the tower of the building formerly the town jail. Later Silvia returned to tell the fugitive that a heavily muffled woman wanted to talk to him. Flora, the caller, knew that it was impossible for her to go openly calling on the man who had just killed her fiancé. Don Carlos decided that the women of Vienna were kind to strangers. The visitor, after making him promise not to try to discover her identity, explained that she had come because she was the cause of all his trouble, the motive for the duel, and she wanted to make amends. He answered that he was leaving Vienna as soon as possible in order not to harm her reputation. But the arrival of Dinero again delayed his escape. The servant, learning Flora's identity, prevented her father's discovery of her secret by claiming that he had brought a cloak which the girl was merely trying on.

Don Cesar having gone to post guards at the gates, Don Carlos gave Flora a jewel as a token and then slipped over the wall into the next house. There he interrupted the love making of Arnaldo and Laura, but he won their sympathy by telling a story about fleeing from a jealous husband. Arnaldo, having boosted the fugitive over a high fence to safety, was himself caught by Don Cesar, who was pursuing the fugitive, and by Fabio, who had been awakened by the noise. By keeping muffled, Arnaldo tricked the magistrate into believing him the escaping Don Carlos. Don Cesar ordered a jailer to return the fugitive to the tower prison.

Don Carlos had already taken refuge there, convinced it was the safest place in which he could hide. The young man's presence now offered Don Cesar a triple problem of honor: his conflicting duties as father, friend, and magistrate. Meanwhile, Arnaldo, finding Don Carlos in the tower, started a quarrel. The noise of the fight brought Don Cesar to the scene.

He scoffed at Arnaldo's accusations that the young man was secretly visiting Flora, his own jailer had brought the young man there. Denounced as a scandalmonger, Arnaldo was thrown out of the house.

Laura, veiled, was an early morning visitor to the tower. At first Flora, also in disguise, saw in her friend a possible rival, but Laura, thinking that the prisoner was Arnaldo, had come to confess her indiscretion, if necessary, in order to free him. The others, bursting in, found the two veiled women. Arnaldo, realizing that one was Laura, confessed his misdeeds and asked to marry her, but only after he had killed Don Carlos. The prisoner then concocted a story that placated everybody. Laura's honor was now safe. Don Carlos also assured Don César that he had sought asylum in the house of his father's friend, not of his sweetheart's father, and he pointed out his marriage to Flora would resolve all problems. So all ended happily with a double wedding.

Critique

In his early days, Calderón imitated the complicated plots of Lope de Vega's cape and sword plays with their disguises and mistaken identities. A good example is It Is Worse than It Was (Peor esta que estaba), first presented in 1630 and appearing in the first "Parte" of twelve plays by Calderón published in 1635. Later it was corrected and reprinted in 1682 by Calderón's friend, Juan de Vera Tassis. Because many seventeenth century Spanish dramatists were competing with Lope for popularity, the Jesuit trained Calderón, to make his plays different, added an interest in philosophy and logic. His characters, as one critic has put it, make love like debaters. Lisarda, inquiring how César can love her without having seen her, is answered by an exposition of how blind people can admire what they cannot see. For additional differentiation, Calderón borrowed from the Gongoristic literary practice, then popular, and provided word puzzles for his audiences, as when he refers to a diamond bribe given a servant as an "errant star," or played with metaphors, as when César speaks of the dawn "crowned with roses and carnations." But Calderón was also a skilled poet and dramatist, even in his early days. His thoughts are clothed in word music, and his plots, in spite of their complications, are mechanically correct and exciting to follow.

The Story

When Juan de Aragón, Governor of Gaeta, received a letter from his old friend Alonso Colona of Naples, saying that his daughter had run off with a murderer, Cesar Ursino, that official was so upset and incoherent that his daughter Lisarda was sure that her own guilty secret had been discovered, for she had been going veiled to assignations with a romantic wooer. This gallant, who called himself Fabio, was really César. He was deeply interested in the veiled girl whom he was meeting, much to the dismay of his servant Camacho, who remonstrated with his master and reminded him that he was to marry Flérída.

One day César ran across his old friend, Don Juan, who had returned fromlanders to visit an old soldier friend of his and to pay court to Lisarda. About the same time Flérída Colona arrived in Gaeta from Naples and appealed for help to the governor's daughter. Calling herself Laura, she explained that her sweetheart was in flight after having killed a man who had molested her, and that she was following him.

During her next meeting with Cesar, Lisarda was persuaded to unveil herself. Her maid Celia, flirting with Camacho, also revealed herself. At that moment they were discovered by the governor, who was searching for Cesar. The fugitive declared, "Things are worse than they were." The governor sent him a prisoner to the tower, and ordered the veiled girl, whom he took for the daughter of his old friend, to be taken under guard to his own house.

Returning home before her father, Lisarda was able to make him believe on his arrival that his captive had been Flérída, the girl whom Lisarda was already sheltering in the house. Satisfied with the way matters had turned out, the governor dispatched a messenger to his friend in Naples and promised to keep the runaway girl out of mischief until she was safely married. Meanwhile, Don Juan had been accepted as Lisarda's suitor and was being entertained in the governor's house.

Lisarda, remorseful that César had been jailed because of his passion for her, sent Celia to him with a note arranging for another meeting that night. The servant found him and Camacho comparing Flérída and his new lady Cesar, immediately accepting the invitation, promised to bribe the jailer for a night of freedom. Bribery was not necessary, however. Don Juan, on his arrival to visit the prisoner, announced that the jailer was his old military comrade, who would let Cesar out on parole. Cesar had hoped to keep his friend from learning about the veiled woman, but was glad of Don Juan's help when his pistol went off unexpectedly, revealing his presence in Lisarda's room. Don Juan, who was staying in the governor's house, arrived first on the scene, recognized Cesar, and aided him to escape.

Don Juan debated all night whether to challenge Cesar as a rival or to aid him as a friend. Unable to make up his mind, he hesitated about accepting the governor's offer of immediate marriage to Lisarda. While he was debating with himself, the early rising Flérída found him in the patio. Her general remarks about Cesar and their adventures together in the past convinced Don Juan that she had been the girl in César's company the night before. During their discussion Flérída learned for the first time that César was in the Gaeta jail.

When her attempts to visit him aroused Lisarda's jealousy, the governor overheard part of the conversation between the girls, almost uncovered the truth about Lisarda's secret meetings. But Lisarda managed to keep her secret from her father. She also promised Flérída a full explanation of everything that had happened.

Once more Don Juan visited Cesar in jail. Camacho, by his quick wit, managed to save Lisarda's good name, but all was nearly discovered when the governor arrived with news that he had made arrangements for César's immediate marriage to Flérída. Unable to understand the young man's surprise at news of his sweetheart, he insisted that he had found them together the previous night.

To get the truth, Don Juan gathered everyone concerned at the governor's house There Lisarda, to escape scandal, was compelled to see Fléndra paired off with César while she had to be satisfied with Don Juan To complete the round of weddings, Celia and Camacho were paired off with each other

In The Journal of a Tour, an account of a journey through Holland and Germany with her husband in 1794, Mrs Radcliffe told how on her trip up the Rhine she had encountered two Capuchins "as they walked along the shore, beneath the dark cliffs of Boppard, wrapt in the long black drapery of their order, and their heads shrouded in cowls, that half concealed their faces." She saw them as "interesting figures in a picture, always gloomily sublime." This vision is commonly believed to have inspired the character of Schedoni, the most sinister villain in that gallery of villains, the Gothic novel. As in her other books, The Italian, or, The Confessional of the Black Penitents mingles the wild or idyllic beauty of nature with scenes of nightmare and terror. The novel is wholly a work of the romantic imagination, lacking both the fantastic supernaturalism and the turgid sensationalism of her rivals in this specialized genre.

The Story

Vincentio di Vivaldi saw Ellena di Rosalba for the first time at the Church of San Lorenzo in Naples. So impressed was he by the sweetness of her voice and the grace of her person that at the end of the service he followed the girl and her elderly companion in the hope that the fair unknown would put aside her veil so that he might catch a glimpse of her features. When the elderly woman stumbled and fell, Vivaldi seized the opportunity to offer her his arm, a gallant gesture which gave him the excuse to accompany the two women to the Villa Altieri, their modest home on an eminence overlooking the bay of Naples.

The next day he returned to ask after the health of Signora Bianchi, as the older woman was named. Although the matron received her guest courteously, Ellena did not appear. Thrown into a mood of despondency by her absence, he inquired of his acquaintances into the girl's family but learned only that she was an orphan, the niece and ward of her aged relative.

That night resolved to see Ellena again, he left a reception given by his mother and repaired to the Villa Altieri. The hour was late and only one window was lighted. Through a lattice he saw Ellena playing on her lute while she sang a midnight hymn to the Virgin. Enraptured, he drew near the lattice and heard her pronounce his name, but when he revealed himself the girl closed the lattice and left the room. Vivaldi lingered in the garden for some time before returning to Naples. Lost in reverie, he was passing under a shattered archway extending over the road when a shadowy figure in a monk's robe glided across his path and in a ghostly whisper warned him to beware of future visits to the villa.

Thinking that the warning had been given by a rival, he returned the next night in the company of his friend Bonorma. Again the dark figure appeared and uttered a sepulchral warning. Later, as the two young men were passing under the arch, the figure showed itself once more. Vivaldi and Bonorma drew their swords and entered the ancient fortress in search of the mysterious visitant. They found no trace of anyone lurking in the ruins.

Still believing that these visitations were the work of a rival, Vivaldi decided to end his suspense by making a declaration for Ellena's hand. Signora Bianchi listened to his proposal and then reminded him that a family as old and illustrious as his own would object to an alliance with a girl of Ellena's humble station. Vivaldi realized that she spoke wisely, but with all the fervor of a young man in love he argued his suit so eloquently that at last Signora Bianchi withdrew her refusal. After Vivaldi had made repeated visits to the villa, a night came when the aged woman placed Ellena's hand in his and gave them her blessing. To Vivaldi's great joy it was decided that the marriage would be solemnized during the coming week.

The Marchese and Marchesa di Vivaldi, in the meantime, had not remained in ignorance of their son's frequent visits at the Villa Altieri. On several occasions the marchese, a man of great family pride and strict principles, had remonstrated with his son and assured him that any expectation of marriage to one so far below him in station was impossible. To this argument Vivaldi answered only that his affections and intentions were irrevocable. His mother, a haughty and vindictive woman, was equally determined to end what she regarded as her son's foolish infatuation. Realizing that the young man could not be moved by persuasion or threats, she summoned her confessor and secret adviser, the monk Schedoni, and consulted him on measures to separate Ellena and Vivaldi.

Schedoni, a monk at the Convent of the Santo Spirito, was a man of unknown family and origins. His spirit appeared haughty and disordered, his appearance conveyed an effect of gloom that corresponded to his severe and solitary disposition. Because of his austere manners, brooding nature, and sinister appearance he was loved by none, hated by many, and feared by most. Vivaldi disliked the monk and avoided him, even though he had no presentiment of what Schedoni was preparing for him and Ellena.

On the morning after his acceptance as Ellena's suitor Vivaldi hastened to the villa. In the darkened archway the ghostly figure again appeared and told him that death was in the house. Deeply disturbed, Vivaldi hurried on, to learn on his arrival that Signora Bianchi had died suddenly during the night. When Beatrice, the old servant, confided her suspicions that her mistress had been poisoned, Vivaldi grew even more concerned. His own suspicions falling on Schedoni, he confronted the monk in the marchesa's apartment on his return to Venice, but the confessor cleverly parried all the questions Vivaldi put to him. Vivaldi, apologizing for his conduct and accusing speech, failed to realize that he had made an enemy of Schedoni and that the monk was already planning his revenge.

Meanwhile, it had been decided that Ellena was to find a sanctuary in the Convent of Santa Maria della Pietà after her aunt's funeral, and Vivaldi was in agreement with her desire to withdraw to that shelter during her period of mourning. While Ellena was packing in preparation for her departure the next day, she heard Beatrice screaming in another room. At that same moment three masked men seized Ellena and in spite of her protests carried her from the house. Thrust into a closed carriage, she was driven throughout the night and most of the next day into the mountainous region of Abruzzo. There her captors conducted her to a strange religious establishment where she was turned over to the care of the nuns. Almost distracted, the girl was led to a cell where she was at last able to give way to the extremities of her terror and grief.

Knowing nothing of these events, Vivaldi had decided that same night to explore the ruined fortress and to discover, if possible, the secret of the strange visitant he had encountered there. With him went Paulo Mendico, his faithful servant. When they were within the archway the figure of the monk suddenly materialized, thus time telling Vivaldi that Ellena had departed an hour before. Paulo fired his pistol, but the figure eluded them. Following drops of blood, Vivaldi and Paulo came at last to a chamber into which the figure had disappeared. As they entered, the great door shut behind them. In the chamber they found only a discarded, bloody robe. During the night they spent as prisoners in that gloomy room Paulo told his master of a muffled penitent who had appeared at the Church of Santa Maria del Pianto and made a confession apparently so strange and horrible that Ansaldo di Rovalli, the grand penitentiary, had been thrown into convulsions. During this recital they were startled by hearing groans close by, but they saw no one. In the morning the door of the chamber stood open once more, and Vivaldi and Paulo made their escape.

Alarmed for Ellena's safety, Vivaldi went at once to the villa. There he found Beatrice tied to a pillar and learned from her that her mistress had been carried off by abductors. Convinced that the strange happenings of the night were part of a plot to prevent his intended marriage, he again confronted Schedoni at the Convent of the Santo Spirito and would have assaulted the monk if others had not seized the distraught young man and restrained him by force. That night, by accident, Vivaldi heard from a fisherman that early in the day a closed carriage had been seen driving through Braccelli. Hopeful that he could trace the carriage and find Ellena, he set off in pursuit in the company of faithful Paulo.

On the fourth day of her imprisonment Ellena was conducted to the parlor of the abbess, who informed her that she must choose between taking the veil or the person whom the Marchesa di Vivaldi had selected as her husband. When Ellena refused both offers she was taken back to her cell. Each evening she was allowed to attend vespers and there her attention was attracted to Sister Olivia, a nun who tried to reconcile her to the hardships of her confinement. For this reason, perhaps, Sister Olivia was the nun chosen by the abbess to inform Ellena that if she persisted in refusing a husband proper to her station she must take holy orders immediately.

Vivaldi, meanwhile, was continuing his search for Ellena. On the evening of the seventh day he and Paulo fell in with a company of pilgrims on their way to worship at the shrine of a convent about a league and a half distant. Traveling with this company, Vivaldi arrived at the convent in time to witness the service at which Ellena was to be made a novice. Hearing her voice raised in protest, he rushed to the altar and caught her as she fainted. Unable to secure Ellena's freedom, Vivaldi left the convent in order to try another plan to set her free. Though he did not know it, there was need of haste, the abbess had decided to punish Ellena by confining her in a chamber from which none had ever returned alive. Alarmed for the girl's life, Sister Olivia promised to help her escape from the convent that night

Dressed in the nun's veil, Ellena attended a program of music given in honor of some distinguished strangers who were visiting the convent. There Vivaldi, disguised as a pilgrim, passed her a note in which he told her to meet him at the gate of the nuns' garden. Guided by Sister Olivia, Ellena went to the gate where Vivaldi was waiting with Brother Jeronimo, a monk whom he had bribed to lead them from the convent by a secret path. Brother Jeronimo tried to betray them, however, and Ellena would have been recaptured if an aged monk whom they disturbed at his solitary prayers had not pitied them and unlocked the last door standing between the lovers and freedom.

Once in the open air, Vivaldi and Ellena descended the mountains to the place where Paulo waited with the horses for their escape. Instead of taking the road toward Naples, the fugitives turned westward toward Aquila. That day, as they were resting at a shepherd's cabin, Paulo brought word that they were being pursued by two Carmelite friars. Eluding their pursuers, they rode toward Lake Celano, where Ellena took refuge for the night in the Ursuline convent and Vivaldi stayed in an establishment of Benedictines.

While these events were taking place, the marchese, who knew nothing of his wife's scheming with Schedoni, was suffering great anxiety over his son's possible whereabouts and welfare. The marchesa, on the other hand, was apprehensive only that Ellena would be found and her plans undone. When Schedoni suggested in his sly, indirect fashion that Ellena be put out of the way for good, she was at first horrified by his suggestion. Later she reconsidered and at last she and the sinister monk came to an understanding. Ellena was to die. Schedoni, who had spies everywhere, was not long in locating the fugitives. As Vivaldi and Ellena were about to be married in the chapel of San Sebastian at Celano, armed men broke into the church and arrested the two under a warrant of the Holy Inquisition. Ellena was charged with having broken her nun's vows and Vivaldi with having aided her escape. Vivaldi, although wounded in his struggle to prevent arrest, was carried to Rome and after a short hearing before the Inquisitor was imprisoned to await future trial and possible torture to extort a confession. Paulo, protesting against separation from his master, was also confined.

After the agents of the Inquisition had taken Vivaldi and Paulo away, Ellena's guards put her on a waiting horse and set out on a road which led toward the Adriatic. After traveling with little interruption for two nights and two days they came to a lonely house on the seashore. There she was turned over to a villainous looking man whom the guards called Spalatro and locked in a room in which the only furnishing was a tattered mattress on the floor. Exhausted, she fell asleep. Twice during the next day Spalatro came to her room, looked at her with a gaze that seemed a mixture of impatience and guilt, and then went away. At another time he took her to walk on the beach, where she met a monk whose face was hidden by his cowl. The monk was Schedoni. When he spoke to her, Ellena realized that he was neither a friend nor a protector but an enemy, and she fainted. Revived, she was returned to her room.

Schedoni was determined that Ellena should die that night. When Spalatro confessed pity for the girl and refused to be the executioner, Schedoni swore to do the deed himself. Going to the room where the girl was sleeping, he stood, dagger in hand, over her. Suddenly he bent to look closely at a miniature she wore about her neck. Agitated, he awoke Ellena and asked her if she knew whose portrait she wore. When she answered that it was the miniature of her father, Schedoni was even more shaken. He was convinced that he had discovered his lost daughter.

Overcome by remorse for his persecution of Ellena and the accusation which had exposed Vivaldi to the tortures of the Inquisition, Schedoni now tried to make amends. He and Ellena traveled as quickly as possible to Naples. After leaving the girl at the Villa Altieri, the monk hastened to the Vivaldis' palace and in an interview with the marchesa begged, without disclosing his connection with Ellena, that objections to Vivaldi's suit be withdrawn. When the marchesa proved inattentive, he determined to solemnize, without her consent, the nuptials of Vivaldi and Ellena.

Called a second time before the tribunal of the Inquisition, Vivaldi heard again among those present at the trial the voice which had warned him on earlier occasions against his visits to the Villa Altieri. That night a strange monk visited him in his cell and asked how long he had known Schedoni. The monk then instructed Vivaldi to reveal to the Inquisition that Schedoni was actually Count Ferando di Bruno, who had lived fifteen years in the disguise of a Dominican monk. He was also to ask that Ansaldo di Rovalli, the grand penitentiary of the Black Penitents, be called to testify to a confession he had heard in 1752. When Vivaldi was again brought before the Inquisition he did as he had been told, with the result that Schedoni was arrested on his way to Rome to intercede for Vivaldi's freedom.

At Schedoni's trial the mystery that linked the sinister father confessor and the two lovers was made clear. Years before, Schedoni, then a splendorful younger son known as the Count di Marinella, had schemed to possess himself of his brother's title, his unencumbered estate, and his beautiful wife. He had arranged to have his brother, the Count di Bruno, assassinated by Spalatro and had contrived a story that the count had perished while returning from a journey to Greece. After a proper season of mourning he had solicited the hand of his brother's widow. When she rejected him his passion had caused him to carry her off by force. Although the lady had retrieved her honor by marriage, she continued to look on her new husband with disdain, and in his jealousy he became convinced that she was unfaithful. One day, returning unexpectedly, he found a visitor with his wife. Drawing his stiletto with the intention of attacking the guest, he struck and killed his wife instead. This was the confession which had so agitated the grand penitentiary, for he himself had been the guest and for him an innocent woman had died.

Further proof was the dying confession of Spalatro, whose death had been caused by a wound inflicted by Schedoni. Condemned to die for plotting his brother's death, Schedoni still persisted in his declaration that Ellena was his daughter. This mystery was cleared up by Sister Olivia, who in the meantime had removed to the Convent of Santa Maria della Pietà. The nun was the unfortunate Countess di Bruno and the sister of Signora Bianchi. Her wound had not been mortal, but the report of her death had been given out in order to protect her from her vengeful husband. Wishing to withdraw from the world, she had entrusted her daughter by the first Count di Bruno and an infant daughter by the second to Signora Bianchi. The infant had died within a year.

Ellena, who knew nothing of this story, had been mistaken in her belief that the miniature was that of her father, and it was on her word that Schedoni had claimed her as his daughter. It was also revealed that Father Nicola, who had collected the evidence against Schedoni, had been the mysterious monk whose ghostly warnings Vivaldi heard under the arch of the old fortress. Appalled by the father confessor's villainy, he had turned against him after being wounded by Paulo's pistol on the night of the midnight search.

Schedoni had his final revenge. In some manner he administered a fatal dose of poison to Father Nicola and then died.

of the same mysterious drug In his last moments he boasted that he was escaping an ignominious death at the hands of the Inquisition

Because of Schedoni's dying confession, Vivaldi was immediately set free During his imprisonment the marchesa had died repentant of the harm she had plotted against Ellena Now the marchese, overjoyed to be reunited with his son, withdrew all objections to Vivaldi's suit With all doubts of Ellena's birth and goodness removed, he went in per son to the Convent of Santa Maria della Pietà and asked Sister Olivia for her daughter's hand in the name of his son Vivaldi and Ellena were married in the convent church in the presence of the marchese and Sister Olivia As a mark of special favor Paulo was allowed to be present when his master took Ellena for his wife If it had not been for the holy precincts and the solemnity of the occasion the faithful fellow would have thrown his cap into the air and shouted that this was indeed a happy day

Jennie Gerhardt, like other of Dreiser's novels, tells the story of a beautiful and vital young girl who is beaten by the forces of life Jennie's nobility, her willingness to sacrifice herself for her family and others, is part of the reason why she finds herself cast off by society and victimized by the accident of her humble birth The forces that defeat Jennie are not malign or cruel (her seducers, for example, do not toy with her cynically and cast her aside), rather, these forces are accidental and inevitable, yielding the notion that all human life is diverted from its purpose and its self control by the casual forces of nature Jennie, in

Dreiser's terms, neither sins nor is overwhelmingly sinned against things simply do not work out happily for the heroine in Dreiser's naturalistic world This novel again demonstrates the inevitable play of external forces that are stronger than man's will or purpose The full social and economic details of the work provide an interesting picture of urban life in the Middle West at the end of the nineteenth century

German family in Columbus, Ohio, in 1880. Her father, a glass blower, was ill, and Jennie and her mother were forced to work at a local hotel in order to provide for the younger children in the family. Jennie did the laundry for the kind and handsome Senator Brander (he was fifty-two at the time), and attracted his eye. Senator Brander was kind to Jennie and her family. When he was able to keep Jennie's brother Sebastian out of jail for stealing some needed coal from the railroad, Jennie, full of gratitude, allowed him to sleep with her. Senator Brander, struck by Jennie's beauty, charm, and goodness, promised to marry her. He died suddenly, however, while on a trip to Washington.

Left alone, Jennie discovered that she was pregnant. Her father, a stern Lutheran, insisted that she leave the house, but her more understanding mother allowed her to return when her father, now in better health, left to find work in Youngstown. Jennie's child was a daughter whom she named Vesta. At Sebastian's suggestion, the family moved to Cleveland to find work. While her mother looked after Vesta, Jennie found a job as a maid in the home of Mrs. Bracebridge. One of Mrs. Bracebridge's guests, Lester Kane, the son of a rich carriage manufacturer, found Jennie temptingly attractive. When he tried to seduce Jennie, the girl, though greatly attracted to him, managed to put off his advances.

Mr. Gerhardt was injured in a glass blowing accident and lost the use of both of his hands. Again, the family needed money badly and Jennie decided to accept Lester's offer of aid for her family. The price was that she become his mistress, go on a trip to New York with him, and then allow him to establish her in an apartment in Chicago. Although Jennie loved Lester, she knew that he did not intend to marry her because his family would be horrified at such an alliance, but once again she sacrificed her virtue because she felt that her family needed the offered aid. After Jennie had become Lester's mistress, he gave her family money for a house. Jennie was afraid, however, to tell Lester about the existence of her daughter Vesta.

Jennie and Lester moved to Chicago and lived there. Her family began to suspect that, contrary to what Jennie had told them, she and Lester were not married. When Mrs. Gerhardt died, several years later, Jennie moved Vesta to Chicago and boarded the child in another woman's house. One night Jennie was called because Vesta was seriously ill, and Lester discovered Vesta's existence. Although upset at first, when Jennie told him the story, Lester understood and agreed to allow Vesta to live with them. They soon moved to a house in Hyde Park, a middle class residential district in Chicago. Mr. Gerhardt, now old and ill and willing to accept the situation between Jennie and Lester, also came to live with them and to tend the furnace and the lawn.

Although they were constantly aware of the increasing disapproval of Lester's family, Jennie and Lester lived happily for a time. Lester's father, violently opposed to the relationship with Jennie, whom he had never met, threatened to disinherit Lester if he did not leave her. Lester's brother Robert urged his father on and attempted to persuade Lester to abandon Jennie. Nevertheless, Lester felt that he owed his allegiance, as well as his love, to her, and he remained with her in spite of the fact that they were snubbed by most of Lester's society connections.

When Lester's father died, still believing that his son's relationship with Jennie demonstrated irresponsibility, he left Lester's share of the estate in trust with Robert. Lester was given three alternatives: he could leave Jennie and receive all his money, he could marry Jennie and receive only $10,000 a year for life, or he could continue his present arrangement with the knowledge that if he did not either abandon or marry Jennie within three years, he would lose his share of the money. Characteristically, Lester hesitated. He took Jennie to Europe, where they met Mrs. Letty Pace Gerald, a beautiful and accomplished widow who had been Lester's childhood sweetheart and who was still fond of him. In the meantime Robert had expanded the carnage business into a monopoly and eased Lester into a subordinate position. When Lester returned to Chicago, he decided to attempt to make an independent future for himself and Jennie. He put a good deal of money into a real estate deal and lost it. Mrs. Gerald also moved to Chicago in pursuit of Lester.

After old Mr. Gerhardt died, Jennie found herself in a difficult situation. Lester, out of the family business because of her, was finding it difficult to earn a living. Mrs. Gerald and Robert's lawyers kept pressing her to release him, claiming this suggestion was for his own economic and social good. Jennie, always altruistic, began to influence Lester to leave her. Before long both were convinced that separation was the only solution so that Lester could return to the family business. Finally Lester left Jennie. Later he set up a house and an income for her and Vesta in a cottage an hour or so from the center of Chicago.

Once more established in the family business, Lester married Mrs. Gerald. Six months after Lester had left Jennie, Vesta, a fourteen year old girl already showing a good deal of sensitivity and talent, died of typhoid fever.

Jennie, calling herself Mrs. Stover, moved to the city and adopted two orphan children. Five years passed. Jennie, although still in love with Lester, accepted her quiet life. At last she was able to cope with experience in whatever terms it presented itself to her, even though she had never been able to impose her will on experience in any meaningful way.

One night, Lester, having suffered a heart attack while in Chicago on some business matters, sent for Jennie. His wife was in Europe and could not reach Chicago for three weeks. Jennie tended Lester throughout his last illness. One day he confessed that he had always loved her, that he had made a mistake ever to permit the forces of business and family pressure to make him leave her. Jennie felt that his final confession, his statement that he should never have left her, indicated a kind of spiritual union and left her with something that she could value for the rest of her life. Lester died. Jennie realized that she would now be forced to live through many years that could promise no salvation, no new excitement—that would simply impose themselves upon her as had the years in the past. She was resolved to accept her loneliness because she knew there was nothing else for her to do.

Jennie went to see Lester's coffin loaded on the train. She realized then, even more clearly, that man was simply a stiff figure, moved about by circumstance. Virtue, beauty, moral worth could not save man, nor could evil or degeneracy. Man simply yielded and managed the best he could under the circumstances of his nature, the society, and the economic force that surrounded him.

Critique

Few writers since Shakespeare have managed to use the dramatic form with the poetic clarity and tragic force exhibited by the Austrian playwright, Franz Grillparzer. Usually the form is too much for the content or the content overburdens the play, giving to exposition the prominence that the expression of passion should have. Grillparzer avoids these faults, and contributes new psychological and moral perspectives which give his work its distinctive quality. The Jewess of Toledo tells of a monarch's lapse from duty because of his sudden passionate affection for a beautiful but vain young Jewess. With a simplicity of effect that defies analysis, Grillparzer makes the king's discovery of his own foolish bond age credible, without in the least detracting from the impression that Rachel, the Jewess, for all her faults, was undeniably charming and even to be pitied.

The Story

Isaac, a Jew, found himself in the royal gardens of Toledo with his two daughters, Rachel and Esther. Realizing that the king was about to visit the gardens and that no Jews should be there during the royal outing, he urged his daughters to hurry from the gardens. Rachel laughingly refused, declaring that she would stay and see if the king was as young and handsome as she had heard. Isaac answered that Rachel was like her mother, for his second wife had found the Christians charming and had had eyes for nothing but fine clothing, jewels, and banquets. Esther, on the other hand, was like her mother, Isaac's first wife, who had been as good as she was poor.

Rachel sang and danced about while waiting for the king. She told her father that perhaps the monarch would find her charming, would pinch her cheek and make the queen jealous. Isaac, frightened more than ever, hastened to leave the gardens with Esther.

When King Alfonso appeared, he invited the crowds to draw near him. He explained that the people had made him king while he had been still a child that they had rallied around him in order to depose his uncle, a tyrant, and that they had then taught him the duties of one who would be just and good. Count Manrique turned to Queen Eleanor and told her of the people's affection for their ruler. The count declared that the present king was the noblest of all who ever ruled in Spain, turning aside petty criticism with wisdom and justice. The king, half jesting, replied that he might be an even better king if he were forced to overcome some fault. He suggested that the protection of the people might have kept him from developing the moral strength a ruler should have.

The king also urged everyone to enjoy the respite between wars, for the Moors were about to start another attempt to invade Spain. He called his wife's attention to the English type garden he had ordered, he was disappointed that she had not noticed it.

A messenger, Don Garceran, the son of Count Manrique, brought news of the military preparations being made by Jussuf, the ruler of Morocco. Don Garceran was making his first appearance before the king since being assigned to a frontier post for having stolen into the women's quarters of the palace to view Doña Clara, his betrothed

When the king suggested that the peasants pray to God for victory, Don Garceran replied that the churches were crowded, such was the religious zeal of the people. One sign of mistaken zeal, however, was the rough treatment sometimes given the Jews.

As the king was vowing to protect the Jews and all other of his subjects, he received word that a Jew and two girls were being pursued by the guards. Rachel came running to the group for protection. When Queen Eleanor refused to take her hands, she threw down her bracelet and necklace as ransom and clasped the king's knees. King Alfonso asked Esther, who had joined them, whether Rachel was always timid, and Esther replied that her sister was often too bold, too much the clown. The king, attracted by Rachel, ordered Don Garceran to shelter her in one of the garden houses until night, when there would be no danger of mob action.

After Don Garceran had escorted Isaac and his daughters to a shelter in the garden, the king accosted Don Garceran, questioning him about the family, praising the Jews for their long history, and begging for information about the art of casual love. Isaac, scolding his daughters for not attempting to leave, came from the garden house. He told Don Garceran that Rachel was her old self again, laughing and singing, and amusing herself by dressing herself as a queen with some masquerade costumes she had found.

Vowing Don Garceran and Isaac to silence, the king entered the garden house in time to observe Rachel, dressed as a queen, pretending to address a portrait of Alfonso which she had removed from its frame. In the role of the queen, Rachel accused the king in the portrait of having been attracted to the Jewess. The monarch interrupted this play and assured the frightened girl that he did indeed like her and that after the war he might ask for her. He asked her to return the portrait to its frame, but she refused. At that moment the arrival of the queen and the royal party forced the king to hide in another room. Count Manrique would have discovered him had not Don Garceran intercepted his father and, in the king's name, put an end to the search.

When the king reappeared after the queen's departure, he realized how he had already shamed himself because of the Jewess, and he asked her to return the portrait and leave with Don Garceran. After she had gone, he found that she had put her own portrait in the frame. The king was instantly stirred by the picture as if some magical spell surrounded it. In confusion, he first ordered his servant to go after Don Garceran and demand the return of his portrait; then he decided to go himself. He also asked about the Castle Retiro where a former king had kept a Moorish girl, but he could not copy such baseness. Finally, giving in to his passion, he went after Rachel.

Later, at Castle Retiro, Isaac was dealing with petitioners to the king, forcing them to pay heavily for the privilege of having their messages conveyed. Rachel complained that King Alfonso did not give enough time to her, and she was upset because her dallying with Don Garceran did not make him jealous. Esther arrived with the news that Queen Eleanor, Count Manrique, and other noblemen were joining in counsel, apparently plotting a revolt against the king. The king, already feeling guilty about neglecting the preparation for war, quickly left with Don Garceran for Toledo. Rachel, convinced that the king had never loved her, found no satisfaction in her perfumes and jewels.

Count Manrique and the noblemen, with the queen present, considered how to deal with the Jewess. Buying her off with gold was suggested, but the king had gold to give her. Imprisoning her would be useless, for the king had the power to release her. Finally, Count Manrique turned to the queen, who softly suggested that death was the answer, death for the woman who had broken the laws of God. Don Garceran interrupted the proceedings with an order from the king to dissolve the meeting. Count Manrique, dismissing the nobles, told them to be prepared for action. He then urged his son to join the rebellion, but Don Garceran refused. The count and the others left.

The king then prevailed upon the queen to listen to him. In a heartfelt conversation he admitted his guilt, calling attention to the changes of heart and mind that are inevitable for man. But the queen was reluctant to place the entire blame on her husband. She accused the girl of using shameless magic. In anger, King Alfonso defended Rachel as one who, for all her faults, had never pretended to a lifeless virtue that made life empty of warmth. He criticized the queen for encouraging his nobles to conspire against him.

The king discovered that the queen had left while he was talking. In growing apprehension he pursued the vassals to Castle Retiro. He arrived too late. The castle was in ruins, and Isaac and Esther told him that Rachel had been killed. To fire his desire for vengeance, the king viewed her body, but the sight of her reminded him not of her charm but of her wanton guile. Reaffirming his duty to the people, he forgave Count Manrique and the others when they appeared, swordless, to learn their punishment. He made his infant son king, with the queen as regent, and set forth for war against the Moors. Esther, at first cynical about the quick atonement of the Christian king, was appalled to find that her father was more concerned about his gold than he was over the tragic event that had involved them all. She confessed that she, her father, and Rachel were as guilty as the Christians.

A Jovial Crew, or, The Merry Beggars is a good-natured, unpretentious comedy. It presents a world filled with pleasantly unreal problems that permit equally unreal solutions, a world populated with eccentric gentry and philosophic beggars.

Light, gay entertainment was the author's goal, and he attained it.

The Story

Squire Oldrents had ample reason to be happy: he owned a large estate from which he received a good income he was beloved by the rich for his warm hospitality and by the poor for his generosity he had two lovely daughters who were being courted by two very presentable young gentlemen But the joy that he derived from these blessings was suddenly destroyed by a fortune teller's prediction that Oldrents' daughters would become beggars Oldrents' friend Hearty, a gentleman who had seen better days but who always looked on the bright side of things, tried to cheer up the old man As a result of his persuasiveness, Oldrents resolved to put on, at least, an outward show of good spirits

A second source of worry for the squire was his steward, Springlove As a youth Springlove had been a beggar, until Oldrents took him in and schooled him During winters, Springlove had always been very diligent in his work But with the arrival of May, every year he found some pretext to leave home One year Oldrents met Springlove begging on the highway and thus discovered how his summers were spent To break the young man of his wanderings, Oldrents had made him his steward, a position in which Springlove had done well But now it was nearly May again, and Springlove announced that the call of nature was too insistent, and he must go a begging

One of Oldrents' charities was the maintenance of an old barn as a guest house for wandering beggars Rachel and Menel, his daughters, had long watched these beggars and envied them their complete freedom The girls were bored with their home life and further depressed by the low spirits of their father Thus developed their plan for going with the beggars Their two lovers, Vincent and Hilliard, who were afraid of losing the girls, agreed to accompany them When they announced their intention to Springlove, he revealed the prophecy Oldrents had received Now the girls felt that a brief sojourn with the beggars would have the additional advantage of bringing peace of mind to their father In a letter to the old man they disclosed their project, but he, fearing that its contents might destroy his resolution to be happy, refused to open it

The first night on the road dispelled any romantic notions that the four amateur beggars had about their new life The two men, having spent an uneasy and sleepless night, would have gladly returned home, but they did not wish to give the appearance of softness The girls, having been housed in a pigsty, were equally disillusioned, but they resolved not to be the first to show signs of weakening

Despite Springlove's instructions, the amateurs had little success in their first attempts at begging because they lacked the requisite humility Approaching two gentlemen, Vincent, after first being tongue tied, asked for such a large sum that they drove him off with their swords Hilliard, also asking for a large sum, was switched, thereupon, in very unbeggarly manner, he demanded satisfaction of his chastiser, a man named Oliver This same Oliver had noticed the two girls and had been filled with lust Finding them alone he gave them money, kissed them, and then tried to drag Rachel behind some bushes But his intentions were frustrated by the arrival of the men in response to her screams After he had restrained Vincent and Hilliard, Springlove, knowing that Oliver would be too ashamed to do so, suggested that he get a beadle to punish the girls

The next travelers the beggars encountered were Martin and Amie Amie had left home to escape marriage with Master Talboy, a marriage that her uncle, Master Clack, had tried to force upon her Martin, the justice's clerk, seeing a chance to advance his own position, had agreed to run away with her Now that she had had a better opportunity to observe Martin, she had begun to doubt the wisdom of her action When they encountered the beggars, they were hungry and unhappy Springlove gave them food and offered to get a curate to marry them

Amie, impressed by his solicitude, decided to remain temporarily with the beggars

Meanwhile, a search for the runaways was in progress. Among the searchers was Oliver and the rejected lover, Talbot. Their pursuit brought them to the home of Oldrents. The squire, still doggedly attempting to banish sorrow from his life, despite the loss of his daughters, welcomed them with song and drink. But Talbot, with his incessant weeping and sighing, disturbed the old man. On a sudden whim, Oldrents decided to visit Master Clack, who he had heard was an odd character.

Officials, in the meantime, stopped and questioned the beggars on suspicion of harboring the fugitives. This trouble with the law was the final blow to the four amateurs, who now gave up any further pretense of liking this kind of life. When the constable threatened to beat Springlove until he disclosed Amie's where abouts, she, having fallen in love with him, revealed herself. Amie was then returned home, and the beggars were arrested.

When the beggars were brought to Master Clack's home, Oldrents was there. The justice at first contemplated dire punishment for the vagrants, but, when he heard that they could present a drama, he saw a chance to entertain Oldrents without expense. In a play concerning two lost daughters and a vagrant steward, Rachel, Meriel, and Springlove played the leading roles. Oldrents was ecstatic at being reunited with his daughters, and his joy was increased by the revelation that Springlove was, in reality, his illegitimate son. Springlove, because of this disclosure and because of his intention of marrying Amie, announced that he would beg no more. Thus, the last of Oldrents' worries was over, and the old man again had his full measure of contentment.

Sean O'Casey's plays mark the culmination of the Irish dramatic renaissance, which had begun as a part of the European movement toward realistic theater in opposition to the French romantic drama, but which diverged from the dramaturgic techniques of Ibsen and Shaw. Believing that Continental and English dramas were too intellectualized, O'Casey, along with his compatriots Yeats and Synge, tried to make the drama in individualistic and realistic by drenching it in Irish local color. Formlessness—ignoring formal dramatic technique to reflect the vigor and vitality of life—was O'Casey's unique contribution to the Irish movement. In Juno and the Paycock he reached a new peak of realism. He dispensed with an elaborate plot, ideas, and consistency of character, content merely to show characters, Irish characters, in action.

The Story

Waiting for "Captain" Jack Boyle to come in from his morning visit to the pub, Mary Boyle and her mother, Juno, discussed the newspaper account of the murder of Robbie Tancred, a fanatic Irish Republican. Johnny Boyle, who himself had been shot in the hip and had lost an arm fighting against the Free State, left the living room of the tenancy after denouncing the two women for their morbid insensitivity. Juno scolded Mary for participating in the Trades Union Strike, especially at a time when the family was in debt for food, but Mary defended her activities, and her brother's as well, as matters of principle.

When Jerry Devine rushed in with a message from Father Farrell, who had found a job for Boyle, Juno sent Jerry to look for her husband at his favorite bar. Soon afterward she heard her husband and his crony, "Joxer" Daly, singing on the stairs. She hid behind the bed curtains so as to catch them talking about her. Disclosing herself, she frightened Joxer away and berated her husband for his laziness and malingering. Jerry returned and delivered his message to Boyle, who immediately developed a case of stabbing pains in his legs. Juno, not deceived, ordered him to change into his working clothes. She then left for her own job.

Jerry accosted Mary, complained of her unfriendliness, and once again proposed to her. Although Jerry offered her love and security, Mary refused him, and both left in a huff.

Ignoring his wife's instructions to apply for the job, Boyle, leisurely proceeding to get his breakfast, was rejoined by Joxer. Absorbed in their talk, they refused to acknowledge a loud knocking at the street door, though the continuance of it seemed to upset young Johnny Boyle. Their rambling discourse on family life, the clergy, literature, and the sea was interrupted by Juno and Mary, who had returned with Charlie Bentham, a school teacher and amateur lawyer, to announce that a cousin had bequeathed £2,000 to Boyle. Boyle declared that he was through with Joxer and the like, whereupon Joxer, who had been hiding outside the window, reappeared, expressed his indignation, and left.

Two days later the two cronies had been reconciled, Joxer having served as Boyle's agent for loans based on expectations of the inheritance. The entrance of Juno and Mary with a new gramophone was followed by that of Bentham, now Mary's fiancé. Over family tea, Bentham explained his belief in theosophy and ghosts. Johnny, visibly upset by this conversation about death, left the room but quickly returned, twitching and trembling. He was convinced that he had seen the bloody ghost of Robbie Tancred kneeling before the statue of the Virgin.

The arrival of Joxer with Mrs. Madigan, a garrulously reminiscient neighbor, smoothed over the incident. A party featuring whiskey and song ensued. The revelry was interrupted by Mrs. Tancred and some neighbors, on their way to Robbie Tancred's funeral. Soon there after the merriment was again dispelled, this time by the funeral procession in the street. A young man, an Irregular Mobilizer, came looking for Johnny, whom he reproached for not attending the funeral. He ordered Johnny to appear at a meeting called for the purpose of inquiring into Tancred's death.

Two months later, Juno insisted on taking Mary to the doctor, for the girl seemed to be pining away over Bentham, who had disappeared.

After the women had left, Joxer and Nugent, a tailor, slipped into the apartment. Having learned that Boyle would not receive the inheritance, Nugent had come to get the suit which he had sold to Boyle on credit. Taking the suit from a chair, Nugent scoffed at Boyle's promise to pay and his order for a new topcoat as well.

Joxer, who had sneaked out unseen, returned, hypocrite that he was, to commiserate with Boyle. Mrs. Madigan, who had also heard that Boyle would not receive his inheritance, arrived to collect the three pounds she had lent him. Rebuffed, she appropriated the gramophone and left, followed by Joxer.

News of Boyle's misadventure spread rapidly, two men arrived to remove the new but unpaid-for furniture. Mrs. Boyle ran out to find her husband.

Mary having returned, Jerry Devine came to see her. Again he proposed. Although he was willing to forget that Mary had jilted him for Bentham, he recoiled at her admission that she was pregnant.

Left alone with the two moving men, Johnny imagined that he felt a bullet wound in his chest. At that moment two armed Irish Irregulars entered the apartment and accused Johnny of informing on Robbie Tancred to the gang that had murdered him. Ignoring Johnny's protestations of innocence and loyalty, the men dragged him out. A little later, Mrs. Madigan notified Mary and Juno that the police were waiting below, requesting that Juno identify a body. Juno and Mary left vowing never to return to the worthless Boyle.

Soon Boyle and Joxer stumbled into the abandoned apartment, both very drunk and unaware of Johnny's death or Juno and Mary's desertion. Joxer stretched out on the bed. Boyle slumped on the floor. With thick tongues they stammered out their patriotic devotion to Ireland, and Boyle deplored the miserable state of the world.

Critique

The Kalevala, which may be roughly translated as "The Land of Heroes," is a long narrative poem fashioned by the Finnish scholar, Elias Lonnrot, from the folk legends and oral traditions of his country. It is the national epic of Finland and as such ranks with those of other nations whose mythologies are better known. In legend, the ancestor of all the heroes is Kaleva, but he never appears in the stories. Aside from giving the poem its title, Kaleva constitutes one of its few unifying principles, for, like most folk epics, the work lacks unity and cohesion, being the product of many hands and voices over hundreds of years. Nevertheless, the tales of Vainamoinen, Ilmarinen, and Lemminkäinen are told with great beauty, simplicity and poetic force. Lonnrot performed a tremendous task in gathering the many tales, editing them, arranging them, and even writing connective material. From a purely literary standpoint, his monumental production, peculiar because of its relatively late formation, stands as a worthy representation of the early culture of a civilization little known to Western readers.

The Story

After his mother had created the land, the sun, and the moon out of sea duck eggs, Vainamoinen was born, and with the help of Sampsa Pellervoinen he made the barren land fruitful by sowing seeds and planting trees. By the time Vainamoinen was an old man he had gained great fame as a singer and charmer. When a brash young man named Joukahainen challenged him to a duel of magic songs, Vainamoinen easily won and forced the young man to give him his sister Aino for a wife. But Aino was greatly saddened at having to marry an old man and so she drowned herself to Vainamoinen's sorrow. He looked all over the sea for her and found her at last in the form of a salmon, but in that form she escaped him forever.

In time he heard of the beautiful daughters of Louhi in the far North Country and he decided to seek them out. On the way to Pohjola, the land of Louhi, his horse was killed by the bold young man whom he had defeated in the duel of songs, and Vainamoinen was forced to swim to Pohjola. Louhi, the witch, found him on the beach, restored his health, told him that he would have to forge a magic Sampo in order to win a daughter, and then sent him on his way.

daughters seated on a rainbow and asked her to become his wife. She gave him three tasks to do. After completing two he was wounded in the knee while trying to complete the third. The wound, which bled profusely, was healed by a magic ointment prepared under the directions of an old man skilled in leechcraft. Vainamoinen went home and raised a great wind to carry Ilmarinen, the mighty smith who had forged the sky, into the North Country to make the Sampo for Louhi. Ilmarinen forged the Sampo but still Louhi's daughter refused to marry and leave her homeland. Ilmarinen, also in love with the maiden, went sadly home.

A gallant youth, Lemminkäinen, was famous for winning the love of women. Having heard of Kyllikki, the flower of Saari, he was determined to win her for his wife. When he arrived in Esthonia she refused him, and he abducted her. They lived happily together until one day she disobeyed him. In retaliation he went north to seek one of Louhi's daughters as his wife. In Pohjola, Lemminkäinen charmed everyone except an evil herdsman whom he scorned. Like Vainamoinen, he was given three tasks and performed the first two without much difficulty, but while trying to complete the third he was slain by the evil herdsman. Alarmed by his long absence, his mother went searching for him, found him in pieces at the bottom of a river and restored him finally to his original shape.

Meanwhile, Vainamoinen was busy building a ship by means of magic, his third task for Louhi's daughter, when he found that he had forgotten the three magic words needed to complete the work. He searched everywhere for them and was almost trapped in Tuonela, the kingdom of death. Then he heard that the giant Vipunen might know them. When they met, Vipunen swallowed him, but Vainamoinen caused the giant so much pain that the creature was forced to release him and reveal the magic charm. With the charm Vainamoinen

moinen completed his ship and again set sail for Pohjola

Ilmarinen, learning of Vainamoinen's departure, started after him on horseback. When they met they agreed to abide by the maiden's choice. On their arrival at Pohjola, Louhi gave Ilmarinen three tasks to perform: to plow a field of snakes, to capture a bear and a wolf, and to catch a great pike. Ilmarinen performed these tasks. Since Vainamoinen was old, Louhi's daughter chose Ilmarinen for her husband. There was great rejoicing at the marriage. Vainamoinen sang for the bridal couple. A gigantic ox was slain and mead was brewed, and the bride and groom were both instructed in the duties of marriage. At last Ilmarinen took his new bride to his home in the south.

Meanwhile Lemminkainen had not been invited to the festivities because of his quarrelsome nature, and he was therefore angry. Although his mother warned him of the dangers he would have to face on the journey and of Louhi's treachery, he insisted on going to Pohjola. With his magic charms he was able to overcome all dangers along the way. In Pohjola, Louhi tried to kill him with snake-poisoned ale, but Lemminkainen saw through the trick. Then he and Louhi's husband engaged in a duel of magic which ended in a tie. Finally they fought with swords and Lemminkainen slew Louhi's husband. Lemminkainen then turned into an eagle and flew home. In fear of retribution he took his mother's advice and went to live for several years on an obscure island where the only inhabitants were women, their warrior husbands being away from home.

Forced to flee when the time came for the husbands to return, Lemminkainen set out for his own land in a boat. The craft turned over and he was forced to swim to shore. On reaching home he found the country desolate and his mother missing. At last he found her hiding in the forest. Swearing to avenge himself on the warriors of Pohjola who had desolated the land, he set sail with Tiera, a warrior companion, but Louhi sent the frost to destroy him. Although Lemminkainen managed to charm the frost, he and his companion were shipwrecked and were forced to retreat.

The wife of Kalervo had been carried off by her brother-in-law, Untamoinen, who then laid waste to Kalervo's land. In the cradle Kullervo, born to Kalervo's wife, swore to be avenged on his uncle. Kullervo grew up strong, but so stupid and clumsy that he broke or ruined everything he touched. He tried to kill his uncle and his uncle tried to kill him. Finally, the uncle gave him to Ilmarinen. Ilmarinen's wife immediately disliked the boy and gave him a loaf of bread with a stone in it. In return, while Ilmarinen was away from home, Kullervo had her killed by wild beasts. He then fled into the forest, where he found his parents and lived with them for a long time. He performed all his chores badly. After a time he set out on a journey. Two women having refused him, he ravished a third, only to learn that she was his sister. In anguish she killed herself and Kullervo returned home in sorrow. When his family rejected him, he set off to attack Untamoinen. After killing his uncle he returned to find his family dead and the countryside desolate. He wandered off into the forest and killed himself by falling on his sword.

Ilmarinen, after weeping for his dead wife, made up his mind to get another in his forge. He fashioned a woman out of gold and silver, but she remained cold and lifeless, so Ilmarinen went north again to Pohjola. When Louhi refused to give him a wife, he abducted one of her daughters. This wife soon proved unfaithful and in anger he turned her into a seagull.

Meanwhile, Vainamoinen had been thinking about the Sampo, that magic mill which ground out riches. Determined to steal it from Louhi, he built a ship and Ilmarinen forged a sword for him, and the two heroes started for Pohjola. On the way Lemminkainen called to them from the shore and asked to accompany them. They took him along. During the voyage the boat struck a giant pike. Vainamoinen killed the great fish and from its bones fashioned a harp with which he sang everyone in Pohjola to sleep. With the help of an ox the three heroes took the Sampo and sailed for home. In the meantime Louhi had awakened and sent fog and wind after the heroes. During the storm Vainamoinen's harp fell overboard.

Louhi and her men followed in a war-boat. The two boats met in a great battle. Although Vainamoinen was victorious, Louhi dragged the Sampo from his boat into the lake. There it broke into pieces, most of which sank to the bottom. Only a few smaller pieces floated to shore. After making violent threats against Kalevala, Louhi returned home with only a small and useless fragment of the Sampo. Vainamoinen collected the pieces on the shore and planted them for good luck; the land became more fruitful. Having searched in vain for his lost harp, Vainamoinen made another of birchwood and his songs to its music gave joy to every one.

Vexed because her land was barren after the loss of the Sampo, Louhi sent a terrible pestilence to Kalevala, but Vainamoinen healed the people by magic and salves. Next she sent a great bear to ravish the herds, but Vainamoinen killed the savage beast.

Louhi stole the moon and the sun which had come down to earth to hear Vainamoinen play and sing. She also stole the fire from all the hearths of Kalevala. When Ukko, the supreme god, kindled a new fire for the sun and the moon, some of it fell to earth and was swallowed by a fish in a large lake. Vainamoinen and Ilmarinen finally found the fish and Ilmarinen was badly burned. The fire escaped and burned a great area of country until it was at last captured and returned to the hearths of Kalevala. Ilmarinen, recovered from his burns, prepared great chains for Louhi and frightened her into restoring the sun and the moon to the heavens.

Marjatta, a holy woman and a virgin, swallowed a cranberry and a son was born to her in a stable. The child was baptized as the King of Carelia despite Vainamoinen's claim that such an ill-omened child should be put to death. Angered because the child proved wiser than he, Vainamoinen sailed away to a land between the earth and the sky, leaving behind him, for the pleasure of his people, his harp and his songs.

DAS KAPITAL

Type of work Political economy

Author Karl Marx (1818-1883)

First published Vol I, 1867 Vols II and III, edited by Friedrich Engels, 1885-1894

If Marx was right, the Russian revolution was inevitable and the world-wide growth of communism is also inevitable, therefore, even if Das Kapital had never been written, the world would have been split by revolution and by the emergence of communism as a dynamic political force. But it may be that Marx was mistaken, and that the emergence of communism would not have been possible had it not been for the labors of Marx in the British Museum which resulted in the writing and publication of Das Kapital. Even if economic unbalance had resulted in a revolutionary uprising of the proletariat in Russia or elsewhere, it probably would not have taken the form it did, or occurred when it did, or had the subsequent world-wide effect that it has had, had Marx not written Das Kapital. To write that this book has been world-shaking, then, is but to speak the truth.

Many of Marx's revolutionary ideas had already been expressed in the Com

Communist Manifesto (1848) which he wrote with Friedrich Engels, but Das Kapital was more than another call to arms, it was an attempt to base communism on a theory of political economy which could be scientifically and dialectically defended. The Manifesto is a passionate document, an outline of a political philosophy, and something of a prophecy, but Das Kapital is a scholar's treatise, the product of years of research and reflection, a work of economic theory that continues to challenge professional economists. This contrast is illuminating, for the Communist movement has always been characterized by contrast: the intellectual leads the laborers, the reasoned defense is supplemented by violence and murder, and the scholar's program comes alive in revolution and the threat of war.

In the Manifesto, Marx and Engels argued that the history of all societies has been a history of class struggles, that the struggle had become one between the bourgeois class and the proletariat, that all the injustices of society result from the economic advantage the bourgeoisie have over the proletariat, that the proletariat would finally rebel and take over the means of production, forming a classless society, a dictatorship of the proletariat.

In Das Kapital, Marx uses a dialectic method which was inspired by Hegel, even though it is put to a different use. Marx claimed that his dialectic method was the "direct opposite" of Hegel's, that with Hegel the dialectic "is standing on its head" and "must be turned right side up again, if you would discover the rational kernel within the mystical shell." The method is not mysterious, it involves attending to the conflicting aspects of matters under consideration in order to be able to attain a better idea of the whole. Thus, Marx describes his "rational" dialectic as including "in its comprehension and affirmative recognition of the existing state of things, at the same time, also, the recognition of the negation of that state, of its inevitable breaking up." He went on to maintain that his account regarded "every historically developed social form as in fluid movement, and therefore takes into account its transient nature not less than its momentary existence."

In Marx the dialectic method led to "dialectical materialism," the theory that history is the record of class struggles, the conflict of economic opposites.

Das Kapital begins with a study of commodities and money. Marx distinguishes between use value and value, the latter being understood in terms of exchange value but involving essentially the amount of labor that went into the production of the commodity, thus, "that which determines the magnitude of the value of any article is the amount of labour socially necessary, or the labour time socially necessary for its production."

Money results from the use of some special commodity as a means of exchange in order to equate different products of labor. Money serves as "a universal measure of value." According to Marx, it is not money that makes commodities commensurable, but the fact of their being commensurable in terms of human labor that makes money possible as a measure of value.

Money begets money through the circulation of commodities: this is Marx's general formula for capital. Money is the first form in which capital appears precisely because it is the end product of a circulatory process which begins with the use of money to purchase commodities for sale at higher than the purchase price.

Capital would not be possible without a change of value. If money were used to purchase a commodity sold at the initial price, no profit would be made, no capital made possible. To explain the surplus value that emerges in the process, Marx reminds the reader that the capitalist buys labor power and uses it. The material of production belongs to the capitalist, therefore the product of the productive process also belongs to him. The product has a use-value, but the capitalist does not intend to use the product his interest is in selling it for a price greater than the sum of the costs of its production, including the cost of labor. The realization of surplus value is possible, finally, only by some sort of exploitation of the laborer, somehow or other the capitalist must manage to make the cost of labor less than the value of labor

One way of increasing surplus value is by increasing the productiveness of labor without decreasing the work day, but the problem which then arises is the problem of keeping the price of commodities up. One solution takes the form of using large numbers of laborers and dividing them for special tasks. The capitalist takes advantage of lower prices of commodities by paying labor less and purchasing materials more cheaply. At the same time, through a division of labor, he achieves greater productiveness without a corresponding rise in labor cost. In other words, the capitalist hires an individual and puts him to work in cooperation with others; he pays for the labor power of that individual, but he gains the value that comes from using that power cooperatively.

Marx rejects the idea that machinery is introduced in order to make work easier. He argues that "Like every other increase in the productiveness of labour, machinery is intended to cheapen commodities, and, by shortening that portion of the working day, in which the labourer works for himself, to lengthen the other portion that he gives, without an equivalent, to the capitalist. In short, it is a means for producing surplus value."

Marx concluded that the possibility of the growth of capital depended upon using labor in some way that would free the capitalist from the need to pay for the use of labor power. He decided that capital is "the command over unpaid labour. All surplus value is in substance the materialisation of unpaid labour."

Capitalist production, according to

Marx, "reproduces and perpetuates the condition for exploiting the labourer. It incessantly forces him to sell his labour power in order to live, and enables the capitalist to purchase labour power in order that he may enrich himself." Accordingly, the division between men which is described in terms of classes is inevitable in a capitalistic society.

Marx explains the self destruction of the capitalistic society by arguing that from the exploitation of laborers the capitalist, if he has the economic power, passes to the exploitation of other capitalists and, finally, to their expropriation. "One capitalist always kills many." The monopolistic tendencies of capitalists finally hinder the modes of production, and the mass exploitation of workers reaches such a peak of misery and oppression that an uprising of the proletariat destroys the capitalist state. Thus, "capitalist production begets, with the inexorability of a law of Nature, its own negation." The transformation into the socialized state is much quicker and easier than the transformation of the private property of the workers into capitalist private property, for it is easier for the mass of workers to expropriate the property of a few capitalists than for the capitalists to expropriate the property of the laborers.

Das Kapital has often been criticized as an economic study written in the style of German metaphysics. It is generally regarded, particularly by those who have never read it, as an extremely difficult book, both in content and style. By its nature it is a complex, scholarly work, but it is also clear and direct in the exposition of Marx's ideas, and it is lightened by numerous hypothetical cases which illustrate in a vivid manner the various points which Marx makes. In its consideration of the work of other scholars it is respectful if not acquiescent. Perhaps the primary fault of this momentous work is not that it is too difficult, but that it is too simple. To argue that capital is made possible by exploitation of labor may be to ignore the ways in which profit can be realized and labor paid to the satisfaction of both the capitalist and the laborer. But impartial criticism of such a thesis is impossible. Whether a capitalist economic system gives cause for revolution is something that is shown by history but only recommended by men.

Critique

A good example of baroque sensibility, A King and No King depends for its success on an extremely skillful manipulation of emotional effects rather than on the moral or logical implications of the narrative. For this reason the play employs an impressive array of technical devices for the creation and maintenance of emotional intensity. Chief among these are contrasts and parallels of character, sudden emotional reversals within scenes, the speeding up or retarding of action with little reference to narrative logic, and the use of surprise information which resolves serious difficulties in the plot. So cleverly were these devices used that A King and No King was one of the most popular plays of its time, possibly ranked after Philaster, as Beaumont and Fletcher's most successful tragi-comedy. It has been unfavorably criticized because of its neglect of the moral issues raised and particularly because the tragic dilemma is avoided by means of a trick. But Beaumont and Fletcher were not much concerned with the solution of moral problems, rather, they were interested in providing entertainment for a sophisticated audience.

The Story

Arbaces, the valiant young king of Iberia, had just ended a long war against Armenia by defeating in single combat Tigranes, the king of that country. But Arbaces, though a hero in war, was also an intensely passionate man, honest and outspoken. Mardonius commented that he was capable of the wildest extremities of emotion and that he could move through the entire emotional range with the greatest speed. Inflamed by his victory, Arbaces illustrated the qualities Mardonius ascribed to him. In a series of blustering speeches he showed himself to be incredibly proud. When Mardonius took him to task for boasting, he became, after a few gusts of ranting, temporarily contrite and amiable, and he resolved to give his beautiful, virtuous sister Panthea, whom he had not seen since her childhood, in marriage to the defeated but valorous Tigranes But Tigranes protested because he had already plighted his troth to Spaconia, a lady of his own land

Messages arrived from Gobrias, in whose care the government of Iberia had been left, telling that a slave sent by Arane to poison Arbaces had been taken and executed Instead of flying into a rage, Arbaces, in a burst of magnanimity and pity, forgave the queen mother's unnatural act Thus he swung from the objectionable boastfulness of moments before to the opposite emotional pole

Meanwhile, Tigranes, who was to accompany Arbaces home as a prisoner, arranged with Bessus, a fatuous and cowardly captain in the Iberian army, for him to convey Spaconia to Iberia and secure for her a place as one of Panthea's ladies in waiting There, according to Tigrane's plan, it was to be Spaconia's task to set the princess' heart against a match with him

In Iberia, where Arane had been put under guard for her attempt on Arbaces' life, Panthea was deeply torn between her love for her mother on the one hand and her loyalty and devotion to the king, her brother, on the other Although the reason for Arane's crime was unexplained, her conversation with Gobrias revealed that there were secrets between them having an important bearing on her relationship with Arbaces Bessus, accompanied by Spaconia, arrived with messages from the king, including a pardon for Arane Importuned by the courtiers, the braggart gave an amusing account of the duel between Arbaces and Tigranes, contriving to make himself the central figure Panthea, interrupting Bessus' tale frequently, revealed agonized concern for her brother's safety Even though she had not yet seen him, she nevertheless felt a powerful attraction to him Spaconia then revealed to Panthea her reason for coming to Iberia, and the virtuous princess vowed to reject the proposed match with Tigranes

the court When Panthea presented herself to her brother, Arbaces, overwhelmed by her beauty, realized that at first sight he had fallen hopelessly in love with her Frantically he tried to convince himself that she was not really his sister but a lady of the court however, he was unable to escape the guilty feeling that he had become the victim of an incestuous love

At last, succumbing to his passion, he kissed her, then, overcome with guilt and shame, he violently ordered the weeping Panthea imprisoned But as time passed, his love for Panthea increased, and at last he begged Mardonius to act as his bawd When Mardonius indignantly rejected Arbace's plea, the king turned to Bessus, whom he found more willing to undertake such a task Revolted by Bessus' ready acquiescence, and probably also by the image of himself that he saw in the minion, Arbaces swore to keep his sin within his own breast in spite of the torture his desire inflicted upon him

Bessus, meanwhile, discovered that the reputation for bravery he had created for himself had serious drawbacks Now that he was worthy of challenge, he was being called to account by all of the gentlemen he had insulted before leaving for the wars He was just dismissing the second of his two hundred and thirteenth challenger when Bacurius appeared, demanding satisfaction for a past wrong Bessus, attempting to put him off, pleaded a lame leg but Bacurius, recognizing the braggart's poltroonery, browbeat him unmercifully and took away his sword Bessus, after enlisting the aid of two professional swordsmen who were in reality as absurd and as cowardly as he, allowed himself to be convinced by a very peculiar exercise in logic that he was, after all, a valiant man He was on the way to deliver this news to Bacurius when he encountered Lygones, who had journeyed from Armenia in search of his daughter Spaconia Believing him to be Spaconia's seducer, Lygones gave Bessus a drubbing before the braggart could explain Parting from Lygones, bruised Bessus located Bacurius, who, over Bessus' loud protests that he was no coward, mocked his logic and cudgelled his two hired companions. During this time Lygones had located Spaconia and Tigranes in prison, and he learned joyfully that his daughter, whom he had thought guilty of a disgraceful alliance with Bessus, was actually to be married to Tigranes and thus was to become the queen of Armenia.

Indirectly urged on by Gobrias and nearly mad with desire, Arbaces visited Panthea in her prison and at once begged her to yield and not to yield herself to his lust. Although she rejected his proposal, she confessed that she too had felt unsisterly desire for him. After they parted, Arbaces attempted to govern himself but finally concluded wildly that he could bear the situation no longer. He resolved to murder Mardonius, ravish

Panthea, and then kill himself. At that moment, however, Gobrias and Arane revealed their secret. Arbaces was really the son of Gobrias. As an infant he had been adopted for political reasons by the barren Arane, who later conceived and bore Panthea. He was thus "no king." But Gobrias, who had protected his son against Arane's attempts to dispose of him so that Panthea could rule and who had subtly encouraged Arbaces' love for Panthea, found his complicated plan a success. Arbaces, now totally without pride of majesty, was overjoyed to learn that he was actually an impostor. His and Panthea's passion now became legitimate, and by marrying her he would once more assume the crown. Thus a happy ending was brought about, and to fill the moment completely Tigranes and Spaconia were released from prison and reunited.

John Bale, Bishop of Ossory, one of the most outspoken champions of the English Reformation, claimed to have written some forty plays in his lifetime.

Of these, five are extant, and of these five King John is the most important. Although far too long and tedious for dramatic effectiveness, being in structure two plays or one play in two parts, it is interesting as a scathing and uncompromising attack on the Church of Rome and as a version of history different from that usually accepted. Challenging those historians—Polydore Virgil in particular—who made King John a knave, Bale depicts the king as a virtuous protector of the realm who was betrayed by the covetousness and viciousness of the Church. Bale's history may be altered and revised to suit his cause, but the fact that he used it at all is of concern to us, for King John announces the beginning of the great tradition of the English history play. It is, actually, a piece that shows the transition from the old to the new—an allegorical play using the techniques of the medieval morality (Sedition, for instance, is an example of the morality "vice"), but using them to dramatize historical events.

The Story

England complained to King John that she had been stripped of her rights and her wealth by the rapacious clergy who had driven her husband, God, from the realm. King John promised to right her wrongs but was mocked by Sedition, the comic vice, and the foremost agent of the Church.

Sedition, demonstrating the way in which he and the Church subverted the government of kings, introduced Dissimulation, his right hand man. Dissimulation worked with Private Wealth and Usurped Power. Private Wealth was the darling of the religious orders, he gave strength to Usurped Power, who sustained the arrogance of Popes.

King John defied Sedition and his cohorts. He called Nobility, Clergy, and Civil Order to him and prevailed on them for their support. Nobility and Civil Order gave theirs willingly, but Clergy was reluctant. King John had been too harsh on him. When the king reminded him of the temporal rights of rulers as outlined in the Gospel, Clergy, still reluctant, consented.

The allegiance of the three was short-lived, however, for Sedition and his minions had little trouble convincing them that the actual power of Rome was stronger than any abstract claim based on the Gospel. Besides, the Church had the sole right of interpreting the Gospel. Nobility, Clergy, and Civil Order were forsworn.

King John, now bereft of his three strongest allies, placed all his hopes on Communalty, his one sure support. Communalty, the true son of England, was brought to King John by his mother, and the king was dismayed to learn that he was both impoverished and blind. He was impoverished, his mother explained, because the Church had stolen all his goods, his blindness symbolized his spiritual ignorance, an ignorance in which he was kept by the conspiracy of Clergy who was supposed to open his eyes. Still, for all his failings, Communalty was faithful to the king who had always seen to his welfare. He willingly reasserted his faith.

In the end, however, he was no more staunch than his more exalted brothers. Clergy had too strong a hold on him, and he too became a victim of Sedition's plottings.

King John now stood alone in his attempt to save the widow England. Assured now of his vulnerability, the Pope sent his agents to bring the king to his knees. King John's old enemy, Stephen Langton, the Archbishop of Canterbury, returned. The interdict was proclaimed with bell, book, and candle, and the vindictive Cardinal Pandulphus arrived to enforce it.

Still King John stood firm, defying the Pope to do his worst. Claiming that he would not betray England, he turned to history and the scriptures to defend his rights, he pointed out the ways in which the Church perverted the true faith and he cited the corruptions of the holy orders. Sedition mocked him and promised that his defiance would end.

End it did, for the Pope gathered a strong alliance and threatened to invade

England Rather than see his country devastated and his people killed, King John submitted. He surrendered his crown to the Pope and received it back as a fief of the Holy See. When England protested, she was reviled by Sedition and his aides.

King John ruled for a number of years as the vassal of the Pope. If he tried to assert his power, Sedition and his agents were on hand to thwart it. Treason ran through the land with impunity, and when the king tried to punish him he pleaded benefit of clergy and was released. Nevertheless, King John was determined to hang him.

Cardinal Pandulphus and Sedition conceived a plan to curb King John's power. Cardinal Pandulphus would not release England from the interdict until King John had handed over to the Papacy a third of his lands as a dowry for the bride of Richard, his late brother. Although King John protested, Cardinal Pandulphus insisted on these harsh terms. Providentially, the king was released when it was announced that Julyane, the lady in question, was dead.

The forces of the Church were now determined to get rid of King John completely. Dissimulation, in the guise of Simon of Swinsett, a monk, concocted a poison cup from the exudations of a toad. When he offered John the draught, the king forced the monk to drink first and then drained the cup. Both died in agony.

Upon the death of King John, Verity appeared and proclaimed that all the evils that had been attributed to King John were false, the lies of slandering monks. He listed all of the good things the king had done for the benefit of the common people and asserted that for three hundred years that good had been undone by the corrupt Church. But now, he announced, Imperial Majesty (symbolizing Henry VIII) had arrived to crush the Church and save the widow England.

Imperial Majesty confronted Nobility, Clergy, and Civil Order. Verity pointed out to them the error of their ways, and contrite, they swore their eternal allegiance to Imperial Majesty. England was safe from the evils of Rome.

Critique

Though perhaps less widely known and admired than the author's Cradle Song, The Kingdom of God is in some respects an even more interesting play. Among its features are a large canvas and the wide range of its characterizations, but the chief source of its appeal is a vital theme, relentlessly pursued through three carefully presented scenes. This theme is illustrated in the career of Sister Gracia, it strongly asserts that mankind must not turn a deaf ear to the sufferings of the unfortunate, that the aged, the sinners, and the orphans make claims on the rest of humanity which can neither be denied nor evaded. The scenes of the play show three stages in Sister Gracia's devotion to what she considers her duty. She appears first as a girl of nineteen, then as a woman of twenty nine, and finally as an old woman of seventy. Though the vows of her particular sisterhood are not irrevocable, being renewable annually, she feels bound to her work by unbreakable threads of conscience and consecration. Her moving story is in the Maeterlinckian mold of quiet drama, "the theatre of kindness," which made the Spanish stage of the early twentieth century one of international importance.

The Story

A beautiful young girl, daughter of a prominent family, Gracia had decided to renounce the world in order to enter the benevolent order of St. Vincent de Paul. Her first assignment was in a home for poverty stricken old men. Among these aged pensioners, her favorite was Gabriel, formerly valet to her own grandfather, but she gave freely of her love and energy to them all. Gradually she became well acquainted with Trajano, a superannuated anarchist, and with Liborio, a half-witted Cuban, whose only escape from melancholy was accomplished by Gracia's gifts of cigars and the personal attention she gave him.

She found true happiness in this unselfish service, but her family felt otherwise about her choice of a career. They thought that Gracia was wasting herself on old men who were dull and repulsive—her mother and sister did not see how she could bear to go near them. Visiting Gracia at the institution, they begged her to return home. Her father, whom Gracia dearly loved and respected, added his pleas, but the girl, though shaken by this emotional tug of war, still firmly declared that she must dedicate her life and happiness to help atone for the world's misery.

Ten years passed. Gracia was no longer at the asylum for old men. Halfway through this period of time, she had been transferred to another institution, this one a maternity home for unwed mothers. Here her fidelity to her vows met a stern test, for Gracia found herself sorely tried by the confusion and heartbreak which she saw all about her. The outcasts of society to whom she tried to minister were all different—even though it was the same kind of misstep which had brought them to the home—and they reacted to her advances in ways which were painfully unpredictable. Some of the girls were incorrigible. Quica, for example, was a perennial visitor, shedding the reproaches of the good sisters as casually as a duck sheds water. Others were girls whose characters were fundamentally good, like the fiercely independent Candelas. Neither Quica nor Candelas, however, presented such a problem as the aristocratic and embittered Margarita, whose wall of resentment could no longer be pierced by any gesture of compassion or sympathy. In trying to cope with the hysteria of Margarita, Sister Gracia underwent such strain that she herself soon reached the verge of emotional collapse.

At that point young Dr. Enrique, the physician at the home, decided that it was time to intervene. He had long loved Gracia in silence, respecting her vow, but now he urged her to marry him and leave an atmosphere which was proving so harmful to her. In becoming his wife, he pointed out, Gracia could take up another life as selfless and charitable as the one she now led, but it would be in a domestic framework much more whole some and natural.

Gracia could not help recoiling at the doctor's suggestion. Still unnerved by her ordeal with Margarita, she did not think it possible or seemly to speak of love amid such surroundings, and she repeated to the doctor those views on life and service that she had expressed to her parents ten years before. As Dr. Enrique regretfully withdrew, she heard Candelas singing a ballad of love. Gracia could endure no more, frantically she rushed to Sister Cristina, her Mother Superior, and asked for a transfer, offering the reason that it was a matter of conscience.

The years crept up on Sister Gracia, but never again was she tempted to turn her back on the life which she had adopted. At seventy she was still battling the problems found in an imperfect world. By now she herself was a Mother Superior, in charge of an orphanage which was sadly neglected by its indifferent directors. Unperturbed, the old woman made the best of the situation. Aided only by the rather earthy Sister Dionisia, Sister Gracia steered the institution through one small crisis after another. Indignantly, she protected a small orphan from the mistreatment of his brutal employer, a drunken tailor. Another situation involved two orphans, an older boy and a girl who had become sweethearts and were on the point of eloping. This affair of the heart was handled with an amused tolerance which softened—without completely disguising—the firmness of Sister Gracia's decision that marriage must wait.

Once in a while a colorful interlude would lighten the orphanage routine. One day, to the great delight of the children, a former inmate of the orphanage came back to pay his respects. Now an aspiring bullfighter, Juan de Dios brought with him the ears of his first bull, these, with a flourish, he presented to Sister Gracia. The latter managed a suitable response to this rather unexpected offering, though she could not resist adding to her expression of gratitude a few gentle admonitions to the ebullient young man, then she was swept to the outside gate in triumph. It was a great occasion and the sister was moved by Juan's open pride in having been one of her foundlings, even if the bull's ears seemed a gift of rather dubious value. More to the purpose, she considered ruefully, was the young bullfighter's promise to buy a good dinner for the whole orphanage after his next victory.

But Sister Gracia was soon brought back to everyday reality by a sudden revolt of the older boys. Touched off by their meager fare and led by the fiery Felipe, the mutiny threatened to flare into real trouble, as the rebels set off to steal good food and to break any heads or doors which they found in their way. Undaunted, though hard pressed, Sister Gracia rallied all her resources of authority and faith. She commanded the boys to return to their unpalatable soup and to be thankful for what they had. To Felipe she gave earnest assurances—God did not condone injustice, she told him, but the way to overcome injustice was through love. Finally she led the orphans in an inspired prayer, pledging them all to God's love. When they became adults, later, they must not allow children to be forsaken or mothers to be wronged, and they must help build on this earth the Kingdom of God. As the chastened children left the table, Sister Gracia offered additional counsel to the despondent Felipe. Men do not cry or complain, she told him. Even though they suffer, they must always work and hope.

Critique

A fitting description of this romantic tale told in poetry and prose may be borrowed from Leigh Hunt's description of the author of the piece Hunt wrote that Moore's "face, upon the whole, is bright, not unruffled with care and passion, but festivity is the predominant expression" Moore's writing is festive with rich descriptions of persons and places, his style is graceful, his narrative is never broken The romantic interest is admirably sustained, with continued humor Fadladeen's abilities as a pseudo critic add to the real pleasure of the whole story

The Story

Aurungzebe, Emperor of Delhi, entertained Abdalla, who had recently abdicated his throne to his son Aliris and was on a pilgrimage to the Shrine of the Prophet Aurungzebe had promised his daughter Lalla Rookh (Tulip Cheek) in marriage to Aliris The lonely princess was to journey to Cashmere, where she and Aliris would meet and be married

Lalla Rookh's caravan, of the finest and most comfortable equipment, was manned by the most loyal and efficient of servants, the entire cavalcade having been sent by Aliris to conduct his bride to him Among the servants sent by Aliris was a young poet of Cashmere, Feramorz

Feramorz captivated all the women with his beauty and charming musical ability as he sang and recited to the accompaniment of his kitar Lalla Rookh, not immune, became enamored of the young poet

Fadladeen, the chamberlain traveling as Lalla Rookh's protector, was a bumpkin, all knowing, perspicacious authority on any subject food, science, religion, and literature And his criticisms were so detailed and harsh that the person being assessed was reduced to a virtual ignominy He expressed himself freely after Feramorz told the tale of "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" Azim and Zelica were young lovers who lived in the province of Khorassan After Azim went off to fight in the wars in Greece, Zelica was enticed into the harem of Mokanna the "veiled prophet of Khorassan," in the belief that she would gain admission into Paradise there she would be reunited with Azim, whom she believed killed in the Greek wars Mokanna was a dastardly, cruel ruler, who had gained the throne through his powers of magic When Azim learned, in a dream, of Zelica's plight, he returned to his country to join the army of the veiled prophet Discovering that his vision of Zelica's unhappy state was true, he joined the troops of an enemy caliph and fought against Mokanna

Mokanna, defeated, committed suicide by plunging into a vat of corrosive poison In her remorse for having become Mokanna's wife and by sadness in seeing her young lover but not being able to be his, Zelica put on the veil of Mokanna and confronted the caliph's army Azim, mistaking her for Mokanna, killed her The lovers exchanged vows of devotion and forgiveness as Zelica died Azim grew old grieving by Zelica's grave, where he finally died after another vision in which Zelica appeared and told him she was blessed

Feramorz, unaccustomed to criticism, was taken aback by Fadladeen's reactions to this beautiful love poem For Fadladeen was caustic He belabored the subject of long speeches by the characters in the story, he contrasted Feramorz' poem with the fluency and tone of poems of other writers of the day, he analyzed the meter of specific lines in the poem Feramorz did not attempt another story for some days

Encouraged to sing by Lalla Rookh, he began his second poem only after an appealing look at Fadladeen as he explained that this tale, "Paradise and the Peri," was in a lighter and humbler vein than the first The Peri, wishing to be admitted to Paradise, was told to bring as her passport the gift most treasured by heaven Her first offering was a drop of blood from a dying Indian patriot, this unacceptable gift was followed by the last sigh of an Egyptian maiden as she died of grief at the loss of the lover whom she had nursed through the plague Rejected for this gift, the Peri was finally admitted to Paradise when she presented the penitential tear of a hardened criminal of Balbec The criminal's tear had been shed as he heard a child's prayer

Fadladeen, even more outspoken in his criticism of Feramorz' second story, combined petty sarcasm and scholarly jargon in his comments He refused to be halted by Lalla Rookh

By the time the party had arrived in Lahore, Lalla Rookh realized that not only was she in love with Feramorz but also that the handsome singer was in love with her, and she resolved that he should not be admitted to her presence again Although the heart she was to give to her bridegroom would be cold and broken, it must be pure

As they journeyed on, the travelers came upon the ruins of an ancient tower, a structure that aroused the curiosity of the entire group Fadladeen, who had never before been outside Delhi, proceeded learnedly to show that he knew nothing whatever about the building Despite Lalla Rookh's admonition that Feramorz not be called to identify the ruins for them, he was brought before her

The tower, he said, was the remains of an ancient Fire-Temple, built by Ghebers, or Persians, of an old religion, who had fled to this site from their Arab conquerors in order to have liberty in a foreign country rather than persecution in their own land This historical detail gave rise to Feramorz' third song, "The Fire Worshippers" Hafed, the leader of the resisting Gheber forces in the mountains, fell in love with Hinda, the daughter of the Arabian emir who had come to rout out the insurrectionists Hafed, his identity concealed, gained access to Hinda's quarters and won her love before he was captured by the Ghebers

The Arabs defeated the Ghebers in a sudden attack, and Hafed sacrificed himself on a funeral pyre As Hinda was being escorted back to her father's camp, she plunged into a lake and was drowned

On this occasion Fadladeen decided to forego criticism of Feramorz' tale, but to report the profane reciting to Alnis He hoped in this manner to bring about punishment for Feramorz and to secure for himself a place in Alnis' court

In the tranquil, beautiful valley of Hussun Abdaul, Feramorz sang his last song, "The Light of the Haram" This was an account of married love reconciled after a misunderstanding between husband and wife

The "light of the haram" was Sultana Nourmahal, the favorite wife of the Emperor Selim, son of the great Acbar During the celebration of the Feast of Roses, Nourmahal quarreled with Selim The couple's period of sadness and re morse because of their harsh words to each other ended when Nourmahal learned a magic song from an enchantress, Namouna. Masked, Nourmahal sang the song to Selim at the emperor's banquet, and they were reunited in undying love for each other.

After considerable hardship the party crossed the mountains that separate Cashmere from the rest of India. At a temple where they rested, the young king came to welcome his bride into his kingdom. Lalla Rookh, seeing his face full view for the first time, fainted. The king was the young singer, Feramorz. Disguised as a poet Aliris had traveled from Delhi with the party in order to win Lalla Rookh's love.

Learning the real identity of the man whose songs he had criticized so caustically, Fadladeen recanted immediately and declared that Aliris was the greatest poet of all time. In his new position of prestige, bestowed on him by Aliris, Fadladeen recommended the whip for any one who questioned Aliris' poetic ability.

It was reported that to her dying day, Lalla Rookh never called the king by any name other than Feramorz.

PANFILO, a poet (Boccaccio)

Critique

In the tradition of the Italian masters of literature, Boccaccio found inspiration in the love of a lady. Unlike Petrarch and Dante, however, he pursued his lady to her bedchamber and entered upon a passionate romance. She was Maria d'Aquino, rumored to be the daughter of King Robert of Anjou. In her youth she had considered a religious life, but her beauty drew many admirers who soon awakened her interest in more worldly matters. She was married, but she discovered that love outside the bonds of marriage had a delightful charm of its own. Boccaccio discovered her in church and ambushed her in her chamber while her husband was absent. Although she grew weary of him and took another lover, Boccaccio wrote L'Amorosa Fiammetta partly to argue that, in fact, it was he who left her. The novel, which presents little action, is distinguished by its psychological revelation of fourteenth-century life and manners. The study of Fiammetta, who is Boccaccio's Maria, reveals her as a passionate but sensitive woman, intelligent and fanciful. Despite Boccaccio's imitative style and his labored references to mythological figures, L'Amorosa Fiammetta manages to present a realistic image of two lovers in fourteenth-century Naples.

The Story

Fiammetta had a dream that a serpent bit her while she was lying in a meadow and that, as darkness came, the wound festered and brought her close to death. When she woke she discovered that she had no injury and, failing to realize that the dream was a warning and a prophecy, she dismissed it from her thoughts.

Fiammetta was admired by the ladies and gentlemen who surrounded her when she went to church on a certain festival day, but of all her admirers none struck her fancy until she saw a young gentleman leaning against a marble pillar of the church. The glances which she and the young man exchanged proved that the attraction was mutual.

Fiammetta, realizing that she had been overtaken by love, spent hours in her chamber picturing the young man and hoping to see him again. As other chance meetings increased her interest in him, she became so disturbed and changed by love that her nurse commented on it and warned her of the dangers of passion and of betraying her husband. But Fiammetta, too much enamored of the young man to heed her nurse's warnings, imagined in a dream that Venus came to her and told her of the delight and power of love, urging her to ignore the nurse's warnings and to submit to love's promptings.

Encouraged by her fond glances, the young man became familiar with Fiammetta's friends and with her husband, so that he and Fiammetta might converse together and hide their love. The young man taught her by his example how to converse in the company of others so as to reveal their love only to each other. He pretended to be telling of two Grecian lovers, Fiammetta and Panfilo, in order to show how deeply his own passion moved him. Although Fiammetta herself grew adept at this word game, she knew that their love could not forever be kept within the bounds of reason.

Despite Fiammetta's refusals, which Panfilo took as coy signs of encouragement, he finally gained what all lovers desire. He and Fiammetta spent innumerable nights together, learning new delights of love. Nothing else mattered to Fiammetta. She thanked Venus for encouraging her in love, and she laughed at other gentlewomen who imagined that they knew what passion was.

But there was to be an end to her happiness. One night, while Fiammetta and Panfilo were together in her chamber, Fiammetta awoke to find Panfilo weeping. She hesitated to inquire into the cause of his distress for fear that he would reveal some other love for whom he was secretly longing. Pretending that she had not seen him weeping, she suddenly cried out as if in her sleep. When he wiped his tears and turned to her, she told him that she had suddenly feared that she had lost him. He answered that neither fortune nor death could change his love for her, he then began to sob and sigh again. Answering her question concerning his sorrow, Panfilo told her that he must leave Naples for four months because of his father's illness.

Fiammetta argued that if he loved her he would not leave her. Now that she knew his love, she could not bear to part with it, as one so desperately in love, she deserved his presence more than his father did. She feared for his health and safety if he were to leave her. Finally, she concluded, a storm was coming, no man of sense would go out in such weather.

In spite of her protests Panfilo insisted that it was his duty to see his dying father, but he assured her that he would return at the end of four months. After a long and loving farewell she accompanied him to the gate. Then, overcome with sorrow, she fainted and had to be revived by her maid.

During the first four months of Panfilo's absence Fiammetta spent her days remembering the delights she had shared with him, wondering whether he was falling in love with someone else, counting the days and scolding the moon for being slow in its course, and imagining and dreaming that he had returned to her.

Even the satisfaction of daydreaming was denied to Fiammetta when she learned from the conversation of a merchant that Panfilo was married. She was plunged into jealousy and grief, but as time went on she began to hope that Panfilo might not find happiness with his wife, and she offered prayers to Venus asking that he be stricken again with love for her so that he would return.

Fiammetta's husband noticed that she had lost her appetite and was having difficulty sleeping. Ignorant of the cause, he at first had medicines prescribed for her and then took her on a vacation to some beautiful islands. But the medicines had no effect on her passion, and the islands only reminded her of the delightful times she had spent with Panfilo. Feasts and shows failed to please her, and she spent her days sighing and praying to the gods of love and fortune.

From one of her servants Fiammetta learned that Panfilo was not married, as she had supposed from the merchant's tale, but was in love with a beautiful gentlewoman who loved him. Her misery intensified more than ever by this news, she found no comfort in her husband's loving and compassionate words, nor could her nurse bring her to her senses. She considered many ways of suicide, all of which seemed too painful or difficult to be considered. She then reasoned that if she killed herself she would never see Panfilo again. Finally, fearing that worse torments were to come, she attempted to leap from the house, but she was stopped by the nurse and other servants.

After her nurse told her that Panfilo was returning to Naples, Fiammetta, for a time, hoped to see him again. But the rumor had confused her Panfilo with another man having the same name, and Fiammetta was forced to realize that she had lost him forever. She compared her condition to that of other betrayed lovers, supposing herself to be more unfortunate than they. Finally she told her story in order that others might take it as an example of what misery may befall an amorous gentlewoman.

Critique

This unfinished novel is perhaps the most highly regarded fragment in American literature, for in it Fitzgerald's prose is said to have achieved its greatest power, flexibility, and economy. As edited by Edmund Wilson, The Last Tycoon has six completed chapters (about half the book), a summary conclusion, and a selection of the author's notes, but since Fitzgerald was a painstaking reviser, it is by no means certain that the completed chapters are in their final form. Nevertheless, it is clear that the heart of the novel is the deathly tired Stahr's poignant love affair with Kathleen. Of considerable technical interest is the use of Cecilia as a narrator who is allowed to imagine fully events she does not actually witness.

The Story

Cecilia Brady was flying to California for a summer vacation from college. On the plane she met Wylie White, an alcoholic screenwriter, and Schwartz, a ruined producer. Monroe Stahr, the partner of Cecilia's father, was also aboard, though traveling as Mr Smith When the plane was grounded at Nashville, Schwartz sent a note to Stahr, warning him about Pat Brady, Cecilia's father When the plane took off again, Schwartz stayed behind and committed suicide

Stahr had been the boy wonder of the film industry He had been in charge of the studio in his twenties, almost dead from overwork at thirty five Indeed, he was half in love with death for the sake of his dead wife, Minna Davis, a great star with whom he had been deeply in love Since her death he had increased his work load, often remaining in his office around the clock In contrast to Stahr's highly developed sense of responsibility, Brady was mean and selfish Lacking taste and understanding little of the technical end of the industry, Brady had acquired his share of the studio through luck and had retained it through shrewdness

One night while Cecilia was visiting the studio, there was an earthquake Stahr, working with his trouble shooter, Robinson, to clear away the mess, saw a sightseer perched on top of a floating idol The girl reminded him of his dead wife, and he tried to discover her identity That night Cecilia also fell in love with Stahr, but she felt that her attachment was hopeless

A self made, paternalistic employer, Stahr personally managed almost every detail at the studio, from picking the stories to passing on the rushes Though not an educated man, he had raised the artistic level of the movies and did not hesitate to make good pictures that would lose money As a result he had incurred the distrust of the stockholders, exploiters who saw the movies only as a business Their distrust, however, was mixed with a genuine respect for the producer's many abilities In addition to the opposition of the stockholders, Stahr was concerned because Communists were trying to organize the writers, he worked closely with his writers and wanted them to trust him Wylie White, in particular, enjoyed his favor, although White resented him At this time White hoped to marry Cecilia for the sake of her father's influence Typical of Stahr's interest in his employees was his investigation of the attempted suicide of a cameraman, Pete Zavras Stahr learned that Zavras had been unable to find work because of a rumor that he was going blind Stahr was able to scotch the rumor by providing Zavras with a statement from an oculist

By this time Stahr had succeeded in locating the girl who resembled his wife She was Kathleen Moore Though she was at first reluctant to meet him, they later had a brief, passionate affair Stahr learned that she had been the mistress of a deposed monarch who had undergone a personality deterioration and that now she was about to marry an American who had rescued her from that situation Stahr realized that marriage to Kathleen could give him the will to go on living While he hesitated, her fiancé arrived ahead of schedule, and she went through with the marriage from a sense of obligation

Cecilia, knowing nothing of these matters, was still desperately hoping to attract Stahr, her pull toward him increased by a break with her father after she had discovered him with his nude secretary At Stahr's request she arranged a meeting with a Communist organizer Then Stahr got drunk and tried to beat him up

At this point the manuscript ends, but the rest of the story may be pieced together from the author's notes Because the studio had been in financial difficulties, Brady had tried to push through a wage cut Stahr, opposing this plan, had gone east to convince the other stockholders to postpone the wage slash Brady cut the salaries and betrayed the writers while Stahr was sick in Washington Although he broke with Brady after that, Stahr agreed to go along with Brady's plan for a company union, chiefly because Stahr felt personally responsible for the welfare of his employees Wylie

White had also turned on Stahr

In the meantime Kathleen and Stahr resumed their relationship. When Brady tried to blackmail Stahr, the producer threatened him with some information about the death of Brady's wife. At one time Fitzgerald had considered having Brady persuade Robinson to undertake Stahr's murder; however, Fitzgerald rejected this idea in favor of having Brady inform Kathleen's husband, a movie technician involved with the union organizers, of Kathleen's affair with Stahr. An alienation of affection suit resulted from that, but Stahr was somehow saved by Zavras, the cameraman.

Stahr became alienated from Kathleen and was no longer able to dominate his associates at the studio. Nevertheless, he continued to oppose Brady. Finally Stahr felt that he had to eliminate Brady before Brady had him killed. After hiring gangsters to murder Brady, Stahr flew east to provide himself with an alibi, but he changed his mind on the plane and decided to call off the killers at the next airport. The plane crashed before he could carry out his intention.

Fitzgerald was uncertain about including an episode in which the plane's wreckage was plundered by three children who discovered it, the idea being that each child's personality was reflected by the items he stole. Stahr's funeral would have been a powerful, detailed, ironic arraignment of Hollywood sham. It would have included the incident of a has-been cowboy actor who was invited to be a pallbearer by mistake and consequently enjoyed a return of good fortune.

Cecilia later had an affair, probably with Wylie White, and then suffered a complete breakdown. At the end of the novel the reader was to learn that she was telling the story while a patient in a tuberculosis sanatorium.

LEAVES OF GRASS

Author Walt Whitman (1819-1892)

First published 1855

The total effect of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass has been compared to that of a symphony, with interwoven and recurring themes that are scored for a full orchestra, from gentle strings to raucous brass, actually, if one compares his poetry to music, Whitman's work seems closer to a Wagnerian opera, for Wagner employs not only the great melodic themes and the contrast of soft and harsh music but also a human element, the actors and singers on the stage. And while Whitman is famed as a champion of democratic ideas, he rarely presents them in the abstract, rarely strays from the individual man or woman. Even the en-masse "I" of his "Song of Myself" becomes particular in the dramatic incidents of the runaway slave who is "limpsy and weak" from his journey, or the woman who peeks from behind the blinds of her windows and mentally projects herself among the twenty-eight young men who splash naked on the sea shore, and of the brave captain in the sea battle who has just begun to fight. Whitman is also like Wagner in that his triumphs and failures are similar to those of the composer, both are capable of unmatched eloquence and both fail when they become overblown and pretentious.

So broad is Whitman's scope in Leaves of Grass that any short discussion of his work must be divided into compartments (which may be arbitrary and incomplete) or degenerate into random comments. Because of his breadth, Whitman may be considered as four men: philosopher, propagandist, humorist, and poet.

Whitman the Philosopher In the short poem which opens Leaves of Grass Whitman bluntly states the core of his philosophy

One's Self I sing—a simple, separate Person, Yet utter the word Democratic the word En masse

Of Physiology from toe to toe I sing,
Not physiognomy alone nor brain alone is worthy for the muse—I say the Form complete is worthier far,
The Female equally with the male I sing

O Life immense in passion pulse, and power, Cheerful—for freest action form'd, under the laws divine,
The Modern Man I sing

Having stated the paradox, the dilemma, Whitman expands upon this theme so persuasively that by the time the reader has finished the volume he accepts the paradox as reasonable and true. In the strident "Song of the Open Road," Whitman seems to emphasize the individual at the expense of society, telling us to throw off all conventions and responsibilities, to strike out on our own

Afoot and light hearted I take to the open road,
Healthy free, the world before me
The long brown path before me, leading wherever I choose

Henceforth I ask not good fortune—I am good fortune, Henceforth I whimper no more, postpone
no more need nothing, Strong and content, I travel the open road

The earth—that is sufficient
I do not want the constellations any nearer,
I know they are very well where they are,
I know they suffice for those who belong to them

Still here I carry my old delicious burdens,

I carry them, men and women—I carry them with me wherever I go I swear it is impossible for me to get rid of them
I am filled with them, and I will fill them in return

In "Crossing the Brooklyn Ferry," the individual merges into crowds that in turn merge with the stream of life. When Whitman examines his position in "I Hear It Was Charged Against Me," he seems to evade the paradox by proclaiming that he has nothing to do with any institution except that "of the dear love of comrades", but the reader may reflect that these comrades are the individuals who make up a complex world society.

Many themes appear in Leaves of Grass. Whitman celebrates the brotherhood of man, democracy, America as a symbol of both brotherhood and democracy, and Lincoln as a symbol of the lonely individual deeply involved in humanity, as natural outgrowths of these themes come Whitman's insistence on the "normality" of sex, the equality of male and female, and the oneness of man with all things in the universe, from great stars to tiny ants. All these ideas are consistent with the poet's viewpoint, all a part of the primary dilemma. One of his greatest poems, "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," presents Lincoln as the solitary figure who is also the man of the people, and when the funeral train slowly bears his body across the country, Whitman describes not only the great grief of the masses but also the mourning of the poet, the individual

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets
Through day and night, with the great cloud darkening the land,
With the pomp of the inloop'd flags,
with the cities draped in black,
With the show of the States themselves,
as of crapeveil'd women standing With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night,
With the countless torches lit—with the silent sea of faces and the unbarred heads

 With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin and the sombre faces With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and solemn
 With all the mournful voices of the dirges, pour'd around the coffin
 The dim lit churches and the shudder ing organs—
 Where amid these you journey,
 With the tolling tolling bells' perpetual clang
 Here! coffin that slowly passes,
 I give you my spng of lilac

Whitman the Propagandist In this role Whitman, like his contemporary Whittier seems least successful While it is natural for a poet in a time of crisis to feel his responsibilities, to turn his talent to a cause, only rarely does he produce great poetry in so doing The section of Leaves of Grass called "Memories of President Lincoln" is above the realm of propaganda and ranks with the finest elegies written in the English language
 but many of the selections in "Drum Taps" which is concerned with the Civil War, are "forced" poems written as if the poet felt himself compelled to comment on the events taking place For instance, in "Beat! Beat! Drums!" the first few lines are

Beat! beat! drums!—Blow! bugles! blow!
 Through the windows—through doors
 —burst like a force of ruthless men, Into the solemn church and scatter the congregation,
 Into the school where the scholar is studying Leave not the bridegroom quiet—no happiness must he have now with his bride,
 Nor the peaceful farmer any peace ploughing his field or gathering his grain
 So fierce you whirr and pound you drums—so shrill you bugles blow

Here Whitman is merely superimposing the spirit and technique of "Song of the Open Road" on an entirely different sub ject However, in a few of the war poems

 —such as "Come Up from the Fields
 Father" and "Give Me the Splendid Si lent Sun," in which Whitman is writing about the fringes of the war—he seems more at ease and is consequently more successful

Whitman the Humorist This aspect of Whitman's talent is rarely recognized and almost never discussed fully Leaves of Grass contains much sly humor, many passages in which the reader suspects Whitman of poetic playfulness Although Whitman wrote no purely comical poems, he often expresses his ideas in a witty manner In "To a Common Prostitute" he seriously accepts the girl as a part of the human scene, but surely in the last line he has his tongue in his cheek "Till then I salute you with a significant look that you do not forget me" The first line of "Salut au Monde"—"O take my hand Walt Whitman"—and the other passages in which the poet talks to himself and makes poetry of his own name are cer tainly the affectation of a "character"
 Even the justly celebrated section in "Song of Myself" about the nature of grass can become, with a slightly unsym pathetic reading, a deadpan masterpiece of comic simplicity And Whitman's hu mor is intentional In Richard Chase's Walt Whitman Reconsidered the poet is quoted as having said to his Camden friends "I pride myself on being a real humorist underneath everything else" Here is a poet who is alternately comic and serious—and sometimes both at the same time Whitman will always be chiefly remembered as a poet of force and eloquence, a prophet of high ideals, but his wit must also be reckoned a part of his genius

Whitman the Poet The range of Whitman's skill in poetic technique is remarkable In his carol in praise of death, from "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," he creates an effect as soft as a summer night, and in the love song of the grieving bird in "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" the music is gentle, poignant, haunting

Soothe! Soothe!

*Close on its wave soothes the wave behind,
And again another behind embracing and lapping every one close,
But my love soothes not me*

*Low hangs the moon—it rose late,
O it is lagging—O I think it is heavy with love*

*O madly the sea pushes upon the land,
With love—with love*

*O night!
O do I not see my love fluttering out there among the breakers?
What is that little black thing I see there in the white?*

*O rising stars!
Perhaps the one I want so much will rise with some of you*

At other times he sounds his "barbaric yawp," which many casual readers have labeled the uncontrolled outpourings of an undisciplined poet. True, there are times when the repetition, the ceaseless cataloguing, the too Biblical rhythms, the artificial combination of Quakerisms and first reader French seem hardly worth wading through, but these passages contain the flaws to be found in the collected works of any poet. At his best Whitman is a master of precise diction. The opening twenty-two lines of "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" not only contain a stirring rhythm and a perfectly timed climax but also are characterized by an exquisite choice of words. In a much shorter poem, "When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer," Whitman's form is the usual heavily accented free verse, but here again there seems hardly a word that could be changed or omitted.

Whitman has been called a "line poet" because among his many virtues is the ability to pack the memorable into a single line. Frequently these lines open his poem and he lets them double as titles: "As Toilsome I Wander'd Virginia's Woods," "Give Me the Splendid Silent Sun," "I Hear America Singing," "Good-bye My Fancy," and "I Sing the Body Electric." Whitman is so famed as the breaker of tradition, the iconoclast who broke the way for the "modern poetry" of our time that we tend to forget his rank among the master craftsmen of English verse. Whitman underestimated himself when he said, in "Poets To Come,"

I but write one or two indicative words for the future

I but advance a moment, only to wheel and hurry back in the darkness

I am a man who sauntering along without fully stopping, turns a casual look upon you, and then averts his face

Leaving it to you to prove and define it, Expecting the main things from you

Many of these "main things" are already fulfilled in Leaves of Grass

The Legend of Good Women, a poem recounting the stories of women from history and myth who were martyrs to love, is written in the tradition of medieval love poetry. Unlike Chaucer's masterpieces, Troilus and Criseyde and The Canterbury Tales, this work only occasionally rises above the limitations imposed by the artificial conventions of the times and is, therefore, inferior to these other works. Chaucer's greatness as a poet resulted not so much from his ability to perfect the current modes of writing as it did from his capacity to transcend them. Although his debt to contemporary thought and literary practice was considerable, his high position among English writers depends largely on his gift for bringing reality to a literature that was customarily unrealistic. In The Legend of Good Women, however, he constructed a framework so restricting that he was unable to infuse it with the richness and subtle shadings of human existence.

The most engaging part of the poem is the prologue, in which Chaucer revealed his elation at the arrival of spring. He delighted in roaming through the meadows, listening to the small birds, and gazing at the flowers. He was especially attracted to the daisy, which he could observe for hours without becoming bored. One spring day, after a walk in the fields, he fell asleep and had a vision in which the God of Love and the beautiful Alceste, dressed in the colors of the daisy, appeared before him. Cupid denounced the dreamer for committing heresy against the laws of love by writing of Criseyde's infidelity and by translating The Romance of the Rose with its disparaging remarks about womankind. But Cupid's companion (the same Alceste whom Hercules rescued from Hades after she had given her life to redeem her husband from death) rose to the poet's defense by contending that he, having appropriated his plots from other writers, acted out of ignorance, not malice. She concluded that he might gain Cupid's forgiveness by writing a legendary of wives and maidens who had been faithful in love all their lives.

The prologue is filled with literary devices popular in the fourteenth century. The religion of love—with its sins, penances, self-abnegation, and sanctity, with its Cupid and Alceste analogous to God and the Virgin Mary—closely paralleled the Christian religion. The daisy, having recently replaced the rose, was the symbol of love. The question of whether the flower or the leaf was superior, apparently a hotly debated issue in courtly circles, Chaucer touches upon, but without committing himself. The dream vision used here had been a very popular device ever since the appearance of The Romance of the Rose; Chaucer himself employing it in several works. Despite this elaborate machinery, which today is mainly of historic interest, the prologue has about it a universal appeal, cheerfulness, humor, and a tinge of ironic detachment preserve it from mediocrity. Also of special excellence is Chaucer's expression of his delight in nature.

According to the prologue, Chaucer planned to write twenty tales concerning good women. He finished eight and left a ninth just short of completion. The theme of all the legends is the fidelity of women in love. All the heroines suffer for, and the majority die for, their love. All are treated as wholly admirable, even saintly, without regard to the illicit nature of some of the relationships presented.

Events in their lives not concerned with their fidelity are omitted or hastily summarized. With the exception of the first two legends, the women suffer as the result of the treachery of men, who generally are as thoroughgoing in their villainy as the women are in their virtue.

The longest and one of the best of the legends retells the story of Dido's love for Aeneas. After Aeneas had landed on the Libyan coast, he met Venus, his mother, who instructed him to go to the court of Dido, Queen of Carthage. Dido greeted him cordially and, knowing his flight from Troy, felt great pity for the disinherited hero. And with her pity, came love. For comfort and entertainment during his visit, she provided everything riches could command.

One day, when Aeneas, Dido, and her retinue were hunting, a thunderstorm burst upon them. Everyone rushed for shelter, and Dido and Aeneas found themselves in the same cave. There the perfidious Aeneas protested his love for her and she, upon much importuning, had pity and yielded herself to him. For a time, Aeneas performed all the duties of a courtly lover, but finally, becoming weary, he made plans to leave. When Dido, noting his lessened ardor, asked what was wrong, he told her of a vision (a pure fabrication, Chaucer implied) in which his father reminded him of his destiny to conquer Italy. Ignoring her pleas, Aeneas stole away to his ships without her. As soon as she discovered his absence, she had her sister build a funeral pyre upon which, using Aeneas' sword, she stabbed herself.

Chaucer's principal source for this tale was Vergil's Aeneid. With slight modifications of the plot, Chaucer made substantial changes in characterization. Dido, who did not escape Vergil's censure, was made blameless by Chaucer, mainly by his elaboration of the scene in the cave. With a minimizing of the intervention of the gods and a degrading of his motives, the pious Aeneas of Vergil became in Chaucer's hands a mere seducer. Thus a story of tragic struggle between love and duty was transformed into one of man's treachery and woman's loyalty.

Chaucer's source for "The Legend of Lucretia" was Ovid's Fasts, which he followed rather closely. To prove the virtues of his wife Lucretia, Collatinus offered to accompany Tarquin, the king's son, to Rome to see her. Secreted outside her chamber door, they found her spinning among her servants and expressing concern for her husband's safety. Tarquin, observing her natural beauty, conceived a great desire for her. The next day, his lust increasing, he determined to return to Collatinus' house and make Lucretia his lover. Stealing into her room at night, he threatened her at sword's point and, while she lay in a swoon, ravished her. After he had left, Lucretia dressed in mourning, called her friends about her, and revealed to them the vile deed. Telling them that her husband should not gain a foul name from her guilt, she brought forth a knife and stabbed herself.

"The Legend of Hypsipyle and Medea" recounts the double treachery of Jason. On his expedition to recover the Golden Fleece, Jason, accompanied by Hercules, stopped at the island of Lemnos, where they met Queen Hypsipyle, and conspired in capturing her affections for Jason. While Jason counterfeited modesty, his virtues were extolled by Hercules. Thus Hypsipyle was ensnared and consented to marry him. After making use of her wealth and begetting two children upon her, he left. Although he ignored her letter imploring him to return, she remained true to him and died of a broken heart.

Arriving at Colchis, Jason was entertained by King Aeetes. Medea, the king's daughter, became enamored of Jason and revealed to him that the Golden Fleece could be secured only with her help. They agreed to marry, and Jason made a solemn promise never to be untrue. Later, after the expedition had been successful, Jason again proved false and left her to marry Creusa.

Toward the end of The Legend of Good Women, Chaucer indicated a definite weariness with his subject. By adhering to his original plan, he wrote tales that have a tiresome sameness about them. Committed to perfect women and, in most instances, evil men, he found it difficult to develop his characters. A further deterrent to good characterization was his effort to keep the tales brief; some, as a result, are little more than plot summaries. Upon Dido he lavished more attention than on his other heroines, and she is his most lifelike portrait. There are good touches in other female characters; for example, the pathos of Lucretia in her death scene and the mingled fear and courage of Thisbe. His men, however, are little more than abstractions.

These tales mark a step toward Chaucer's later work, for in this poem he first used the decasyllabic couplet, afterward employed so successfully in The Canterbury Tales. His juxtaposing of The Legend of Good Women with Troilus and Criseyde prepared him for the more subtle contrasts of the Marriage Group. The work may have been left unfinished because of Chaucer's growing absorption with The Canterbury Tales. Although The Legend of Good Women is not without merit, this redirection of his efforts can hardly be regretted.

LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN FARMER

Type of work Epistolary essays

Author Michel Guillaume Jean de Crèvecoeur (1735-1813)

First published London, 1782, Philadelphia, 1793

When, in 1759, Voltaire published his Candide, Crèvecoeur was already planning to cultivate his garden, hewn out of the Pennsylvania frontier. Like Voltaire's naive hero, he had seen too much of the horrors of the civilized world and was more than ready to retire to his bucolic paradise, where for nineteen years he lived in peace and happiness until the civilized world routed him and his family with the outbreak of the American Revolution. The twelve essays that make up his Letters from an American Farmer are the crude, occasionally eloquent, testimony of a man trying desperately to convince himself and his readers that it was possible to live the idealized life advocated by Rousseau.

With a becoming modesty, appropriate to a man who had learned English at sixteen, Crèvecoeur begins with a confession of his literary inadequacy and decides simply to write down what he would say. But his style is not smoothly colloquial. Except in a few passages in which conviction generates enthusiasm, one senses the strain of the unlettered man wielding an unfamiliar pen.* The opening letter presents the central theme quite clearly: the decadence of European civilization makes the American frontier one of the great hopes for a regeneration of mankind. He wonders why men travel to Italy to "amuse themselves in viewing the ruins of temples . . . half ruined amphitheatres and the putrid fevers of the Campania must fill the mind with most melancholy reflections." By contrast, he delights in the humble rudiments and embryos of societies spreading everywhere in the colonies, men converting large forests into pleasing fields and creating thirteen provinces of easy subsistence and political harmony. He has his interlocutor say of him, "Your mind is . . . a Tabula rasa where spontaneous and strong impressions are delineated with felicity." Similarly, he sees the American continent as a clean slate on which men can inscribe a new society and the good life. It may be said that Crèvecoeur is a Lockian gone romantic, but retaining just enough practical good sense to see that reality is not rosy. "Men are like plants," he says, "the goodness and flavour of the fruit proceeds from the peculiar soil and exposition in which they grow"

The first image Crèvecoeur presents is perhaps a bit too idyllic for modern taste. He dandles his little boy on the plow as his wife sits at the edge of the field knitting and praising the straightness of the furrows, while birds fill the air with summer melodies. "Who can listen unmoved to the sweet love tales of our robins told from tree to tree?" Nevertheless, this is the testimony of a man who for nineteen years actually lived at the edge of the wilderness, three hundred miles from the Atlantic. He was no Thoreau at Walden Pond within easy walking distance of friends, family, and a highly developed New England culture at Concord. He was, instead, a responsible man, who cleared 371 acres of virgin land and raised enough crops and animals to provide for his family, Negro hands, and all peaceful strangers who chanced to appear at his door. Also unlike Thoreau (with whom he inevitably invites comparison), he was acutely aware of his social responsibilities and enormously proud of the superior way in which they could be fulfilled in the New World. No doubt it was the third epistle, "What Is An American?" that caught the attention of Benjamin Franklin and the Europeans of the Age of Enlightenment.

[America] is not composed as in Europe, of great lords who possess every thing, and of a herd of people who have nothing. Here are no aristocratical families, no courts, no kings, no bishops, no ecclesiastical dominion no visible power giving to a few a very visible one no great manufacturers employing thousands, no great refinements of luxury. The rich and the poor are not so far removed from each other as they are in Europe. We are the most perfect society now existing in the world.

Enthusiastic as this description is, it is not as extravagant as it might be, Crèvecoeur does not claim that the colonies had founded the best of all possible worlds. He is, for example, acutely aware of the paradox that religious influence gradually declines as one goes west instead of liberating men, it reduces them to a perfect state of war, man against man. Yet he rejoices that there are almost no concentrated religious sects preying upon each other. "Zeal in Europe is confined a grain of powder enclosed, here it burns away in the open air, and consumes without effect."

Furthermore, not every man succeeds after arriving in the New World—only the sober, the honest, the industrious. In his "History of Andrew, the Hebridean," Crèvecoeur presents a case history of the Horatio Alger hero in primitive America, the story of a simple illiterate Scotchman who after four years of sweat and toil became a prospering freeholder. Franklin had occasion to caution his friends in France that Crèvecoeur's was a highly colored account.

Part of the coloring is contributed by the pervasive nature imagery. The freedom and beauty of birds seem to symbolize the condition man might achieve when he immerses himself in nature. Crèvecoeur describes hours spent in quiet admiration of the hummingbirds, tells regretfully of shooting a kingbird to rescue bees (of 171 removed from its craw, 54 returned to life), describes the feeding and care of quail in the winter. Insects, too, fascinated him, he kept a hornet's nest in the house. The letter on rattlers and copperheads is as horrendous and awesome as anything in Bartram. Here Crèvecoeur tells of copperheads enticing birds by the power of their eyes, of a defanged rattler trained as a pet, of a pair of snakes in mortal combat. Most curious of all is the account of a farmer who kicked away a snake that had thrust its fangs into his boot. After pulling off his boots that night, he suddenly became violently ill, writhed horribly, and died. His son, inheriting the boots, suffered the same fate. A neighbor, next in succession, almost died, too, but was saved.

when a shrewd doctor located the poison filled fangs stuck in the boot Crèvecoeur in these passages reveals an exciting narrative power

Apart from the agricultural life inland, Crèvecoeur praises most the industry and sobriety of the coastal fishing communities at Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard, where "perfect equanimity prevails" At Nantucket (which, oddly, he locates north of Boston), five thousand prosperous people inhabited a place which in Europe would have housed a few simple fishermen Their Yankee ingenuity and sound business sense had enabled them to build—beginning with one whale boat—a whaling fleet that ranged even to the South Seas And Martha's Vineyard was already the "nursery" of seamen for the entire east coast So detailed is Crèvecoeur's description of the chase, the ferocity of the whales struggle, the dangers from sharks and thrasher whales, the processing of blubber into whale oil—in short, the entire experience, that one wonders how Melville could have overlooked it in compiling the extracts in Moby Dick (1851)

Crèvecoeur found Nantucket such a model community that it contained only one minister (a Presbyterian, for the Quakers, much to Crèvecoeur's delight, do not have special ministers), two doctors, one lawyer (seldom employed), no soldiers, no governors "Happy the people who are subject to so mild a government, happy the government which has to rule over such harmless and such in dustrious subjects" I wish I had it in my power to send the most persecuting bigot I could find in — to the whale fisheries, in three or four years you would find him a much more tractable man and therefore a better Christian" But colonial Nantucket was apparently not perfect, the Quakers persisted in their ungrammatical English, did not tolerate any deviation from their sober customs and homespun dress, sternly prohibited music, singing, and dancing "Such an island is not the place where gay travel lers should resort in order to enjoy the variety of pleasures the more splendid towns of this continent afford" Crèvecoeur also reports, obviously misled by some notorious gossip, that the women were addicted to opium "But," he philosophizes, "where is the society perfectly free from error and folly?"

Crèvecoeur's criticism is reserved for the most European of American cities, Charles Town, "gayest in America centre of our beau monde" Lawyers, planters, and merchants make up the population, all addicted to dangerous excesses of all kinds At the heart of this social corruption, Crèvecoeur finds the brutal institution of slavery He tells the horrifying tale of his chance encounter with a Negro who had been driven to kill an overseer As his punishment he had been suspended from a tree in a cage for two days Vicious birds had already plucked out his eyes and bared his cheek bones No sooner were the birds dispersed than swarms of insects covered him The miserable man begged for water and hoped it was poisoned "Gracious God!" cries Crèvecoeur, "to what end is the introduction of so many beings into [such] a mode of existence! Is there then no superintending power who conducts the moral operations of the world?"

Some of Crèvecoeur's faith is restored by the spectacle of the humble, kind, and generous aspect of William Bartram, the Quaker botanist, whose Negroes were salaried free men, workers on his plantation, companions at his table, and worshippers at the Friends' meeting house

But the Letters from an American Farmer end in ominous tones of impending tragedy Unwilling to commit his allegiance to either the British or the colonists, Crèvecoeur finds it necessary to flee "Must I in order to be called a faithful subject, coolly and philosophically say it is necessary for the good of Britain that my children's brains should be dashed against the walls of the house in which they were reared, that my wife should be stabbed and scalped before my face, that
